CITY OF OAKLAND v. PARKER et al.
(Civ. 4932.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 18, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 16, 1925.)

1. Eminent domain ⇨167(1)—City desiring land for new public street may proceed either under Civil Code of Procedure or under Special Street Opening Act.

A city desiring land for a new public street may proceed either under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1237-1264 or under the Special Street Opening Act of 1903.

2. Eminent domain ⇨167(2)—When code provisions followed in condemnation proceedings, property owner cannot question necessity thereof or advisability of route chosen.

Where city in acquiring land for new public street followed procedure authorized by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1237-1264, property owner cannot question necessity thereof or advisability of route chosen.

3. Eminent domain ☞67—Necessity and route legislative questions and determination by legislative body conclusive.

In all condemnation proceedings brought under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1237-1264, questions of necessity and route are legislative ones, and determination by legislative body is conclusive.

4. Eminent domain ☞171—That proposed street would benefit one property owner more than another, or that one property owner agreed to pay all expenses, no defense.

That proposed street would benefit one property owner more than another, or that one property owner had agreed to pay all expenses, is no defense to city's right to condemn land for public street.

5. Eminent domain ☞66—Courts cannot interfere with determination of council as to route of proposed street or necessity of condemnation.

Courts cannot interfere with determination of city council as to route of proposed street or necessity for condemnation in acquiring lands under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1237-1264, for street purposes.

6. Eminent domain ☞136—Measure of damages is actual value of property taken plus damage to property not taken.

The measure of damages to property owner in condemnation is actual value of property taken plus damage, if any, to land not taken; test being fair value in view of purposes to which property is naturally adapted, and not value for special purpose.

7. Evidence ☞113(1)—Refusal to hear evidence as to value land might have, if city opened street in another portion of block, held proper.

In condemnation proceedings by city to acquire land to open new public street, where court heard all evidence as to fair value of property taken, and damage to that not taken, refusal to hear evidence as to what value land might have if street were opened in another portion of block more suitable to property owner's plans for subdividing his tract was proper.

8. Evidence ☞113(1)—Rejection of evidence of value based upon rejected scheme requiring laying out dead end street held proper.

In condemnation proceedings by city to acquire land for public street, evidence of value based on a scheme requiring laying out of a dead end street, which scheme had been rejected by city authorities, held properly rejected as purely speculative.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding by the City of Oakland against W. Parker and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant W. M. Greuner appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Bingaman, of Oakland, for appellant.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Bestor Robinson, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. The plaintiff sued to condemn a certain strip of land in the city of Oakland to be used for the purpose of a public street. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury. Findings and judgment were entered, condemning the land for the purposes mentioned, and the plaintiff paid into court the sum awarded to the defendant W. M. Greuner. From this judgment said defendant prosecutes this appeal upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

In his opening brief the appellant advances four grounds of attack upon the judgment which we will consider in the order presented:

[1-5] (1) That the appellant was deprived of the opportunity of being heard before the city council for the purpose of showing that the land was really being condemned for a private use. The point is that as an adjoining property owner would be greatly benefited by the opening of the street and paid to the city all the expense of the condemnation proceedings, the use for which the property was taken was a private one. The answer is that, for the purpose of acquiring land for a new public street, a city may proceed under the general laws relating to condemnation of property for public uses (sections 1237-1264, inclusive, Code Civ. Proc.), or under the special Street Opening Act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 376). City of Los Angeles v. Cline, 40 Cal. App. 487, 489, 181 P. 78. When the procedure authorized by the Code of Civil Procedure is followed, the property owner is not entitled to be heard on the question of necessity or advisability of the route chosen. City of Los Angeles v. Leavis, 119 Cal. 164, 165, 51 P. 34; Adamson v. County of Los Angeles, 52 Cal. App. 125, 129, 198 P. 52; County of Los Angeles v. Rindge Co., 53 Cal. App. 166, 170, 200 P. 27. In all cases brought under the general code provisions the questions of necessity and route are purely legislative ones to be determined by the legislative body alone. Wulzen v. Board of Supervisors, 101 Cal. 15, 21, 35 P. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17; County of San Mateo v. Colburn, 130 Cal. 631, 635, 63 P. 78, 621; County of Riverside v. Alberhill, etc., 34 Cal. App. 538, 540, 168 P. 152. Such determination when made by the legislative body is conclusive. See section 1241, Code Civ. Proc. The fact that the proposed street would benefit one property owner more than another is no answer to the city's right to condemn the land and open the street for public use. County of Riverside v. Alberhill, etc., 34 Cal. App. 538, 541, 168 P. 152.

And the same may be said as to appellant's objection that this property owner had agreed to pay all the expenses of the acquisition of the land. Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 541, 34 P. 224. In his closing brief the appellant states that the question before the court on this appeal is whether a city may condemn private land for street purposes at the behest of a landowner who agrees to pay the entire cost of the proceeding. But we find running through all the argument that appellant's real position is that, if the city had laid out the street on a different route it would have been of greater benefit to him. As we have seen, the questions of route and necessity are for the council to decide, and when this determination is made the courts may not interfere.

(2) That the code provisions relating to eminent domain proceedings are unconstitutional because they give the plaintiff an option to enforce or abandon the proceedings, thus discriminating against the defendants. Inasmuch as the respondent has not attempted to avail itself of this option, the question is not involved in this appeal. Anything that we should say on the point raised would therefore be mere dicta, and as such it would add nothing to the opinion.

[6, 7] (3) That the court erred in refusing to consider evidence of the fitness of appellant's land for subdivision purposes and the effect of the taking upon his plans for such subdivision. The measure of damages to which a property owner is entitled in condemnation is the market or actual value of the property plus the damage to the land not taken, if any. In estimating this value "the test is, not value for a special purpose, but fair value in view of all purposes to which the property is naturally adapted." 10 Cal. Jur. p. 338. Such uses, however, do not include remote or speculative possibilities (Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Hudson, 182 Cal. 48, 53, 186 P. 772), or the value if the property should be devoted to some other particular use (Sacramento Southern Railroad Co. v. Heilbron, 156 Cal. 408, 409, 104 P. 979; Oakland v. Pacific Coast Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 392, 400, 153 P. 705). Here the trial court heard all evidence directed to the fair value of the property taken, and to the damage to the portion of the tract not taken. It refused to hear evidence of what value the land might have if the city would open a street in another portion of the block more suitable to appellant's plans for subdividing his tract. In this the court committed no error.

[8] (4) That there is no evidence to support the award of damages made by the trial court. The point is that all the witnesses for the respondent disqualified themselves because of the basis upon which they estimated the value of the property, and that the court was therefore bound by the evidence of appellant's witnesses, all of whom fixed the value higher than the amount awarded. The respondent answers that the evidence was received without objection, and that the trial court, acting under a stipulation made by the parties, viewed the premises, and thereby gained some knowledge of the value of the property, which must be treated as evidence in support of the findings. In each instance there are respectable authorities which support respondent's answers to the point raised, but it is unnecessary to cite them, because the witnesses called by the respondent fixed the value upon the basis of the fair market value, and disregarded the speculative value which the appellant sought to place upon the property in the event that some other scheme of development of the entire tract was adopted. As it was shown that the city authorities had rejected this scheme because it would require the laying out of a blind or "dead end" street, the trial court properly rejected evidence of value based upon this scheme as purely speculative.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

70 Cal. App. 372

JAMES v. SCHAFER et ux. (Civ. 2866.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 24, 1924.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⚡241(2)—Judgment against debtor, though a nonresident, is essential to creditor's action to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance.

Under Civ. Code, § 3441, it is essential to creditor's action to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyance of debtor's property, that claim against such debtor be reduced to judgment, or so far prosecuted that legal process to which he is entitled is obstructed, and this though debtor be a nonresident against whom personal judgment could not be obtained.

2. Appearance ⚡19(2)—Nonresident's appearance by demurrer in action for legal and equitable relief may sustain personal judgment for legal relief, though complaint insufficient to state cause of action for equitable relief.

In action against nonresident defendant for money had and received, and for cancellation of alleged fraudulent conveyance, defendant's appearance by general demurrer on ground that complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute cause of action is sufficient to give court jurisdiction to enter personal judgment against him for legal relief sought, though complaint may not state sufficient facts to constitute cause of action for equitable relief sought.

3. Pleading ⚡49—Complaint stating cause of action for either equitable or legal relief is sufficient as against demurrer on ground that it does not state cause of action.

Complaint in suit for both legal and equitable relief is sufficient as against demurrer on ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, if it states a cause of action for either legal or equitable relief.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by A. L. James, as receiver of the First National Bank of Gridley, against J. A. Schafer and Clara E. Schafer, his wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Judgment as to J. A. Schafer reversed in part and affirmed in part, and as to Clara E. Schafer reversed.

Carleton Gray, of Oroville, for appellants.
King & King, of Gridley, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This action was begun by the plaintiff to obtain a judgment and decree of the court setting aside a certain transfer of real property made, executed, and delivered by the defendant J. A. Schafer to his wife, Clara E. Schafer, on the ground that said transfer was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding creditors, and that no consideration had been paid therefor. The second amended complaint sets forth facts upon which the plaintiff seeks both legal and equitable relief. The legal relief sought is a judgment in the sum of about $43,000 against the defendant J. A. Schafer for and on account of moneys belonging to the said First National Bank of Gridley, had and received by the defendant J. A. Schafer, and unlawfully converted to his own uses and purposes; the equitable relief sought being the cancellation of the transfer of real property, as before stated. The complaint is in eleven counts, all of them being identical; hence a summary of one will suffice for a clear statement of the whole complaint.

The organization of the First National Bank of Gridley is first set forth, its membership in the Federal Reserve Bank of this district, the ensuing insolvency of the bank, and the appointment of the plaintiff herein as receiver thereof. The complaint then alleged that during the year 1920 the defendant J. A. Schafer, in violation of his trust as president and manager of said bank, entered into a secret partnership with one Mary A. Rinesmith in the cultivation of rice, and for the purpose of financing the same loaned and advanced, out of the funds of said bank, different sums of money (these sums are fully set forth in the complaint); that the said Mary A. Rinesmith at the time said moneys were advanced was insolvent; that the said defendant J. A. Schafer knew thereof; that no security was taken for the repayment of the funds to the bank so loaned, and that the funds so loaned by the defendant J. A. Schafer to the said Mary A. Rinesmith was a total loss, etc.; that thereafter, and on or about the 27th day of December, 1920, and after the indebtedness hereinabove referred to had been incurred, the said J. A. Schafer, for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff, and in order to prevent it from collecting said indebtedness, etc., conveyed to his wife, the defendant Clara E. Schafer, three parcels of land; that the deeds conveying said parcels were recorded in official records of Butte county; that said parcels of land were not exempt from execution, and that, after the execution and recording of said deeds, there remained no property standing in the name of said defendant J. A. Schafer, etc., out of which the indebtedness due said plaintiff could be satisfied from, either in whole or in part; that immediately after making and recording said conveyance both of said defendants departed from the state of California, and ever since have been and now are nonresidents of said state; and that both of said defendants reside in Columbus, in the state of Ohio. Further allegations are set forth showing that the act of the defendant Schafer was in violation of the statutes governing members of the Federal Reserve Bank and establishing liability of said defendant for all sums so fraudulently appropriated by him; also the insolvency of said defendant at the time of the transfer. To this second amended complaint the defendants demurred generally to each separate cause of action in identical language except as to the numbering thereof. We quote the first:

"That the first cause of action attempted to be set forth in said second amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

The court overruled the demurrer interposed by the defendants, the defendants failed to answer, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, as prayed for by him, and from this judgment the defendants appeal.

[1] It thus appears from the second amended complaint that at the time this action was instituted the plaintiff did not have any judgment against the defendant J. A. Schafer for any of the sums of money alleged to be due from him to the bank of which the plaintiff was the receiver, nor that any suit had been commenced to recover such judgment, nor had any lien, by attachment or otherwise, been acquired by the plaintiff upon the lands and premises, the conveyance of which from the defendant J. A. Schafer to his wife Clara E. Schafer is sought to be set aside. It is purely an action to set aside a conveyance without first having acquired any judgment against either of the defendants, and without having acquired any lien upon the lands and premises alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed. The sole reason for not having proceeded to acquire either a judgment or attachment lien upon the premises is the alleged fact that at the time of the commencement of this action the defendants were both nonresidents of the state of California; and this is urged as an exception to the general rule that a creditor at large without a judgment is not in a position to maintain an action to set aside a conveyance of property made by his debtor. Section 3441 of the Civil Code, defining the right of a creditor, indicates that such right must first have been judicially ascertained. The section reads:

"A creditor can avoid the act or obligation of his debtor for fraud only where the fraud obstructs the enforcement, by legal process, of his right to take the property affected by the transfer or obligation."

In other words, the creditor must have brought himself in that position where the legal process to which he is entitled is obstructed.

Relying upon a paragraph of the opinion written by Commissioner Cooper in the case of First National Bank v. Eastman, 144 Cal. 487, 77 P. 1043, 103 Am. St. Rep. 95, 1 Ann. Cas. 626, the respondent alleges that, as both of the defendants in this case were nonresidents, it was unnecessary to acquire any lien upon the premises, the transfer concerning which it was sought to have set aside, and this for the reason that a personal judgment against the defendant J. A. Schafer would be of no avail; that a personal judgment for money against a nonresident does not constitute any lien, and is not, in and of itself, any basis for an execution. This is all true, but the argument which leads to this conclusion also leads to the conclusion that the judgment in the case at bar fixing and determining the amount of the indebtedness from the defendant J. A. Schafer to the bank, of which the plaintiff is the receiver, founded upon constructive services, would stand upon the same basis. The language of the opinion referred to is as follows:

"It is the general rule that a creditor must reduce his claim to a judgment before he can maintain an action of this character. But to this rule there is a well-established exception. Where the defendant is a non-resident, a personal judgment cannot be obtained against him, and therefore the fact of his being a non-resident creates an exception to the rule, and such action can be maintained without the creditor having obtained a judgment."

To support this rule cases are cited from Indiana, Iowa and Missouri.

An examination of that case and the facts upon which it is based shows that the language quoted is not so broad when applied to the facts under consideration, as contended for by the respondent. The complaint in that case sets forth that attachment proceedings had been taken and had, an attachment lien had been acquired, and a judgment entered for the amount claimed, and in the complaint in a cause of action immediately under consideration the indebtedness was not pleaded, simply the judgment was pleaded as evidencing the indebtedness, and the court, after considering all of the facts, held that was not a sufficient pleading, and, as previously pointed out in the opinion, shows that the judgment would be good only as it partook of a proceeding in rem against the property, as where it says, "The property of the non-resident is seized by the process of attachment, the court may in such suit dispose of the property, but it cannot go further and give a personal judgment, except one which can be enforced as to the seized property against such non-resident. In the suit against Eastman the court might have directed a judgment which would justify the sale of the property to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, * * *" and, further, that "such service may answer in all actions which are substantially proceedings in rem. But, where the entire object of the action is to determine the personal rights and obligations of the defendants—that is, where the suit is merely in personam—constructive service in this form upon a non-resident is ineffectual for any purpose * * *" and, further "in attachment proceedings the published notice may be sufficient to enable the plaintiff to obtain a judgment which he can enforce by sale of the property attached; but for any other purpose such judgment would be ineffectual."

Appreciating the impossibility of obtaining a valid personal judgment against a non-resident in actions of this character, some courts have held that an attachment lien will suffice, in that it gives the court jurisdiction to take the seized property and apply it toward the payment of the debtor's obligation. Thus, in Heyneman v. Dannenberg, 6 Cal. 376, 65 Am. Dec. 519, in a case decided before the adoption of section 3441, Civil Code, the Supreme Court said:

"A court of equity will take jurisdiction of a bill for an injunction filed by attaching creditors of an insolvent, to restrain proceedings on execution against the property attached under a judgment against the debtor, in favor of another, alleged to have been obtained by fraud, where all the material allegations of the bill, except fraud, are admitted," —and then, considering the question of courts having held the necessity of a previous judgment having been obtained, further said:

"The modern decisions of some of the courts of the United States, seem, however, to have relaxed the severity of the English rule, and in some cases it has been held that a creditor who has acquired a lien under the attachment laws of a state may apply to a court of chancery without first proceeding to judgment."

In Aigeltinger v. Einstein, 143 Cal. 609, 77 P. 669, 101 Am. St. Rep. 131, the Supreme Court speaking through Chipman, Commissioner, cites practically all the preceding cases on this subject, and lays down the rule that "a creditor who has merely levied an attachment upon real property as the property of his debtor, subsequent to the date of an alleged fraudulent conveyance made thereof by the debtor to his wife, cannot prior to the rendition of a judgment against the husband maintain an action in equity to set aside the conveyance." An examination of this case shows that an attachment had been issued, and a lien of that character fixed upon the property sought to be subjected to the payment of the creditor's claims.

In Lyden v. Spohn-Patrick Co., 155 Cal. 177, 100 P. 236, the Supreme Court said:

"No one but a creditor, or one having some interest or estate in the property, can maintain a suit to set aside a fraudulent transfer. It is the general rule that even a creditor cannot do so until after he has established his debt by the recovery of a judgment thereon," citing a number of cases.

"The beginning of an action and the issuance and levy of a writ of attachment therein does not give the plaintiff a status which will enable him to maintain such action. * * * There is an exception to these rules in cases where the debtor is a non-resident and where, consequently, no personal judgment can be obtained against him," —overlooking the fact entirely that in the case stated to sustain this last proposition the property was held under an attachment lien.

In Sewell v. Price, 164 Cal. 267, 128 P. 409, the Supreme Court, speaking through Justice Sloss, outlined the necessary procedure preceding the maintenance of a creditor's bill as follows:

"Section 3441 of the Civil Code provides that 'a creditor can avoid the act or obligation of his debtor for fraud only where the fraud obstructs the enforcement, by legal process, of his right to take the property affected by the transfer or obligation.' Consequently it is universally held that a creditor is not in a position to attack a transfer for fraud unless he has a specific lien upon the property transferred or has reduced his claim against the debtor to judgment. The rule is thus stated in Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635 (38 Am. St. Rep. 314, 35 P. 433), quoting from Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances (2d Ed.) p. 522: 'A creditor cannot be said to be delayed, hindered or defrauded by any conveyance, until some property out of which he has a specific right to be satisfied is withdrawn from his reach by a fraudulent conveyance. Such specific right does not exist until he has bound the property by judgment, or by judgment and execution, as the case may be, and has shown that he is defrauded by the conveyance in consequence of not being able to procure satisfaction of his debt in due course of law.' The bill maintained by a judgment creditor to subject to the payment of his demand property fraudulently transferred by the debtor is not, strictly speaking, an action upon his judgment. It is really an action for equitable relief against the obstruction caused by a transfer which hinders him in satisfying his claim by the ordinary process of law, that is to say, by an execution. If, then, he puts himself in a position to levy execution, he has done everything necessary to enable him to attack the transfer which hinders his enjoyment of his right."

Again, in Roberts v. Buckingham, 172 Cal. 458, 156 P. 1018, the Supreme Court, speaking through Justice Shaw, announces the rule as follows:

"So far as this complaint attempted to state a cause of action to set aside the alleged fraudulent deed it was defective for the reason that it did not show that the plaintiff had established his debt against Buckingham by reducing it to the form of a judgment. Civ. Code, § 3441; Aigeltinger v. Einstein, 143 Cal. 609 (101 Am. St. Rep. 131, 77 P. 669); McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 315; First National Bank v. Eastman, 144 Cal. 487 (103 Am. St. Rep. 95, 1 Ann. Cas. 626, 77 P. 1043); Lyden v. Spohn-Patrick Co., 155 Cal. 177, 183 (100 P. 236); Sewell v. Price, 164 Cal. 265, 270 (128 P. 407). The allegation that Buckingham was a nonresident of the state does not cure the defect. The cases cited establish the proposition that even against a nonresident the creditor must first prosecute his suit so far, at least, as to obtain some specific lien, as by attachment, upon the property."

This case is directly in point, in that it deals with proceedings against a nonresident, and clearly enunciates the rule that the property must be bound by some specific lien, as by attachment, before a creditor's bill will lie.

In 12 California Jurisprudence, p. 1035, § 75, the rule in this particular is thus stated: "Where the debtor is a nonresident, and in consequence no judgment can be obtained against him, the creditor may bring suit without having reduced his claim to judgment but he must have prosecuted his action against the debtor so far as to obtain a specific lien on the debtor's property," citing Roberts v. Buckingham, supra, and a number of other cases, and on page 1036 of the same volume, section 76, the authorities are collected showing that either an attachment or judgment lien against the property must first have been established, or obtained, before a creditor's bill to set aside an alleged fraudulent transfer can be maintained.

In 12 Ruling Case Law, p. 629, § 136, the authorities are collected showing a conflict in the rule as to whether an action in the nature of a creditor's bill may be maintained when the property alleged to belong to the creditor is bound only by an attachment lien. The weight of authority would lead to the conclusion that in cases where the defendant is a nonresident an attachment lien would suffice. It is clear, however, from the other authorities which we have cited that the creditor must have established some specific lien upon the property alleged to belong to the debtor, and withdrawn from execution by some act which obstructs the legal process, to which the creditor has shown himself entitled before the institution of suit to set aside the conveyance.

[2, 3] This conclusion, however, does not lead to an entire reversal of the judgment herein. The complaint, while not stating a cause of action for equitable relief against the defendant J. A. Schafer, does state a cause of action for money had and received, and appropriated by the defendant to his uses and purposes, which belonged to the First National Bank of Gridley, and the said defendant, having appeared by a general demurrer, gave the court jurisdiction to enter against him a personal judgment. The demurrer, as we have seen, is general in form, and simply alleges in relation to each count that it does not state a cause of action. The demurrer does not point out that the complaint does not state a cause of action for equitable relief, nor is there any special demurrer calling the attention to specific defects, nor is there any ground of demurrer alleging or showing misjoinder of parties. It follows therefore that, if the complaints state any cause of action, it is sufficient. In White v. Lyons, 42 Cal. 279, it is said:

"If a complaint states facts which entitle the plaintiff to relief, either legal or equitable, it is not demurrable on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

See, also, Hulsman v. Todd, 96 Cal. 228, 31 P. 39; Jones v. Iverson, 131 Cal. 101, 63 P. 135. Other cases might be cited, but, as there is no conflict in the decisions on this point, further citation is unnecessary.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment against both the defendants, in so far as it purports to award equitable relief, must be reversed, and in so far as the money judgment is entered against the defendant J. A. Schafer it must be affirmed. This result, though necessitated by the language of section 3441 of the Civil Code, is not serious, as it leaves the plaintiff with a judgment lien against any property owned by the defendant J. A. Schafer at the time of its rendition, and, if the facts are as alleged in plaintiff's complaint in relation to the fraudulent transfer of the property there described, the foundation is laid for subjecting it to the payment of plaintiff's claims. The judgment, in so far as it awards equitable relief, is hereby reversed, and in so far as it awards judgment for the recovery of the moneys had and received by the defendant J. A. Schafer it is affirmed. The appellant Clara E. Schafer is allowed her costs on appeal.

LISHER v. FAIRBANKS. (Civ. 4768.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 22, 1924.)

1. Contracts ⚡198(5)—Road contractor's contract construed as affected subcontractor's right to payment for excavations below grade line.

Road contractor's contract with county, providing for payment at stipulated rate "for all concrete work, including all excavations," held to contemplate payment for excavations made below grade line in placing concrete structures, as affected rights of subcontractor to payment for excavations so made below grade line.

2. Contracts ⚡231(2)—Subcontractor held entitled to recover in accordance with his contract, regardless of principal contractor's rights against county.

Subcontractor for road construction held entitled to recover for excavations made below grade line in placing concrete structures, pursuant to his contract with principal contractor, regardless of principal contractor's right to recover of county for such work.

3. Contracts ⚡232(4)—Subcontractor held entitled to recover of principal contractor on quantum meruit, though written order of county engineer authorizing work not made.

Subcontractor on highway held entitled to recover on quantum meruit for work authorized by county engineer apparently with principal contractor's consent, though no written order from engineer authorizing such work was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by S. G. Lisher against A. J. Fairbanks. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wallace Rutherford, of Napa, for appellant.

Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff as assignee brought this action to recover of and from the defendant, A. J. Fairbanks, the sum of $2,023.77, for certain road construction work done and performed by plaintiff's assignor, G. L. Lisher. The second amended complaint is in two counts. The first count declares upon a written contract and covers a demand of $1,979.03, and the second count is upon a quantum meruit for the recovery of $44.74 for work done on the same road, outside of the written contract. Before the trial was concluded, plaintiff was paid the sum of $1,454.11 on the amount claimed to be due under the first count, leaving in dispute a balance under that count of $502.43. Plaintiff was denied relief on both counts, and has appealed.

In September, 1920, the county of Sonoma awarded a contract to respondent for the rebuilding of section "A" of the Healdsburg-Forestville highway, which included the work of grading, filling, removal of oil from roadway, graveling, and concrete work. Subsequently, on April 1, 1921, respondent entered into a separate contract with G. L. Lisher, appellant's assignor, to do the concrete work specified in the county contract. Referring to the first count, the controversy arises over the refusal of respondent to pay for the excavation of 669.9 cubic yards of earth necessarily removed by Lisher below the adopted grade line, in order to construct the concrete drain boxes in conformity with the county plans and specifications.

Respondent's contract with the county was based upon certain unit prices, which, so far as they are important here, were as follows:

"For excavations * * * as may be necessary to bring the surface of the roadway to conform with the adopted grade and cross-section, the sum of eighty-five cents (85 cents) per cubic yard. The yardage to be paid for being only in excavation." For graveling the entire length of the road $21,315.80. "For all concrete, including all excavations, back-filling, forms, materials, reinforcement, hauling, and labor, the sum of thirty dollars ($30.00) per cubic yard in place complete. This applies to headwalls, catch basins, small culverts, etc., but does not apply to bridges and larger structures."

The "grading" section of the contract and specifications provided:

"(j) The contract price per cubic yard of excavation shall include loading * * * clearing, ditching, excavations, and removal of oil, rock, and all other work incidental to the grading as shown in paragraph (a) under 'grading.' The contractor shall be paid only for that portion of the excavation and removal of oil which lies above the adopted grade line, and shall not be paid for the excavation and removal of oil which lies below the adopted grade line."

Lisher's contract with Fairbanks, which, as before stated, covered only the concrete structures specified by the county contract, "including boxes and culvert pipe headwalls," was let upon the following unit prices:

"For concrete headwalls $26 per cubic yard. For all concrete in place $25 per cubic yard. For excavation for concrete boxes 75 cents per cubic yard."

The quotation of these prices in the contract was followed by this provision:

"All work to be done in accordance with the contract, plans, and specifications of the county of Sonoma, which are referred to and made a part of this contract, and to the satisfaction of the engineer, whose decision will be final in all matters affected by the contract which may be in dispute between the parties hereto."

Respondent's refusal to pay for the excavations in question is based upon the above-quoted limitation clause of the county contract, regarding excavations, and the reference clause of the Lisher contract which makes the county contract a part of the Lisher contract. Respondent in this respect contends, and the trial court held, that in view of these two provisions "unless Fairbanks received payment from the county for excavation claimed by plaintiff that defendant was under no obligation to pay Lisher for such excavation. In other words," says respondent, "the trial court held that because Fairbanks was not paid for excavations below the adopted grade line, Fairbanks need not pay Lisher for excavations below the grade line."

[1, 2] We are unable to acquiesce in that view of the situation. In the first place, the assumption by respondent and by the trial court that the county contract made no provision for the payment to Fairbanks for excavations made below the grade line in placing the concrete structures, and that Fairbanks was not paid therefor, is not borne out by the plain terms of that contract which show clearly that the clause restricting payment in the matter of excavations, which respondent seeks to enforce against appellant, applies exclusively to the grading feature of the contract with which appellant had nothing to do, and has no connection whatever with that section of the contract dealing with the concrete work. The matter of excavations for concrete structures was separately specified in the contract, the payment for which was included in the unit price of $30 a cubic yard for all concrete work, the contract reading:

"For all concrete work, including all excavations * * * the sum of thirty dollars ($30.00) per cubic yard in place complete."

Furthermore, the evidence shows that the total amount of Lisher's demand against respondent for placing the concrete structures, exclusive of the excavations in question, was, under the unit prices of the Lisher contract, $10,711.30, and with the cost of the excavations added amounted to $11,236.22; whereas for the same work respondent's total demand against the county under the county contract, computed according to the unit price stated therein of $30 a cubic yard "for all concrete work including all excavations," amounted to $12,777, showing a profit on Lisher's work of $1,540.78, even though he is required to pay the Lisher excavation demand herein sued upon. But irrespective of the question of whether or not the county contract allowed respondent pay for the particular work in dispute, it is manifest, that so far as Lisher's compensation from respondent was concerned, it was fixed and must be determined by the terms of their own contract. The county contract was unquestionably made a part of the Lisher contract, but obviously for the sole purpose of specifying the concrete work to be done, its location, and the manner of doing it; otherwise it had no relation whatever to the Lisher contract, particularly regarding the matter of compensation. The pay that each contractor was to receive was fixed by the terms of his own contract and was based upon entirely different units. The county contract specified "all concrete work, including excavations" in one unit at $30 a cubic yard, while the Lisher contract divided the concrete work into three units as follows: $26 a cubic yard for headwalls; $25 a cubic yard for "concrete in place"; and, "for all excavations for concrete boxes 75 cents per cubic yard." It thus appears that there was no limitation or restriction whatever placed in the Lisher contract as to payment for excavations, whether made from below or above the adopted grade line. Appellant is therefore entitled to payment for the full number of cubic yards of earth (669.9) Lisher admittedly excavated. The 176 cubic yards of excavations mentioned in the findings, for which appellant was paid, is shown by the evidence to refer to the work done by Lisher, outside of his contract, in excavating for a ditch, and did not relate to the concrete work.

[3] We are also of the opinion that appellant is entitled to recover the amount claimed to be due under the second count. Part of the work covered by the demand is admittedly due, Fairbanks himself having ordered it, and the remainder, for placing 12 yards of rock under a culvert, was authorized by the county engineer, apparently with respondent's consent, and for aught the record shows respondent received the benefit thereof under his contract with the county. Appellant performed the work for respondent and not for the county, and he seeks to charge the respondent and not the county therefor; consequently a written order from the engineer, authorizing the work, was not necessary the same as it would have been if the county was sought to be held liable.

WALTON v. DONOHUE. (Civ. 4961.)

1. Master and servant §316(1)—Party towing disabled car held independent contractor.

Where defendant did not attempt to state any directions to party offering to tow her disabled car, and he did not consult her nor ask for any directions or consent to be governed by any if they were given, his relationship to defendant was that of an independent contractor, and not that of an employee for whose acts defendant was liable.

2. Master and servant §330(1)—Burden of showing relation on plaintiff.

In action for death, when car in which decedent was riding was struck by car towing defendant's car, burden of showing relationship existing between defendant and party towing her car was on plaintiff.

3. Master and servant §332(1) — Nonsuit properly granted for lack of proof of relation.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when car in which he was riding was struck by a car towing defendant's car, on plaintiff's failure to introduce any proof on count alleging that such party was employed to tow defendant's car, court properly granted a nonsuit as to such count, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Anna B. Walton against Mildred T. Donohue. From an order granting a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Strother P. Walton, of Fresno, for appellant.

Myron Harris and John Jewett Earle, both of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages for personal injuries which caused the death of the minor child of the plaintiff. She framed her complaint in three counts. At the end of the plaintiff's case the trial court granted a nonsuit as to the second cause of action, and the plaintiff has appealed from that order.

On the 19th of June, 1922, Arthur M. Guenin, as the agent of John Jeel, was driving a truck from Hayward toward Fresno on the state highway in the neighborhood of Livermore. Morgan Walton, a young boy, was a guest riding on the truck with him. Guenin was sitting on the left-hand side of the seat at the steering wheel. Walton was seated on the seat on the right-hand side. At about 7:30 in the evening, at a point three or four miles east of Livermore, they were traveling on a pavement in the middle of the roadway. The pavement was 15 or 16 feet wide. At that point they had been putting patches in the pavement and had erected barricades to protect the patches until they became dry. The barricades were 3½ to 4 feet high. They were painted white. The barricades extended probably an eighth of a mile along the highway. They reached out into the highway probably about 4 feet. As Guenin was passing this territory he could see two cars approaching which he afterwards learned were the Overland and Stutz hereinafter mentioned. As near as he could tell the two cars were in about the center of the road. They were south of the barricade. Guenin testified:

"I saw those cars coming and of course I expected them to turn in and I kept going east. When I saw they did not, I kept turning out of the road more and more until my inside wheels were two feet on the pavement. I thought there was plenty of room to go by because I am a pretty good judge of distance that way. I saw the car in front hit by the rear car and it hit his car at an angle right across and in front of my left wheel on the left-hand side. It came at an angle across the pavement. My outside wheel being over the side of the bank it threw the steering wheel out of my hand and the truck upset and rolled half over right there."

The witness further testified how, as a result of the accident, Morgan Walton lost his life.

The Stutz car, mentioned by Guenin, was occupied by Mrs. Mildred T. Donohue, who had driven from a point in the neighborhood of Modesto toward Oakland until she reached a point near Altamont on the state highway. At that point her automobile developed troubles, and would not work. Mrs. Pratt, her sister, was with her in the automobile. Mrs. Pratt stopped a passerby and asked that assistance be sent to them. In reply a Mr. Johnstone came over to the machine and asked what the trouble was. Mrs. Donohue told him. She testified:

"He asked me to try and start the car, which I did. It would not go. The engine would go, but as soon as I put on the clutch, lifted the clutch out, it would stop. So he got into his machine and backed it towards my car and took a tow rope and tied our car—that is fastened our car to his. He never offered to tow us. I never spoke to him at all about it. We went some little distance very slowly. I don't think we were going over 8 or 10 miles when the collision occurred. I did not see the collision."

She further testified:

"That she was driving a Stutz machine and that the machine belonged to her and that Mrs. Pratt was her guest. There was no conversation about how much it would cost to get me towed. He said in going that at the garage they would charge me around $20 for a tow. I said it could not be helped. I did not say, as a matter of fact, it was all right; I did not say that. * * * At the coroner's inquest I did not say that I was fortunate to have the tow. He backed up to a point in front of my machine and connected the rope onto the end of my machine. The rope was about 15 or 18 feet. The distance separating the two machines was about 15 feet. Mr. Johnstone started to tow me; I did not object to his towing me. I did not get a chance, and I would not have known what to do in any event, night was coming on. He did not tow my car away from there against my will. At any rate, he backed up and attached his car to mine and I did not object. I took the wheel of my car. My car was all right with respect to everything except the clutch; we found out afterwards the master gear was broken. The wheels were all right; the steering was all right; the brakes were all right. It is correct that there was nothing the matter excepting the motor power. The application of the motor power was weak. Mr. Johnstone and I started down east, toward Oakland. After we went a little ways we came toward the portion of the road on the north-hand side which had barricades. Mr. Johnstone and I took and crossed to the south and to the left-hand side of those barricades. He was guiding his car and I was guiding mine. That course took us so that my car was just about the center of the highway, I imagine. It is a fact that the cars had to go on the wrong or left-hand side to pass the barricades—mine and Mr. Johnstone's. I did not see the truck coming up until the collision, because our car was a 1917 model, and low. We were right behind the smaller car. My eyes were on the rope. I was looking ahead low. We went along in that position while on the left-hand side of the highway; I was watching the tow. I was looking ahead at the tow rope, but I was not looking ahead of the truck coming; I could not see that and watch the tow rope. I was not looking further than the tow rope—I could not very well. I was guiding my car on the left-hand side of the highway."

On cross-examination the witness stated:

"My machine, the Stutz, did not run into the Overland automobile at any time. The Overland car was pushed back against our car. It was pushed back by the truck. It was shoved back against my car. We were to the right of the Overland."

W. W. Whitton, the shorthand reporter who reported the proceedings at the coroner's inquest, was called as a witness, produced his notes and testified that at the coroner's inquest the defendant testified:

"I remember on the evening of June 19th, of witnessing an accident in which accident an automobile and a truck collided. I was driving the machine that was being towed. Mr. Johnstone was driving the other machine—was towing it. As we came out to Altamont my machine stopped. The clutch seemed to be grasping and I turned off and stopped right opposite the garage there. The garage was closed. I went across the street and asked, and the man said they had no phone. So this car came along. We stopped them and asked them if they would please send back a man from the garage. He asked what was the matter with the machine. I told him I did not know, but it wouldn't go; the clutch kept grabbing. He asked me to start the engine and he would see. So we started the engine and the machine wouldn't go, so the gentleman stepped in—his wife was driving at the time, and he had her take the other seat. He took the wheel and backed up to our machine and got his tow rope and started to tow us. He told me I was fortunate to have a tow because it would cost me $20; and I said that was all right and we started out; and there was this barricade along the side of the road, just along the edge of the highway where the lanterns were, and we went quite a distance and when we were being towed we were going very slowly because he was still in second."

[1-3] Before proceeding further, it should be stated that in the first count of the plaintiff's complaint the plaintiff charged that the defendant—

"was in charge of and was driving a motor vehicle, which said motor vehicle was being towed by a motor vehicle driven by one Johnstone; that defendant did, carelessly and negligently, drive and operate the motor vehicle which she was then so operating, and that as a result of her wrongful act and negligence in so operating said motor vehicle, she did then and there cause the same to collide with the motor vehicle being operated by Johnstone and did cause said motor vehicle operated by said Johnstone to collide with and overturn the motor vehicle in which said Morgan Walton was a passenger. * * *

The second count charged:

"That said Johnstone was employed by defendant for towing of her said motor vehicle and she was responsible for his conduct; that at said time and place said Johnstone did carelessly and negligently drive and operate the motor vehicle which he was driving, and with which he was towing defendant's motor vehicle, and, as a result of said careless and negligent driving and operating of said automobile, said Johnstone did cause the same to collide with and overturn the motor vehicle in which said Morgan Walton was a passenger. * * *

In the third count the plaintiff alleged:

"* * * That at said time and place defendant was in charge of and was driving a motor vehicle, and one Johnstone was in charge of and was driving a motor vehicle; that defendant did carelessly and negligently operate the motor vehicle which she was driving, and Johnstone did carelessly and negligently operate the motor vehicle which he was driving; that the negligence of defendant and Johnstone did concur and said negligence so concurring did cause the automobile driven by defendant to strike the automobile driven by Johnstone, with the result then and there that the automobile driven by Johnstone did collide with and overturn the motor vehicle in which said Morgan Walton was a passenger. * * *

By a comparison of these three counts, it is patent that the effect on the plaintiff's rights of the order appealed from was to take from the jury a consideration of the question as to whether, under the evidence introduced, Johnstone was an employee of Mrs. Donohue. Both counsel have briefed the case on that theory.

Looking back over the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, it is clear that there was some conflict in the evidence as to whether, under the facts, Johnstone was acting gratuitously, for an agreed compensation, or for such compensation as the law would award him, but it is equally clear that there is not a word in the testimony showing or tending to show that Johnstone was acting as the employee of Mrs. Donohue. On the other hand, it is quite clear that he was an independent contractor, whether gratuitously or for compensation it is not necessary to determine. In Barton v. Studebaker Corp. of America, 46 Cal. App. 707, 715, 189 P. 1025, 1028, the court said:

"The real test as to whether a person is an independent contractor or a servant is whether the person alleged to be the master, under his arrangement with the other party, has or has not any authoritative control of the latter with respect to the manner in which the details of the work are to be performed, and therefore, this test or element 'must, in the last analysis, always determine what was the essential nature of the relationship between the person who performed the given work and the person for whom it was performed.' Labatt on Master and Servant, § 18, p. 56."

The rule has been stated so many times that we do not deem it necessary to attempt to cite the numerous cases. The difficulty in every case is to ascertain whether the evidence shows or does not show the elements of the rule. In this case it will be seen at a glance that the respondent did not attempt to state any direction or directions to Johnstone, and that Johnstone did not consult her nor ask for any direction or directions, or consent to be governed by any if they were given. The burden of showing the relationship existing between the respondent and Johnstone rested on the appellant. Having failed to introduce the proof on that subject it was clearly correct for the trial court to grant the motion for a nonsuit on the second count. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5.

The order granting the motion is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CLINTON et al. (Cr. 1199.)

1. Burglary ☞10—Burglary of dwelling in nighttime may constitute burglary in second degree.

Under Pen. Code, § 459, and section 430, as amended by St. 1923, p. 747, defining burglary in first and second degree, burglary of house or building in nighttime may now constitute burglary in second degree, and word "inhabited," in section 460, is applicable to building as well as dwelling house.

2. Indictment and information ☞189(7)—Jury may find defendant guilty of burglary in either first or second degree, where information sufficiently charged burglary, though not alleging building inhabited.

Although an information charging burglary did not allege whether or not building was inhabited, but it sufficiently charged crime of burglary, jury could find defendant guilty of burglary in either first or second degree, depending upon evidence.

3. Burglary — 41(1)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction of burglary in first degree.

In view of Pen. Code, § 460, as amended by St. 1923, p. 747, evidence that store was burglarized in nighttime, but failing to show that store or any part of it was inhabited, or that defendant was armed, or that any person was assaulted, held insufficient to sustain conviction of burglary in first degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

James Clinton and others were convicted of burglary of the first degree, and they appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. Defendants were jointly informed against for the crime of burglary. They were jointly tried, and convicted of burglary of the first degree. Appeal is taken from the judgment of conviction.

The information charged:

That the defendants "willfully and unlawfully did enter the store and room of Forsythe & Simpson in Burlingame, California, with the felonious intent then and there to commit the crime of larceny, all of which was then and there done by said defendants in the nighttime, contrary," etc.

[1-3] The main point of the defendants is that the judgment and verdict are void because defendants were charged with burglary of the second degree, and were found guilty of burglary of the first degree. We do not agree with this contention. Burglary is defined in sections 459 and 460, Penal Code. Section 459 provides that:

"Every person who enters any house, room, * * * or other building, * * * with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary."

Section 460, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 747), provides that:

"1. Every burglary of an inhabited dwelling house or building committed in the nighttime, and every burglary, whether in the daytime or nighttime, committed by a person armed with a deadly weapon, or who while in the commission of such burglary arms himself with a deadly weapon, or who while in the commission of such burglary assaults any person, is burglary of the first degree.

"2. All other kinds of burglary are of the second degree."

Before amendment section 460 provided that:

"Every burglary committed in the nighttime is burglary of the first degree, and every burglary committed in the daytime is burglary of the second degree."

Since the amendment, time alone does not fix the degree. We think that the word "inhabited" contained in section 460, as now constituted, is applicable to and descriptive of "building" as well as "dwelling house." It thus appears that some burglaries of a dwelling house or building in the nighttime may now, be burglaries of the second degree. The information before us does not allege whether or not the building was inhabited, but sufficiently charges the crime of burglary, under which it was competent for the jury to find the defendants guilty of burglary in either degree. People v. Barnhart, 59 Cal. 381, 383. This, of course, would depend upon the evidence adduced at the trial. In the instant case the evidence showed that a haberdasher's store was burglarized in the nighttime. But the record is barren of evidence showing, or tending to show, that the store entered was either an inhabited dwelling house or an inhabited building, or part either of an inhabited dwelling house or inhabited building. And there is nothing in the record showing that either of the defendants was armed with deadly weapons, or that any person was assaulted during the commission of the burglary. The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find the defendants guilty of burglary of the first degree."

We think it is quite clear that the evidence is wholly insufficient to support the verdict, and that, therefore, the judgment must be reversed and cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

Jesse George, of San Diego, for petitioner. Leon R. Yankwich and Luther Brown, both of Los Angeles, and J. Stewart Ross, Robt. B. Whitelaw, and Chas. L. Brown, all of El Centro, for respondents.

WORKS, J. These three proceedings, identical in character except as to one circumstance hereafter to be mentioned, are under stipulation to be determined together. A statement of a part of the allegations of the petition in one of them, No. 4801, will serve as a basis upon which disposition may be made of all.

The petition contains averments that on May 17, 1917, petitioner commenced an action against respondent Imperial Water Company No. 5 in respondent court, which action is still pending, and which has proceeded to findings and judgment, and that the action was brought for the purpose of enjoining respondent water company from permitting water from its canals to escape, seep, and percolate upon, under, and through certain lands of petitioner, to abate the canal, or the operation thereof in its present condition, as a nuisance, and to recover damages caused to petitioner's land by said percolation and seepage. The petition further alleges that the water carried in said canals, and which escapes therefrom into petitioner's lands, has at all times since May 1, 1916, been diverted and taken from its natural course in the Colorado river by respondent Imperial irrigation district for the purpose of using the same in the state of California, in the improvement and irrigation of the lands of respondent irrigation district, and that it became and was the duty of respondent irrigation district since May 1, 1916, and still is its duty, to control the waters so diverted and to prevent them from escaping into the lands of petitioner to her damage or prejudice; that since about May 1, 1916, respondent irrigation district has permitted and caused the said waters to pass into and to flow through the said canals of said water company, and to escape therefrom into the lands of petitioner, well knowing at all times since May 1, 1916, that said water was so escaping, and at all times passed and caused to be passed into said canals an amount of water in excess of the amount actually furnished the lands irrigated from said canals to cover the loss from seepage into petitioner's lands; that petitioner's lands had never been within respondent irrigation district at the time she commenced said action, and at the time it was tried; and that she was ignorant of the fact that said water was diverted from the Colorado river and caused to escape from said canals by respondent irrigation district, and that respondent irrigation district was a joint tortfeasor with respondent water company, until early in July, 1924. It is further averred in the petition that before the trial and decision of said action, and on or about November 1, 1922, respondent water company sold to respondent irrigation district all of its property, including said canals; that since said sale and on or about November 1, 1922, respondent irrigation district took possession of all of said property so sold, including said canals, and has ever since November 1, 1922, operated said canals and continued, and yet continues to cause said water to pass by seepage into petitioner's lands, and to keep and maintain said canals as a nuisance to petitioner in all respects as before said sale; that respondent water company is about to disincorporate; and that because thereof any judgment obtained by petitioner against said company in said action will be ineffective and valueless, and will afford petitioner no relief whatever, unless respondent irrigation district is made a party defendant in said action, and judgment be had against it. The petition also alleges that petitioner served upon respondent water company, as defendant in said action, and filed with respondent court a notice of motion to be permitted to file therein an amended and supplemental complaint, setting forth the allegations above stated, and showing the connection of respondent irrigation district with the diversion of said water, the purchase and possession of said property and canals, and the permitting said water to escape into petitioner's lands, and making respondent irrigation district a party defendant in said action, praying that it be brought in as such defendant, and that judgment be had against it, enjoining it from operating said canals in their present condition as a nuisance and for damages; that said motion was set for hearing before respondent court on July 25, 1924; that the same was heard on that day by one of respondent judges, against the objection of petitioner, and was by him on July 26, 1924, overruled and denied. The petition then sets up allegations intended to show that each of the judges of respondent court is disqualified to try said action, or to conduct any proceedings therein because of financial interest in the affairs and property of respondent irrigation district. The petition further alleges that on August 28, 1923, and after a trial of said action, one of the judges of respondent court caused to be entered in the minutes of the court his decision in said action, denying petitioner's prayer for an injunction, but awarding her judgment for damages in the sum of $900, and that thereafter findings and judgment carrying the decision into effect were signed and filed; that thereafter petitioner filed with respondent court her notice of intention to move for a new trial of said action; that thereafter and on or about July 9, 1924, she served and filed in said action her written objections to either of the judges of respondent court sitting or acting further therein, or hearing or deciding her motion for a new trial thereof, or hearing or deciding her motion for leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint therein; that on July 25 and 26, 1924, one of the judges of respondent court heard said objections, and on July 26, 1924, denied and overruled the same; that petitioner's motion for a new trial of said action has been set for hearing on August 15, 1924, and that, unless restrained and prohibited by this court, one of the judges of respondent court will then hear and decide the same. The petition then alleges particular facts intended to show that each of the judges of respondent court is disqualified by financial interest to hear or decide said motion for a new trial. The petitions in each of the three proceedings are identical in legal effect, except that no notice of intention to move for a new trial has been filed in the action which is the basis for the petition in No. 4810. In each of the proceedings an alternative writ of prohibition, upon prayer therefor, was issued, restraining respondent court and respondent judges from taking further steps in the respective actions, and the three matters are now before us for a determination of the question whether peremptory writs shall issue.

The briefs before us are voluminous; a large portion of them being devoted to a discussion of the question whether respondent judges are disqualified in the actions pending in respondent court, and to a discussion of the validity of the past action of one of the judges in denying leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint. Other questions of which we shall not specifically state the nature are also debated vigorously. It is unnecessary to decide any of the points stated, either specifically or generally, in this paragraph, as other questions, which we shall now briefly discuss precede them in a consideration of the proceedings—questions which close the door upon all others which are presented and argued.

[1-3] Petitioner seeks to prohibit each of the judges of respondent court from hearing or deciding her motion for a new trial of two of the cases pending before the court. Section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The power of the court to pass on motion for new trial shall expire within two months after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of the entry of the judgment. If such motion is not determined within said two months, the effect shall be a denial of the motion without further order of the court."

The petition here does not show whether or not a notice of entry of the judgment in the causes pending in respondent court was ever given, but it does allege that notices of intention to move for a new trial were served and filed. In this state of the petition we shall assume that notice of the entry of judgment was given before the filing of the notices of intention, for the burden is clearly upon petitioner to show by her petition a right to the writ for which she asks. In other words, it is incumbent upon her to show that some matter is actually pending in respondent court which that court threatens to pass upon. Under the assumption just made the dates which we have stated above clearly show that respondent court long ago lost its jurisdiction to dispose of the motions for a new trial, and that the motions have long since been denied by operation of section 660. In this regard, therefore, there is no threatened action of respondent court upon which the writ of prohibition may operate.

[4, 5] There appears to be no proceeding or matter pending in respondent court in any of the actions which are the subject, respectively, of the petitions before us, over which the court threatens to exercise, or over which it could exercise jurisdiction. None of the petitions shows us that any matters are pending which under the law lead up to the perfecting of appeals or to the making of a record on appeal, such, for instance, as the settling of a bill of exceptions or the certifying of a reporter's transcript of the evidence under what is known as the alternative method of appeal. In fact, it is said in petitioner's closing brief:

"The petitioner has yet the right to move in the court below to have the judgments set aside as void for matters not appearing on their face; a hearing must be had upon such motion, and, from the decision thereon, an appeal lies, and if an appeal is taken the record must be made up, approved and certified; all of which calls for judicial action. * * * This is a remedy open to us and the only remedy left, if our motion for a new trial must be deemed denied and our right of appeal from the judgments gone. And, unless a peremptory writ is issued herein, we will have to present such a motion before the disqualified judges, who have already declared that they are not disqualified. Manifestly we would have to come here again for a writ to prohibit them from hearing such a motion unless they are prohibited from any further action by peremptory writ now."

This argument furnishes no reason for the issuance of the writ sought in these proceedings. We cannot assume, as a support for the present applications, that petitioner will make the motion suggested by her, or that, if she does make it, respondent judges will threaten to pass upon it. The writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent action upon proceedings the birth of which may be prophesied by imagination or hope.

[6] Petitioner asks us to exercise our undoubted jurisdiction to issue any writ to which a petition may show that a petitioner is entitled, if he shall in his prayer ask for the wrong writ. We do not deem it necessary to state why, in our opinion, her petitions fail to show grounds for the issuance of either the writ of mandate or the writ of review. It is manifest to us that petitioner fails to show a right to either remedy.

In each of these proceedings the alternative writ of prohibition is vacated and a peremptory writ is denied.

JONES v. BUCK, Judge, et al. (Civ. 2934.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 82(1)—Order relieving appellants' tardiness in presenting bill of exceptions appealable.

Order, after final judgment for plaintiff, made under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473, relieving defendant from its failure to present its bill of exceptions within allotted time, is an appealable order under section 963.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 441—Purported settling of bill of exceptions after appeal from order relieving default of appellant invalid.

Order purporting to settle bill of exceptions is invalid, where it is entered after notice of appeal from previous order relieving appellant from his failure to file bill of exceptions within time.

Petition for writ of review by Ruth Jones against Hon. George F. Buck, Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of San Joaquin, and others, to annul an order settling a bill of exceptions. Writ granted.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is a petition for a writ of review whereby the petitioner seeks the judgment of this court setting aside and annulling a certain order made and entered by the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, Hon. George F. Buck, presiding, on the 16th day of February, 1924, in an action then pending before said court, entitled "Ruth Jones, Plaintiff, v. Southern Pacific Company, a Corporation, et al., Defendants, No. 16266."

[1] The pleadings show the following facts: On the 8th day of November, 1923, a judgment was entered in said superior court in favor of the plaintiff in an action entitled, "Ruth Jones, Plaintiff, v. Southern Pacific Company, a Corporation, et al., Defendants;" that the respondent, Southern Pacific

Company, thereafter gave notice of its appeal, and the time within which it should have prepared and served its proposed bill of exceptions lapsed prior to the 14th day of January, 1924; that on January 14, 1924, the said superior court, upon application therefor by the respondent, Southern Pacific Company, made and entered its order relieving the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, in said action from its default and failure to present its bill of exceptions within the time allowed by law, and then and there permitted the defendant in said action, respondent in this, Southern Pacific Company, to file its said bill of exceptions; that thereafter, and on the 24th day of January, 1924, the petitioner herein (the plaintiff in said action against the Southern Pacific Company) duly served and filed in said court in said cause her notice of appeal, whereby it appealed from the order of said superior court so made and entered on the 14th day of January, 1924, to the Supreme Court of the state of California; that thereafter, and after said appeal by the plaintiff in said action (the petitioner in this), the said superior court, on the 16th day of February, 1924, made and entered in said cause its order settling said bill of exceptions presented by the Southern Pacific Company, the defendant in said action, and the respondent in this, said order being as follows:

"The within and foregoing bill of exceptions is hereby settled and allowed as a bill of exceptions of the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, on its appeal from the judgment made, given and entered in the above-entitled action. Dated this 16th day of February, 1924. [Signed] George F. Buck, Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the county of San Joaquin."

It is the validity of this last order that is called in question herein. The facts which we have stated show that it was made some days after the petitioner in this proceeding, the plaintiff in the action in which the order was made, had appealed from the order of the said superior court setting aside the default of the defendant in said action, the respondent in this, upon proceedings based on section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore made and entered at a date when such matters were no longer within the jurisdiction of the trial court. The order just referred to was an order after final judgment, and, under the terms and provisions of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is an appealable order.

[2] The questions presented by the petition herein are effectually disposed of by the following cases: Jackson v. Dolan, 58 Cal. App. 372, 208 P. 315, and Wolcott v. Hudner, 44 Cal. App. Dec. 544, 228 P. 46. In Jackson v. Dolan, supra, in considering the effect of an appeal from an order granting a new trial, the law is thus stated:

"An appeal from an order granting a new trial has the effect of removing from the jurisdiction of the trial court the subject matter of the judgment or order appealed from, including all questions going to the validity or correctness of such judgment or order, and the trial court thereafter is without authority to vacate or set aside that order."

In Wolcott v. Hudner, supra, a writ of mandate was sought to compel the trial court to perform the very act, the validity of which is questioned in this case, and the following was the holding of the court in that case, quoting from the syllabus:

"An order granting relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, from the effect of the failure of an appellant to give the clerk timely notice of his intention to appeal and of his request for a reporter's transcript is not one of the orders mentioned in sections 942-945 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and an appeal from such order had the effect of staying all proceedings below upon the * * * order appealed from."

Basing our judgment upon this case, it must be held that upon the filing of her notice of appeal from the order made by the superior court, in the case then pending in said court, wherein the petitioner was plaintiff and the respondent defendant, on the 14th day of February, 1924, relieving the defendant from its default, the trial court thereafter had no jurisdiction to proceed further in the matter of settling the bill of exceptions tendered by the respondent in this proceeding, the defendant in said action, and that any order thereafter made purporting so to do must be adjudged of no validity. Upon the hearing hereof, the respondent requested that the decision of this matter be delayed until the appeal from the order made and entered by the superior court, relieving the defendant from its default, could be presented, but we do not see how such proceedings would in anywise expedite the final determination of the cause entitled Ruth Jones, Plaintiff, v. Southern Pacific Company, a Corporation, et al., herein referred to, for the reason that though this court might determine that the default of the defendant was properly set aside, the settling of the bill of exceptions, however, would necessarily, under the authorities which we have cited, have to be adjudged void, and the final hearing of the cause then continued until a bill of exceptions could be legally presented.

It follows that the writ of review must be granted and the order of the trial court, made and entered on the 16th day of February, 1924, hereinbefore set forth, purporting to settle the bill of exceptions in the cause referred to, must be and is hereby annulled.

Action by A. Sprague and another against J. L. Dolan. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goldman, Nye & Surr, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gerald C. Halsey and Frederic T. Leo, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action to recover a judgment for commissions alleged to have been earned as brokers in making a sale of an apartment house for the defendant. The case was tried by the trial court sitting without a jury. Judgment went for the plaintiffs as prayed, and the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Prior to March 30, 1923, the defendant held a lease on an apartment house at number 2402 California street in San Francisco. The furnishings therein were owned by him. The lease had nearly expired and had but a short time to run. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs applied to the defendant for authority to negotiate a sale of the defendant's interests. After some bartering, an authorization was executed in writing giving the authority for the period of five days from March 30, 1923. March 30, 1923, was Friday and the last day under the terms of the contract therefore was Wednesday, April 4, 1923. The price named in the authorization was $11,000, and the commission agreed upon was 5 per cent. The client of the plaintiffs was Mr. La Lanne. Mrs. Sprague took him to see the property on March 30, 1923. He made an examination of the whole. Then followed bartering as to the price to be paid. Mr. La Lanne wanted the property at $10,000. The defendant would not consent to modify the price above mentioned, $11,000. No written contract was ever executed between the owner and the purchaser. Mr. La Lanne never told the defendant nor the defendant's wife that he would pay $11,000, never tendered that sum, never applied for transfer papers, and never directly held any communication with the defendant or his wife, except as above mentioned. Mrs. Sprague testified that La Lanne stated to her that he would pay the $11,000, and that she telephoned that fact to Mrs. Dolan on Monday, April 2, 1923.

On the trial of the case the plaintiff called as a witness Mr. La Lanne. He testified that he was ready and willing and financially able to pay $11,000; that he did not sign any contract for $11,000, but he just agreed that he would pay $11,000, because Mr. Dolan at one time was ready to sell for $10,000, and it wasn't up to the witness to offer $11,000 when the owner was ready to sell it for ten.

[1-3] The respondent contends that the foregoing facts made a sufficient showing that the plaintiffs had obtained a purchaser ready, able, and willing to make the purchase on the terms agreed upon in their written authorization. In this behalf they call attention to another fact that was developed in the evidence. On Saturday, March 31, 1923, some one communicated with the defendant, asking the defendant if he would entertain the proposition of purchasing the new lease which had just been executed. Thereafter the defendant continued to pursue the subject-matter of that communication and later he did purchase the new lease. When that purchase was made does not appear, but the record discloses that on Monday, April 2, 1923, Mrs. Sprague had heard of the attempt that was being made to sell to the defendant the new lease, and that when she called on the defendant she contented herself with informing him that La Lanne had agreed to pay $11,000, and that if the defendant bought the new lease that she would hold the defendant for her commission. In this connection Mrs. Sprague testified that she had seen the assignment of a new lease to Mr. and Mrs. Dolan, and that her attorney, Mr. Halsey, had called that fact to the attention of the Dolans. Thereupon the respondents contended that the owners neglected to accept the offer of La Lanne, because they had purchased the new lease and not because La Lanne had declined to pay $11,000. We are unable to follow the respondents in this contention. Mr. Dolan continuously testified that he was at all times willing to accept $11,000 for his interest. The matter of the purchase of the new lease was a false issue. Perhaps it was an altogether advantageous transaction to sell furnishings that had become worn and damaged and later refurnish the house upon the commencement of the new lease. However, be this as it may, the purchaser never made his offer of performance within the time, method, or manner provided by law (Civ. Code, §§ 1485-1497), nor was there any showing of prevention of performance.

Before the respondents were entitled to recover in a case where no sale was actually made, it was incumbent on them to prove that they found a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy the property on the terms fixed, and either that they procured from that person a valid contract binding him to purchase the property upon those terms, or that they brought the vendor and the proposed purchaser together so that the vendor might have secured such a binding contract. Moreover, the readiness and willingness of a person to purchase the property can be shown only by an offer on his part to purchase; and unless he has actually entered into a contract binding him to purchase, or has offered to the vendor, and not merely to the broker, to enter into such contract, he cannot be considered a purchaser. Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 519, 39 P. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87. The rule stated in that case has been cited with approval in many cases. Mott v. Minor, 11 Cal. App. 774, 780, 106 P. 244; Massie v. Chatom, 163 Cal. 772, 776, 127 P. 56; Hicks v. Christeson, 174 Cal. 712, 717, 164 P. 395; McCoy v. Zahn Corporation, 183 Cal. 191, 196, 191 P. 20.

It follows that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

PEOPLE v. MARTIN. (Cr. 1104.)

1. Criminal law § 395—Refusal to suppress evidence taken without search warrant held not erroneous.

In prosecution for violation of State Poison Act, court did not err in refusing to suppress certain evidence claimed to be property of defendant, taken from him at the time of his arrest without a search warrant.

2. Criminal law § 1083—Jurisdiction of motion to suppress evidence held not lost by trial court.

In prosecution for violation of State Poison Act, trial court did not lose jurisdiction to further consider motion by defendant to suppress the evidence because district attorney stated in open court that people appealed from trial court's grant of such motion, where additional affidavits were subsequently filed, and trial court's announcement was not final.

3. Criminal law § 582—Continuance not ground for complaint by fugitive from justice.

Defendant could not complain that hearing on his demurrer was continued from time to time, where during those times he was a fugitive from justice.

4. Criminal law § 1134(10)—Forfeiture of bail not reviewable on appeal from conviction.

Error was not predicable on court's action in ordering defendant's bail to be forfeited for nonappearance, since, if error, it was in regard to matters not involved in case on trial in such a manner as to be error that could be reviewed on an appeal of a judgment of conviction.

5. Indictment and information § 114—Information pleading two prior convictions held not defective.

Information, in prosecution for violation of State Poison Act, pleading two prior convictions, and not disclosing that Pen. Code, § 969, was not followed, held not defective.

6. Criminal law § 1130(2)—Assignment of error to refusal to instruct on plea of former acquittal held insufficient.

Assignment of error, based on court's refusal to give instruction on plea of former acquittal, cannot be considered, where counsel does not refer to any evidence showing former acquittal of charge on trial.

7. Indictment and information § 144—Trial court's action on motion to dismiss discretionary.

Trial court's action on motion to dismiss a criminal prosecution, under Pen. Code, § 1385, is discretionary.

8. Jury § 66(1)—Error not shown, because names of all jurors not in jury box when case called for trial.

Error was not shown, because, when criminal case was called for trial, names of all jurors on panel were not in jury box, where no challenge to panel was interposed, and defendant's objection was only that all list of jurors be in box before any name was called of any juror.

9. Criminal law § 829(1)—Refusal of instructions already given does not constitute error.

Refusal to give requested instructions does not constitute error, where they are fully and completely covered by instructions given by court.

10. Criminal law — 1130(2)—Assignments of error to instructions held insufficient.

Error was not predicable on giving of instructions, where it was not pointed out in what respect they were erroneous, nor were assignments of error supported by authority.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

John Martin was convicted of violating an act regulating the sale of poisons, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was convicted of a felony, to wit, the violation of an act to regulate the sale of poisons in the state of California. St. 1907, p. 124. He made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment and order.

[1] The information was filed on the 21st day of March, A. D. 1921. On the 22d of April, 1921, the defendant filed affidavits and therein asked for an order setting aside the information and an order restoring to him certain things claimed to be his property. In the affidavits the defendant set forth certain facts tending to support the claim that about the time of his arrest the properties mentioned were taken from him by certain officers who had not thereunto been duly authorized by virtue of a search warrant first had and obtained. Having asserted such facts, the defendant thereupon based the claim that his constitutional rights had been invaded; that he had not been legally committed by a magistrate; and that the articles of property could not legally be used against him in evidence on the trial of the case in the superior court. In his brief the appellant treats the whole matter under points 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. His attack raises a question as to a rule of evidence and, secondly, a question as to a rule of practice. As to the properties being used in evidence against the defendant, the question is no longer an open one in the state of California. In the case of People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 237, commencing at page 251 (205 P. 441) the court said:

"The right of one whose goods have been unlawfully seized to recover their possession, and that, irrespective of its effect in depriving the state of their use in evidence, is not disputed; but the contention, which we think is maintained by the great weight of authority, is that the proceeding for such recovery is independent of the criminal proceeding in which it is sought to use such articles as evidence. Even conceding the right to demand such recovery by motion before the court in which such criminal action is pending, as is apparently the rule in the federal courts, and as recognized in some of the state decisions (People v. Kinney, 185 N. Y. S. 645; State v. Peterson, 27 Wyo. 185 [13 A. L. R. 1284, 194 P. 342]), upon what theory can it be held that such proceeding is an incident of the trial, in such a sense that the ruling thereon goes up on appeal as part of the record and subject to review by the appellate court? It seems to us rather an independent proceeding to enforce a civil right in no way involved in the criminal case. The right of the defendant is not to exclude the incriminating documents from evidence, but to recover the possession of articles which were wrongfully taken from him. That right exists entirely apart from any proposed use of the property by the state or its agents."

It seems clear, therefore, that the trial court did not err in refusing to suppress the evidence.

[2] When the motion was made, it was presented in part, and then numerous other hearings were had, and numerous continuances were had. With much patience the trial court listened to argument from both sides and allowed both counsel the privilege at different times of introducing affidavits, to the end that the respective contentions of the parties should be fully before the court. At one time, May 18, 1921, the trial court made a statement to the effect that the motion was granted and thereafter the district attorney stated in open court that the people appealed. The appellant now contends that, from the moment the district attorney stated in open court that the people appealed, the trial court lost all jurisdiction to further consider the motion to set aside the information. These matters, however, must be considered in the light of the whole record, and there is an abundance of evidence in the record to show that the announcement made by the trial court was not by that court intended to be a final disposition of the motion, and, furthermore, that the district attorney waived and intended to waive his oral notice of appeal, and that such course was known to and accepted by the defendant. True it is that at certain times the defendant asserted his contention in the trial court in the same way that he has asserted it in this court. True it is that the district attorney did not formally state that his notice of appeal was inadvertently given, nor attempt, except in the manner hereinafter stated, to withdraw the same, but it is equally true that, without any reservation of rights on the part of either of the litigants, they proceeded to argue the motion on questions of law and on questions of fact and continued to do so on various days until the 4th day of June, 1921, at which time the trial court made a formal order vacating the order theretofore made by it setting aside the information. As stated, the oral notice of appeal was given on May 18th, but on May 20th the appellant served and filed additional affidavits, and on that date and on other dates the defendant's attorney did, without objection on his part, appear in the trial court, and argue in extenso the merits of his principal motion.

[3] The defendant filed a demurrer. It was set for hearing August 23, 1921. On the date last mentioned the defendant was not present in court and the trial court ordered a bench warrant issued to bring him before the court. At the same time the hearing on the demurrer was continued to August 27, 1921. Thereafter the hearing was again continued from time to time. During all those times the defendant was a fugitive from justice. He now complains of the continuances as errors. The point is without merit.

[4] On September 6th, the defendant not having appeared in person, the court ordered defendant's bail forfeited. The appellant assigns the order as an error. Whether it was or not, the error was in regard to matters not involved in the case on trial in such a manner as to be an error that can be reviewed on an appeal from a judgment of conviction, or the defendant's appeal from the motion denying him a new trial.

[5] The information pleaded two prior convictions. The appellant does not point out to us that the pleading in any way violated section 969 of the Penal Code. An examination of the information does not disclose that the provisions of that section were not followed. We think the pleading was not defective.

[6] The defendant entered a plea of not guilty, of former jeopardy, of former acquittal, and of former conviction of the same offense. After the evidence had been closed, and after the trial court had finished instructing the jury, the defendant's attorney asked the trial court to give an instruction on the matter of the plea of former acquittal. The court did not do so and its refusal is assigned as error. However, counsel does not call to our attention any evidence showing, or tending to show, that he ever had a former acquittal of the charge on trial.

[7] On October 23, 1922, the defendant's counsel made a motion to dismiss the action under section 1385 of the Penal Code, and in support of the motion counsel tendered and read in evidence his own affidavit. The court denied the motion. The action of the trial court on such a motion is discretionary. Nothing is shown to us indicating that in this particular case the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant the motion.

[8] When the case was called for trial, the names of all of the jurors on the panel were not in the jury box. No challenge to the panel was interposed, but just before the names were drawn out of the box the attorney for the appellant, in open court, stated that he would ask "that all the list of the jurors be in the box before any name is called of any juror. * * *" Notwithstanding that remark, the trial court proceeded, and the clerk drew out 12 names, and the trial proceeded. The defendant has shown no authority sustaining the practice followed by him, neither has he shown any fact showing any error, or that the error, if any, was prejudicial.

[9] The defendant asked and the trial court refused to give certain instructions. Those rulings are covered by points 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33. Each and every one of the instructions so referred to and so refused was fully and completely covered by other instructions given by the court. Excepting to assign such refusals as error, the defendant has not in any way shown or attempted to show any error on the part of the trial court in refusing to give any one of said instructions.

[10] Under points 34, 35, and 36 the defendant assigns the giving of certain instructions as error. However, he does not point out in what respect any of the instructions was erroneous, nor does he give, or attempt to give, any authority supporting him on these assignments. His mode of treatment in briefing is identically the same as in his attack on the order refusing his motion for a new trial. If counsel is unable to locate the error, he need not expect the court to do so for his client. In People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, at page 309, 67 P. 770, 771, the court said:

"It is due to this court from the members of the bar to point out clearly and concisely the rulings complained of as erroneous and the reasons why they are so, with reference to authorities, if any. In case counsel will not take the trouble to do so, we shall deem the matter as of not sufficient importance to merit notice in an opinion. People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 297."

We find no error in the record.

The judgment and order are both affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BRANNON. (Cr. 1121.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 13, 1924.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
Feb. 9, 1925.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 195(1)—Constitutional and statutory provisions against double jeopardy refer to crime or "offense" as distinguished from the act or transaction in which offense was committed.

Under Const. art. 1, § 13, providing that a person shall not be twice placed in jeopardy for the same offense, it is the identity of the offense or crime charged, and not of the act, which determines whether a subsequent prosecution is double jeopardy; the word "offense" under this provision and under Pen. Code, § 1017, subd. 3, meaning crime, not the act or transaction in which the crime was committed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Offense.]

2. Criminal law $\S$ 196—Test as to "former jeopardy," stated.

Where the plea of former jeopardy is urged, there is not an identity of offense because evidence adduced on the second charge would be sufficient to convict the prisoner on the first charge, but the true test is: Could the defendant have been convicted upon the first indictment upon proof of the facts alleged in the record of the second indictment?

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Jeopardy (In Criminal Law).]

3. Criminal law $\S$ 200(8)—Conviction or acquittal on former charge immaterial as affecting plea of former jeopardy, the pleas of "autrefois convict" and "autrefois acquit" being in legal effect the same.

Where two or more persons are injured by a single criminal act, there are as many separate and distinct offenses as there were persons injured by the unlawful act, and as affecting the plea of former jeopardy it matters not whether a trial for one of such offenses resulted in a conviction or acquittal; there being no difference between pleas of "autrefois convict" and "autrefois acquit."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Autrefois Acquit; Autrefois Convict.]

4. Criminal law $\S$ 200(8)—Acquittal of assault with intent to kill wife held not to bar prosecution for murder of bystander killed in the attempted assault.

Defendant, who in attempting to kill his wife shot and killed another person, cannot successfully plead his acquittal of assault to kill wife in bar of a subsequent prosecution for murder of the person he killed, under Pen. Code, § 654, declaring that acts or omissions punishable under different provisions of the act can be punished only under one, particularly in view of section 954, authorizing conviction of two or more different offenses connected in their commission.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1167(5)—Refusal to receive plea of former jeopardy not prejudicial where facts on which predicated did not constitute such jeopardy.

No prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in refusing to receive a plea of former jeopardy where, had such plea been received, the facts on which it was predicated would not have shown former jeopardy.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1130(2)—Failure to specify in briefs reasons why appellant deems rulings on instructions erroneous held to obviate necessity of review.

Suggestions of error as to the giving of instructions in a murder trial do not require review, where appellant's counsel not only neglects to clearly and concisely point out the rulings complained of as erroneous, but fails to state in his brief the reasons why he deems them erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Barney Brannon was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. Hahn and Wm. M. Morse, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree and was sentenced to imprisonment for the term of his natural life. From the judgment and an order refusing him a new trial he appeals. His principal point is that he was formerly acquitted of the same offense but that he was denied an opportunity to plead such former acquittal.

The facts necessary to an understanding of appellant's chief contention are these: By an indictment containing two counts defendant was charged, in count 1, with an assault with a deadly weapon upon his wife, Helen Brannon, with intent to commit murder, and in count 2 with the murder of one Margaret Cronin. To both counts defendant interposed the plea of "not guilty." He thereupon moved for a separate trial upon each count. His motion was granted, and the district attorney elected to try him first upon count one. That trial resulted in a verdict of acquittal. On the day set for his trial on the second count defendant moved the court for permission to withdraw his plea of "not guilty" to that count and to enter a plea of once in jeopardy and former acquittal. The motion was made with reasonable diligence after the verdict of acquittal on the first count. The court denied the motion, and thereupon defendant offered as an additional plea that of former acquittal. This offer the court refused to accept. The court thereupon proceeded with the trial of the murder charge set forth in the second count, with the result that defendant was convicted of the murder of Mrs. Cronin.

Margaret Cronin was killed by a bullet discharged from defendant's pistol. But one shot was fired. The scene of the homicide was a room in the city of Los Angeles. The only persons present at the time of the shooting were the defendant, his wife, and the deceased. According to defendant's version of the circumstances attending the killing, the pistol was accidentally discharged during a friendly scuffle and while Mrs. Cronin, with her hand in defendant's pocket, had hold of the weapon. The prosecution introduced evidence which tended to support the theory that defendant went to the room intending to kill his wife, and that unlawfully, with malice aforethought and with intent to slay Mrs. Brannon, he deliberately fired the shot at his wife, but that the bullet struck Mrs. Cronin instead, killing her. This theory is borne out by a letter, introduced by the prosecution, which was written by defendant and addressed to his wife shortly before he went to the scene of the homicide. Indeed, the jury, at the people's request, was specifically instructed that where a person deliberately, and with premeditated malice, attempts to kill one person but by mistake or inadvertence kills another instead, the law transfers the intent from the object of his assault and the homicide so committed is murder. This instruction unquestionably embodies the theory upon which the case was presented to the jury by the district attorney.

From the foregoing it will be seen that, although defendant originally pleaded "not guilty," he moved for permission to interpose the plea of former acquittal as soon as practicable after the advent of those facts which he claims constituted a former acquittal on the murder charge; also, that, according to the prosecution's theory of the homicide, there was but one act, i. e., one shot, and there likewise was but one intent and one volition. Thus there is squarely presented to us the question whether, if the killing occurred according to the people's theory of the case, defendant's acquittal on the first count was or was not an acquittal of the "same offense" for which he was subsequently tried and convicted.

[1] The prohibition of the Constitution is against putting a person twice in jeopardy for the "same offense." Article 1, § 13. See, also, Pen. Code, § 1017, subd. 3. It is the identity of the offense, and not of the act, which is referred to in the constitutional guaranty against putting a person twice in jeopardy. The Supreme Court of Ohio, in an opinion of exceptional vigor and rugged forcefulness, repudiates the tendency of some courts to construe the words "same offense" as meaning the same act or transaction. "The constitutional provision," says that court in State v. Rose, 89 Ohio St. 383, 106 N. E. 50, L. R. A. 1915A, p. 256, "uses the word 'offense.' Layman and lawyer alike understand the word 'offense' to here mean simply a crime. * * * The words 'same offense' mean same offense, not the same transaction, not the same acts, not the same circumstances or same situation. * * * It is not enough that some single element of the offense charged may have a single element of some other offense as to which the defendant had theretofore been in jeopardy, but the constitutional provision requires that it shall be the 'same offense.' * * * Numerous decisions can be cited to sustain the contention of the defendant as to his former jeopardy. Some of these decisions may be accounted for by a difference in the constitutional provisions, but more of them are accounted for by the fact that the courts have usurped the power of the lawmaker and the constitution maker and have added something to or subtracted something from the plain provisions of the laws and Constitution. * * * Courts too frequently fall into the very common error of assuming to interpret everything in the line of legal language. The utter folly and wholesale abuse of construing words that need no construction and of interpreting language that needs no interpretation has led to much of the judicial confusion and most of the irreconcilable diversity of court decisions. There can be no stability about law until there be certainty about law, and when the constitution maker or statute maker uses a plain phrase, a simple sentence and a workaday word, with a clear, simple and unmistakable meaning, it is almost criminal in a court to scramble what is simple and confuse what is clear, under the mask of its right to construe."

No question has given rise to more difficulty or conflict than that which presents itself when two or more persons are injured in person or in property by a single act. Upon this question there are two divergent lines of authority. According to one line of cases, if one act injures two or more persons there is but one offense. This doctrine has been espoused by the courts of Connecticut, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, New York, Texas, Vermont, and England. In the other line of cases the contrary view is adopted, and in them it is held that if, for example, an assault be committed upon two or more persons by the one discharge of a firearm, the assault, although committed by but one single act, is in law a separate crime as to each of the persons assaulted, and a prosecution for the crime committed as to one of the persons so assaulted is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for the assault upon the others. The states in which the latter view has been adopted include California and also Arkansas, Kentucky, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia. The jurisdictions which respectively fall within these two divergent lines of authority are given by the learned author of Van Fleet's Former Adjudication, who, in volume 2, § 622, of that work, says:

"If several persons are injured in person or property by the same act, it is held in Connecticut, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, New York, Ohio, Texas, Vermont and England that there is but one offense; but the contrary is ruled in Arkansas, California, Kentucky, New York (probably intended for North Carolina), South Carolina and Virginia; while in Massachusetts it is decided that the state may elect to prosecute for one or for several offenses."

The view adopted by the first-mentioned line of cases is well illustrated by the ruling of the Texas court in Spanell v. State, 83 Tex. Cr. R. 423, 203 S. W. 357, 2 A. L. R. 593—a case upon which appellant places much reliance. There it is said that if two persons be killed by the same act, as, for example, by the single discharge of a firearm or by one stroke of a knife or other similar weapon, and there is but one intent and one volition, there is but one crime; and if the defendant be convicted or acquitted for the killing of one of the persons, he cannot be convicted for the killing of the other.

[2] The doctrine enunciated by the other line of cases is illustrated by the decision of our own Supreme Court in People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 3 P. 597, 52 Am. Rep. 295, where the court, after an exhaustive review of the authorities, lays down what we understand to be the established rule in this state. There the defendant had counseled and advised another to rob a certain man at his home; the emissary took with him a confederate; they found unexpectedly a friend at the home of the man to be robbed. In the attempt to carry out the robbery both the man to be robbed and his friend were killed at the same time. The defendant was convicted of murder in the case of the man who was to have been robbed, and to the indictment in the case of the friend he pleaded former conviction. The court overruled the plea, saying:

"* * * We have attempted to show that the better rule, and that established by the great weight of respectable authority, is that the murder of two persons, even by the same act, constitutes two offenses, for each of which a separate prosecution will lie, and that a conviction or acquittal in one case does not bar a prosecution in the other." (Italics ours.)

See, also, People v. Alibez, 49 Cal. 452.

In State v. Nash, 86 N. C. 650, 41 Am. Rep. 472, the court says:

"A battery is violence done to the person of another, and though there be but a single act of violence committed, yet if its consequences affect two or more persons, there must be a corresponding number of distinct offenses perpetrated."

In State v. Thurston, 12 McM. (S. C.) 382, the defendant was charged in three separate indictments which having stolen at the same time cotton belonging to three separate individuals. The act, the intent, and the volition were one and the same. The court held (quoting from the syllabus):

"That the cotton so stolen by the defendant belonged to three different individuals, and he was very properly indicted in three cases, and a conviction in one case was no bar to a conviction in the two others. The stealing of the goods of different persons is always a distinct larceny."

For an exhaustive review of the decisions bearing upon this question, see State v. Corbitt, 117 S. C. 356, 109 S. E. 133, 20 A. L. R. 328, where it was held that if the killing of several men by shots fired in rapid succession may be regarded as but a single act, nevertheless the result may constitute more than one offense, so that an acquittal on a trial for killing one will not prevent a prosecution for killing another. In that case the court, after quoting the constitutional provision, says:

"Note that the identity of the offense, and not of the act, is referred to. Hence, in order to claim the benefit of this protection it must be made to appear that the latter indictment contains a charge of the same offense of which the defendant may have previously been acquitted or convicted. From a common sense layman's view there could be no hesitation in saying that the first indictment charges the murder of Bryan Salley, one distinct crime; the second, of Julian Cooper, another distinct crime. But we are expected to throw to the winds this chart and compass, and be guided by a strained technicality of the law. The law does not compel this conclusion."

Several tests have been suggested by the courts whereby to determine when the offenses charged in two indictments are the same in "fact and law"—the same "act and crime." The test most frequently employed is that stated by Mr. Justice Buller in Rex v. Vandercomb, 2 Leach, C. C. 708, in the following language:

"Unless the first indictment were such as the prisoner might have been convicted upon it by proof of the facts contained in the second indictment, an acquittal on the first indictment can be no bar to the second."

In a criticism of this statement of the test, Mr. Freeman, in a note to People v. McDaniels, 137 Cal. 192, 69 P. 1006, 59 L. R. A. 578, 92 Am. St. Rep. 106, says:

"There are, however, cases in which proof of the facts alleged in the second indictment would not convict under the first indictment, while proof of the facts alleged in the first indictment would convict under the second charge. If, in such a case, the test, as it is usually stated, is followed, we have the manifest absurdity of two indictments which may or may not charge the 'same' offense accordingly as one is charged before or after the other."

The test as stated in Rex v. Vandercomb does not mean that there is an identity of offense simply because the proof as brought out in the evidence on the second charge will suffice to convict the prisoner on the first charge. The correct meaning of that test is stated by the North Carolina court in State v. Nash, supra, where it is said:

"The true test is as stated in Rex v. Vandercomb: Could the defendant have been convicted upon the first indictment upon proof of the facts, not as brought forward in evidence, but, as alleged in the record of the second?" (Italics ours.)

Bishop, in his work on Criminal Law (volume 1, § 1051), quoted by our Supreme Court in People v. Majors, supra, speaking of the identity of offenses, says:

"They are not the same * * * when the two indictments are so diverse as to preclude the same evidence from sustaining both."

If this test be applied to the facts of the instant case, then clearly the two offenses with which appellant was charged are not the same. For, manifestly, if appellant had been tried first upon the charge of murdering Mrs. Cronin, he could not have been convicted merely upon proof that he shot at his wife with intent to murder her. Proof that he killed Mrs. Cronin would also be required. Therefore an acquittal or conviction on the murder charge could not have been successfully pleaded by defendant in bar to the charge of assault upon his wife. In Winn v. State, 82 Wis. 571, 52 N. W. 775—a case which bears a striking analogy to the instant case, except that there the murder charge was the first to be prosecuted—the defendant attempted to kill another, and in the struggle to disarm him a third person was accidentally shot and killed. The defendant, it seems, had an altercation with one Defoy in a saloon, and was assaulted by him; he went home, secured a pistol, and returned; Defoy was on the sidewalk with others, including one Coates; the defendant snapped his pistol at Defoy, and in the struggle to disarm him the weapon was discharged, killing Coates. In its statement of the facts the court said that "the revolver was either accidentally discharged, or it was intentionally fired by Winn at Defoy"—the person whom defendant intended to slay. In holding that an acquittal on the charge of murdering Coates was no bar to a prosecution for assault upon Defoy with intent to kill, the court says:

"The special plea in bar of this prosecution sufficiently avers that the charge of the murder of Coates in the first information, and the charge of an assault with intent to murder Defoy in the present information, are predicated upon one and the same act of Winn. It is correctly argued in the plea, as it was at the bar, that if he committed the alleged felonious assault upon Defoy, and in doing so killed Coates, although unintentionally, he is guilty of murder. But the jury acquitted him of the crime of murder, and from that fact the inference is plausibly drawn that the jury must necessarily have negatived the alleged felonious assault upon Defoy, for otherwise they would have convicted Winn of the murder charge. It was very earnestly and ingeniously contended in argument by the learned counsel for Winn that in substance and legal effect such acquittal is an acquittal of the charge of felonious assault in the present information, and that by compelling the accused to trial therefor he was put twice in jeopardy of punishment for the same offense, in violation of the constitutional and statutory declaration of rights in that behalf."

The court goes on to say:

"We adopt as the law on this subject the rule laid down by Chief Justice Shaw in Comm. v. Roby, 12 Pick. 496. The rule is that the offenses charged in two indictments are not identical unless they concur both in law and in fact, and in that the plea of autrefois acquit or convict is bad if the offenses charged in the two indictments be distinct in law, no matter how closely they are connected in fact. In order to determine whether there is a concurrence in law, that is, whether a conviction or acquittal on one indictment is a good bar to a prosecution on another, the true inquiry is whether the first indictment was such that the accused might have been convicted under it by proof of the facts alleged in the other indictment. If he could not, the conviction or acquittal under the first indictment is no bar. The result of an application of this test to the present inquiry is obvious. Winn could not have been convicted [or acquitted] of the murder of Coates merely upon proof that he made a felonious assault upon Defoy. Proof that he killed Coates would also be required. Hence an acquittal on the information charging the murder of Coates is no bar to this information for a felonious assault on Defoy, and the special plea was properly overruled."

So, here, appellant, on a trial for the murder of Mrs. Cronin, could not have been acquitted or convicted merely upon proof that he had made a felonious assault upon Mrs. Brannon.

The reasoning of the court in this Wisconsin case justifies the conclusion that an acquittal of appellant upon count 2, charging him with the murder of Mrs. Cronin, had the charge in that count been the first to be brought on for trial, would not have been a bar to a prosecution upon count one, charging him with an assault upon his wife with intent to commit murder. But if an acquittal of appellant upon the murder charge would have been no bar to a prosecution of the assault charge, then, conversely, the acquittal on the assault charge cannot be a bar to this prosecution of the murder charge; for if it were, then, as was said by Mr. Freeman in his note to People v. McDaniels, supra, we would have the manifest absurdity of two counts which may or may not charge the "same" offense accordingly as one is tried before or after the other.

Vaughan v. Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 273, is a case more directly in point. There the defendant, a woman, was indicted for shooting Sally Walker, the infant daughter of Jenny Walker. She was also indicted for shooting the mother. Having been acquitted on the charge of shooting the daughter, defendant entered a plea of autrefois acquit to the indictment charging her with the shooting of the mother. On her appeal from the sentence rendered after her conviction on the latter charge, defendant claimed that the evidence disclosed that she fired the shot at the mother with intent to disfigure her, and that the shot hit both the mother and the daughter Sally. It was held that the acquittal of defendant on the charge of shooting Sally Walker was no bar to a prosecution on the charge of shooting the mother.

[3] It is probable that had appellant been convicted of the charge of assault upon his wife, instead of having been acquitted of that charge, we would have heard nothing of the plea of once in jeopardy when the murder charge came on for trial; for in that event appellant doubtless would have recognized the established doctrine in this state that where two or more are injured in their persons, though it be by a single act, yet, since the consequences affect, separately, each person injured, there is a corresponding number of distinct offenses. But it matters not whether the trial of appellant on the assault charge resulted in a conviction or an acquittal, for there is no difference between the two pleas of autrefois convict and autrefois acquit. If one of these pleas would be available under a given state of facts the other would be also; and, conversely, if one would not be available neither would the other.

Many of the decisions cited by appellant are cases where the prosecution attempted to split up one crime and prosecute it in several parts. Those cases are not applicable here. It, of course, is true that if two or more offenses arise as one result from a single act, and one of them includes within itself all the others, as murder includes manslaughter, then, if the defendant has been in jeopardy for the offense which includes the others, he has been in jeopardy as to all of the offenses; and this is often true where he has been put in jeopardy for even the lowest of the offenses. In such cases more than one offense cannot be carved out of the same unlawful act. But that is not this case. Here, if appellant shot at his wife intending to kill her but instead killed Mrs. Cronin, the act had two results, each of which was an offense of violence against the person of a separate individual. The two offenses, though resulting from the same act, were separate and distinct crimes, neither being included within the other. See Commonwealth v. Browning, 146 Ky. 770, 143 S. W. 407.

[4] Appellant calls our attention to section 654 of the Penal Code wherein it is declared that—

"An act or omission which is made punishable in different ways by different provisions, of this [act] may be punished under either of such provisions, but in no case can it be punished under more than one; an acquittal or conviction and sentence under either one bars a prosecution for the same act or omission under any other."

concisely the rulings complained of as erro-

We do not think this section has the broad sweep which appellant claims for it. We do not think it is applicable where, as here, the one act has two results each of which is an act of violence against the person of a separate individual. This section of the Penal Code has been in existence ever since the adoption of the Codes in 1872. It never has been amended. It existed in its present form at the time of the commission of the offenses which were considered by our Supreme Court in the Majors Case; and yet in that case the court, on page 146, after declaring that "the two crimes (the murder of Renowden and the murder of McIntyre), although committed at one time and by the same act, are entirely different in their elements, and the evidence required to convict in the one case very different from that essential to a conviction in the other," goes on to say that a separate prosecution would lie for each offense, and that a conviction or acquittal in one case would not bar a prosecution in the other. Indeed, it is now provided by our Penal Code (section 954, as amended in 1915) that, under separate counts of the same indictment or information, the defendant may be charged with "two or more different offenses connected together in their commission," and that "the defendant may be convicted of any number of the offenses (so) charged."

[5] Our conclusion from the foregoing is that appellant suffered no prejudice by reason of the court's refusal to permit him to plead former acquittal or once in jeopardy.

[6] It is suggested that the court erred in giving certain instructions and likewise in refusing certain instructions requested by appellant; but since he has not seen fit to state any reasons for the suggestion, the point is not so presented that it may now be considered. It is due to this court from counsel not only to point out clearly and neous, but to state in his brief the reasons why he deems them erroneous. 8 Cal. Jur. 546.

HUGHES v. DE MUND. (Civ. 4905.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 16, 1924.)

1. New trial $\S$ 116(1)—Statute relating to motion for new trial held applicable to motion preceding final, and not interlocutory, judgment.

Code Civ. Proc. § 659, providing for motion for new trial before judgment, presupposes making of ultimate findings as basis for final judgment, and does not apply to interlocutory judgments, review of all judgments or orders not final being regulated by section 936.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 80(4) — Decree for partnership accounting held not final nor appealable.

Decree that plaintiff is entitled to interlocutory judgment dissolving partnership and to accounting, final judgment to be entered in accordance with facts found on accounting, held not final nor appealable.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 110, 870(6)—Order dismissing motion for new trial held not appealable.

Order dismissing motion for new trial was in effect order denying motion, and was not appealable, but was reviewable on appeal from final judgment.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 655(2)—Bill of exceptions held not subject to motion to dismiss or strike.

Bill of exceptions is not subject to motion to dismiss or strike, because appeal is from unappealable order.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 782—Appeal from unappealable order dismissed.

Appeal from order which is not appealable does not give appellate court jurisdiction, and must be dismissed.

A. I. McCormick and Rush & McCormick, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Goodwin & Morgrage and D. E. O'Brien, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court dismissing a motion for new trial, and the respondent moves this court to dismiss the appellant's bill of exceptions upon the ground that there is no appeal from such order.

[1] The respondent filed suit praying dissolution of an alleged partnership between the parties, and an accounting, and upon the trial the lower court found that a partnership existed, and that it owned certain real estate, and that a mortgage executed between the partners was invalid; an interlocutory decree was made and entered, reciting the facts found, directing an accounting, and stating that "upon such accounting being had the court will make and cause to be entered its final decree in this matter." Said interlocutory decree was entered February 2, 1924, and on February 13, 1924, appellant served and filed a notice of intention to move for new trial; on March 13, 1924, appellant served notice that she would move the court on March 19th for a new trial; such motion was continued until April 3d, and on this latter date, before the motion was heard, respondent moved that the motion for new trial be dismissed upon the ground that the same was premature, that no accounting had been taken, and that the superior court was without jurisdiction to act upon appellant's motion. The motion for dismissal was granted, and appellant contends, first, that the judgment which was entered is not interlocutory, but final, in its nature. However, she insists that it is not material to the determination of the present appeal whether the judgment is interlocutory or final; that in either event she is entitled to have her motion for new trial presented and heard upon its merits. In this behalf it is asserted that section 659, Code of Civil Procedure, clearly provides for the making of a motion for new trial before the entry of judgment. This is true, but the judgment which that section contemplates as one which a motion for new trial may precede is a final judgment. That section and those preceding and following it, having to do with new trials presuppose that the action has been prosecuted to a point where ultimate findings have been made as the basis for a final judgment. Title 13, of part 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure regulates the method of review of all other judgments or orders than those which are made final. Sec. 936, Code Civ. Proc.

[2] In the case at bar the trial court found as conclusions of law that:

"Plaintiff is entitled to an interlocutory judgment dissolving said partnership, and decreeing that an accounting of the said partnership business be had between plaintiff and defendant, and that upon such accounting being had a final judgment in this action be entered in accordance with the facts found upon such accounting."

It was held in Clement v. Duncan, 191 Cal. 209, 215 P. 1025, that "under all the authorities such a decree is not final," and that it is not appealable.

[3] The order dismissing the motion for a new trial was in effect an order denying the motion (Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 295, 299, 75 P. 831), and it has repeatedly been held that there is no right of appeal from an order denying a motion for new trial, but that such order is reviewable upon an appeal from final judgment (Jones v. Baxter, 51 Cal. App. 589, 197 P. 361; Roberts v. Colyear, 179 Cal. 669, 180 P. 937).

[4] However, it is difficult to perceive why respondent should have moved to dismiss the bill of exceptions settled by the trial court, instead of making a motion to dismiss the appeal. No attempt is made to question the regularity of any step in the appellate procedure which resulted in bringing the matter before this court for review; in particular, no claim is made that the bill of exceptions was not regularly settled and filed on appeal. Throughout this proceeding respondent therefore admits that the appeal itself was properly perfected, but alleges, as reasons why the bill of exceptions should be dismissed, that the decree entered by the superior court was an interlocutory one and that the order denying the motion for new trial was not an appealable order. The bill of exceptions is no more subject to a motion to dismiss or to strike than would be the notice of appeal, the judgment roll, or the undertaking. It would be a useless proceeding to strike from the record any one of these, and yet leave the appeal pending.

[5] But, since it appears that the order from which the appeal has been taken is not an appealable one, this court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter thereof, and under such circumstances the appeal will be dismissed. Tingley v. Otis, 141 Cal. 71, 74 P. 448; People v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 234, 50 P. 305; Reymert v. Smith, 5 Cal. App. 380, 90 P. 470; Bienenfeld v. Fresno Milling Co., 82 Cal. 425, 22 P. 1113.

The appeal is dismissed.

HUGHES v. DE MUND. (L. A. 8386.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1924.)

1 Appeal and error 679—Respondent held to have made prima facie showing requiring dismissal of appeal.

Affidavit of counsel and certificate of clerk showing that appellant had not filed notice to prepare transcript, nor prepared nor served any proposed draft of bill of exceptions, and that no bill of exceptions had ever been certified or settled within time required by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 650, 953a, in view of sections 659, 660, 1054, held prima facie sufficient to entitle respondent to dismissal of appeal.

2. Appeal and error 607(1) — Exceptions, bill of 41(5)—Filing notice of appeal held to start time to propose bill of exceptions or file notice requesting transcript running.

Filing notice of appeal is equivalent to notice of entry of judgment, for purpose of starting time to propose bill of exceptions, or file notice requesting transcript, running, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 650, 953a.

3. Appeal and error 607(1) — Exceptions, bill of 41(5)—Appellant deemed to have notice of denial of motion for new trial by expiration of statutory period.

Where motion for new trial is automatically denied by force of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 659, 660, appellant is deemed to have notice thereof as of date of expiration of statutory period.

4. Appeal and error 607(1) — Exceptions, bill of 41(5)—Appeal from order dismissing motion for new trial does not suspend time for filing transcript on appeal from judgment.

Time for preparation of record on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 650, 953a, started running on dismissal of appellant's motion for new trial, and was not ipso facto suspended by appeal therefrom, even if ground of motion was insufficiency of evidence, and order dismissing motion was appealable, in view of sections 939, 956, 963.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Suit by Thomas A. Hughes against Mary C. De Mund. On plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's appeal. Appeal dismissed. See, also, 233 P. 93.

A. I. McCormick and Rush & McCormick, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Goodwin & Morgrage and D. E. O'Brien, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] Respondent moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no transcript of the record or appellant's points and authorities has been filed within the time allowed by law, and the time for preparation thereof has expired, supporting his motion by a certificate of the clerk of the superior court, and by an affidavit of counsel. Appellant makes no showing contravening that submitted by respondent in support of his motion, but stands upon the contention that the showing made by respondent is not sufficient under rule 6 of this court to entitle him to a dismissal, in that it fails to negative every conceivable set of circumstances under which appellant might be free from default herein. Respondent's supporting papers do comply literally with every express requirement of rule 6. The certificate of the clerk shows that the action was brought for the dissolution of partnership and for an accounting between the partners; that an interlocutory decree was entered February 2, 1924, decreeing that a partnership existed; that it was the owner of certain specified lots; that an accounting be had; and that upon such accounting being had the court would make and cause to be entered its final decree in the matter; that defendant filed a notice of appeal from said decree April 2, 1924; that she has not filed a notice to said clerk to prepare a transcript, nor has she filed or given an undertaking for costs in preparing such transcript, nor did she arrange personally with the reporter or clerk for his compensation in the preparation thereof; that no transcript has been prepared or filed. The supplemental affidavit of counsel shows that defendant has not prepared nor served nor presented to the judge who heard the case any proposed draft of a bill of exceptions, nor has any bill of exceptions ever been certified or settled. This showing appears upon its face to be prima facie sufficient to entitle respondent to a dismissal of the appeal. Appellant's time to propose a bill of exceptions or file notice requesting a transcript expired ten days after notice of entry of judgment, "or if a proceeding on motion for new trial be pending, within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion or other determination thereof." Code Civ. Proc. §§ 650, 953a.

[2] No notice of the entry of judgment is shown to have been given, but the filing by defendant of a notice of appeal on April 2 was the equivalent thereof for the purpose of starting this time running. Figliera v. Dewhirst, 32 Cal. App. 245, 162 P. 655; Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 359, 61 P. 1123; Timmons v. Coonley, 39 Cal. App. 35, 179 P. 429. If motion for new trial were made, the notice of intention must have been filed within ten days thereafter, to wit, April 12. Code Civ. Proc. § 659. The court had no power to extend this time. Amendment of 1915 to Code Civ. Proc. § 659. The power of the court to pass upon such motion for new trial would expire within two months after notice of the entry of the judgment which, for the purposes of this case, would be June 12, and "if such motion is not determined within said two months, the effect shall be a denial of the motion without further order of the court." Code Civ. Proc. § 660.

[3] Where a motion for new trial is automatically denied by force of the statute, the appellant is deemed to have notice thereof as of the date of the expiration of the statutory period. Bernschein v. Whitaker, 175 Cal. 130, 165 P. 523; McArthur v. Paxton, 39 Cal. App. 608, 179 P. 521. Thus the time for serving proposed bill of exceptions or filing request for transcript on appeal would expire June 22. This time could not be extended by the court more than 30 days, or until July 22. Code Civ. Proc. 1054; Cameron v. Arcata, etc., R. R. Co., 129 Cal. 279, 282, 61 P. 955. Thus, upon the face of the record as presented upon this motion, it would appear that appellant has been in default herein since July 22.

[4] At the hearing of the motion, counsel for appellant, to support his contention as to the insufficiency of the showing made in support of the motion, made substantially the following statement of facts, which were not controverted by counsel for respondent, and may be regarded as tacitly conceded herein: That defendant and appellant served and filed within time a notice of intention to move for new trial; that while the same was pending, and before it had been heard by the court, and before the time had elapsed for such hearing, under Code of Civil Procedure, § 660, respondent moved to dismiss the motion for new trial upon the ground that it was premature in that the interlocutory decree at which it was aimed was not a final judgment; that this motion was heard by the court, and appellant's motion for a new trial was dismissed by the court three weeks prior to the expiration of the statutory two months within which the court had power to grant the motion; that thereafter and within time defendant and appellant herein took and perfected an appeal from the order dismissing her motion for new trial, which appeal is now pending in the District Court of Appeal. Appellant's contention is that by virtue of these circumstances her motion for new trial is still pending and undetermined, and that therefore her time has not yet begun to run for the proposal of a bill of exceptions or the filing of a request for transcript to be used upon this appeal. She contends further that, under the rule of People v. Lauman, 59 Cal. App. 144, 210 P. 421, if, upon the appeal from the order dismissing the motion for new trial, the same is reversed, that upon the going down of the remittitur therefrom the trial court will have three weeks thereafter within which to act upon, and within which it may lawfully grant the motion for a new trial.

We cannot adopt this line of reasoning. Prior to 1915 a separate appeal would lie, either from an order granting, or from an order refusing, a new trial, but, by a series of amendments adopted in that year, appeals from orders refusing a new trial were abolished, as were appeals from orders granting a new trial, except in the single case of an action or proceeding tried by a jury where such trial by jury is a matter of right. 2 Cal. Juris., pp. 173 et seq.; Code Civ. Proc. § 963. At the same time it was provided that there may be reviewed upon an appeal from the judgment, not merely an order denying a new trial, but "any order on motion for a new trial." Code Civ. Proc. § 956. Prior to these amendments it was held that an appeal would lie from an order dismissing a motion for a new trial. McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325. While this decision was placed upon the ground that the order in question was a special order after final judgment, it was also in accord with the view that an order dismissing a motion for new trial is equivalent to an order denying the same, which was then expressly appealable. Voll v. Hollis, 60 Cal. 569; W. Davis & Son v. Hurgren & Anderson, 125 Cal. 48, 50, 57 P. 684; Winchester v. Black, 134 Cal. 125, 66 P. 197; Credits Commutation Co. v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 82, 73 P. 1009; Bryan v. Tevis, 177 Cal. 627, 171 P. 433. An order denying a new trial is just as much a "special order made after final judgment" as is an order dismissing a motion for new trial. Yet there is no room for doubt that the amendments of 1915 took away the right of appeal from the former (2 Cal. Juris., 174, and cases cited), and it would seem that it was the intent of the Legislature in and by those amendments to abolish also the right of appeal from an order dismissing a motion for new trial. The purpose of the Legislature evidently was to obviate the delays incident to the prosecution of two separate appeals in a single action, in so far as proceedings for new trial are concerned, and to provide that such proceedings should be reviewable upon the appeal taken from the judgment.

In the amendment to Code of Civil Procedure, § 939, prescribing the time within which an appeal may be taken, it was provided that "if proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment shall not expire until thirty days after entry in the trial court of the order determining such motion for a new trial, or other termination in the trial court of the proceedings upon such motion." In section 956 it was provided that "the court may also, on such appeal review any order on motion for a new trial." In section 953a it was provided that "said notice must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment, order or decree, or if a proceeding on motion for new trial be pending, within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or of other termination thereof." In section 650 it was provided that "if proceedings on motion for a new trial be pending, within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or other determination thereof * * *." (The emphasis in the foregoing quotations is ours.) The iteration and reiteration of such phraseology makes plain the legislative intent that the limitations there prescribed should start running, not merely upon the formal denial of a motion for new trial, but upon the happening of any event which has the legal effect of terminating the proceedings therefor in the court below. So, also, the language of section 956 makes it plain that there may be reviewed upon an appeal from a judgment not only an order denying a new trial, but any order upon motion therefor, which necessarily must include an order dismissing such a motion. To adopt appellant's contention herein would be to hold that she need not even begin proceedings for the preparation of a record upon this appeal until after her appeal from the order dismissing her motion for new trial shall have been finally determined, and the remittitur thereon issued and filed in the court below. This would amount to a nullification to this extent of the legislative purpose so clearly evidenced in the amendments of 1915. It may be assumed for the purpose hereof that one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial was insufficiency of the evidence, and that the order dismissing it was, therefore, appealable, as was assumed in Grimes v. Lamar, 60 Cal. App. 623, 213 P. 270. Nevertheless, the taking of an appeal therefrom would not ipso facto extend the time for filing transcript upon appeal from the judgment. Williams v. Williams, 176 Cal. 230, 168 P. 19; Bryan v. Tevis, supra. We are constrained to conclude that upon appellant's statement of the facts her time for the preparation of a record upon this appeal was started running by the dismissal of her motion for a new trial, and was not suspended by the taking of an appeal therefrom, and upon the record as presented by respondent in support of his motion, it started not later in any event than July 22. In either view of the situation she is in default, and the motion must be granted.

We have not considered the question whether the interlocutory decree herein is an appealable judgment, as that question has not been raised or discussed by counsel.

The motion is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. COLLINS. (Cr. 2692.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1925.)

1. Criminal law §598(1)—Refusal of continuance for absence of witness for want of due diligence held not abuse of discretion.

Where defendant knew eight days before departure of witness that witness was about to leave state, and procured subpoena to be issued, but did not inform sheriff of contemplated departure, so that sheriff in ignorance thereof made no special effort to obtain service, refusal of continuance for absence of witness on ground that defendant had not used due diligence held not abuse of discretion.

2. Criminal law §586, 1151—Application for continuance addressed to sound discretion of court.

An application for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be reviewed except for the most cogent reasons.

3. Criminal law §1151—Action on application for continuance not disturbed, if court exercised reasonable and not arbitrary discretion.

Where lower court exercises a reasonable and not an arbitrary discretion in ruling on application for a continuance, its action will not be disturbed.

4. Criminal law §598(2, 7)—Absent witness not ground for continuance unless "due diligence" has been used.

The absence of a witness is no cause for continuance, unless "due diligence" has been used to procure his attendance, and due diligence has not been used, unless the proper legal means have been resorted to for purpose of compelling attendance.

5. Criminal law §598(2)—Due diligence in procuring service of subpoena necessary.

A defendant, to be entitled to a continuance because of absence of witness, must have used due diligence, not only to procure issuance of subpoena, but also in seeing that process is served.

6. Criminal law §603(9)—Refusal to grant continuance not abuse of discretion, where supporting affidavits do not show where witness is, or that testimony can be obtained within reasonable time.

Where supporting affidavits do not show where desired witness is, and that his testimony can be obtained within a reasonable time, refusal to grant continuance is not abuse of discretion.

7. Criminal law §603(8)—Affidavit for continuance should state that facts to which absent witness will testify cannot otherwise be proved.

To obtain continuance, affidavit should state that facts expected to be proved by absent material witness cannot otherwise be proved.

8. Criminal law §596(1)—Refusal of continuance for absence of witness not prejudicial, where substance of expected testimony given by other witness.

It is not prejudicially erroneous to refuse a continuance because of absence of witness, if substance of testimony expected to be elicited from him has been given by other witness.

9. Criminal law §596(1)—Refusal of continuance for absence of witness whose testimony would be merely cumulative held not abuse of discretion.

In manslaughter prosecution following death of person struck by defendant's automobile, refusal of continuance for absence of witness who would testify that defendant was not intoxicated held not abuse of discretion, in view of other testimony tending to prove sobriety.

10. Criminal law §870—Verdict finding the defendant guilty as charged, but reciting facts in recommending leniency, held not a special verdict.

In manslaughter prosecution, verdict finding the defendant "guilty as charged," and stating in separate paragraph recommending leniency that verdict was based on the unlawful operation of a motor vehicle, held not an imperfect special verdict within Pen. Code, §§ 1152-1156, 1161, since the general verdict did not depend for its efficacy on the second paragraph.

11. Criminal law §870—Verdict not special, if finding is consistent with verdict of guilty or of not guilty; "special verdict."

If the finding of the jury be consistent with a verdict of guilty or of not guilty, it does not constitute a "special verdict," within Pen. Code, §§ 1152-1156, 1161.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Special Verdict.]

12. Criminal law §886—Words recommending leniency constitute no part of verdict.

Words recommending mercy or leniency contained in verdict constitute no part of verdict, and may be rejected as surplusage.

13. Homicide §238—Evidence held to prove defendant intoxicated at time of accident.

In prosecution for manslaughter following death of person struck by defendant's automobile, evidence held to prove that defendant was in a state of voluntary intoxication at the time of the accident.

14. Homicide §235—Evidence held to prove that automobile driver, being prosecuted for manslaughter, was driving on wrong side of road.

In prosecution for manslaughter following death of person struck by defendant's automobile, evidence held to prove that defendant was driving on wrong side of highway when approaching other motor vehicle at time of accident.

15. Homicide ☞235, 238—Evidence held to prove intoxicated condition of defendant and operation of automobile on wrong side of highway proximate cause of death.

In prosecution for manslaughter following death of person struck by defendant's automobile, evidence held to prove that defendant's intoxicated condition and driving on wrong side of highway at time of accident were proximate cause of death of other person.

16. Homicide ☞62—Defendant who killed motorcycle driver while driving automobile while intoxicated and on wrong side of road could be convicted of manslaughter.

Automobile driver who killed motorcycle driver while driving automobile while intoxicated, in violation of Vehicle Act, § 17, as amended by St. 1919, p. 214, § 11, and on wrong side of highway in violation of Vehicle Act, § 20, subds. a, b, as amended by St. 1919, p. 215, § 12, could be convicted of manslaughter under Pen. Code, § 192, notwithstanding Pen. Code, § 367e, creating a separate offense.

17. Homicide ☞180—Evidence as to other accident held admissible in prosecution for manslaughter to show intoxication.

In prosecution for manslaughter following death of person struck by defendant's automobile, evidence as to other accident seven miles from scene of fatal accident and about an hour afterward held admissible to prove that defendant was intoxicated; remoteness going to its weight and not its admissibility, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 15.

18. Homicide ☞340(2)—Instruction that contributory negligence of deceased would not excuse crime held harmless.

In prosecution for manslaughter following death of person struck by defendant's automobile, in which there was no evidence as to contributory negligence of the deceased, instruction that, if defendant's manner of driving automobile was proximate cause of death, contributory negligence of deceased would not excuse crime held harmless.

19. Criminal law ☞1038(3)—Instruction failing to define terms held not reversible error, in absence of request for instructions defining terms.

In prosecution for manslaughter following death of a person struck by defendant's automobile, failure to define "negligence," "measure of care," and "proximate cause" in instruction as to contributory negligence of deceased held not ground for reversal, in absence of request for instructions defining them.

20. Homicide 341—Failure to instruct that defendant was under no obligation to accompany deceased after accident held harmless.

In prosecution for manslaughter following death of person struck by defendant's automobile, failure to instruct that defendant was under no legal duty to accompany the deceased from the scene of the accident held harmless.

21. Criminal law ☞1119(4)—Misconduct of counsel in argument held not reviewable, in absence of report of statements.

Alleged misconduct of counsel in argument to jury cannot be considered, in absence of stenographic report of statements or attempt by defendant to present some other record thereof.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

D. E. Collins was convicted of manslaughter, and from a judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

W. N. Conley, Philip Conley, and Lindsay & Conley, all of Fresno, and Bradley & Bradley, of Visalia, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Fred C. Scott, Dist. Atty., and Leroy McCormick, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Visalia, for the People.

LAWLOR, J. At 10:30 p. m. on February 26, 1923, on the state highway about seven miles in a northwesterly direction from Tulare, the defendant, D. E. Collins, driving an automobile, ran into and collided with a motorcycle being operated by Lewis Hawks, which collision resulted in the death of the said Lewis Hawks.

The defendant was charged by the district attorney of Tulare county with the crime of felony, to wit, manslaughter. Upon arraignment the defendant pleaded not guilty, and on the trial the verdict of the jury was rendered in these words:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the information.

"John G. Anderson, Foreman.

"As this verdict is based on the unlawful operation of a motor vehicle, to wit, driving on the wrong side of the highway, when approaching another motor vehicle, we the jury, recommend leniency.

"John G. Anderson, Foreman."

Following the trial counsel for the defendant interposed a motion "for an order entering a judgment of dismissal of defendant, and cited section 1155 of the Penal Code in support of said motion," which motion was subsequently denied. A motion for a new trial on the grounds specified in section 1181 of the Penal Code was interposed and denied. "Thereupon counsel for the defendant gave notice of his intention to appeal from the order of court denying the motion for new trial." A motion to admit the defendant to probation was then made and denied, whereupon testimony was taken under section 1192a of the Penal Code. The defendant was then sentenced to the penitentiary. "Thereupon counsel for defendant gave notice of his intention to appeal."

Several points are urged as grounds for the reversal of the judgment of conviction and the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

I. Appellant's first point is that "defendant was denied his constitutional right to a fair trial by the action of the court in refusing to grant a continuance upon timely application to permit him to produce the testimony of Reverend Stephen O'Keefe, which testimony would have clearly established defendant's sobriety on the evening of the accident, and hence defendant's innocence of the charge." In this connection appellant contends that due diligence was shown to serve the witness with process, and that the failure to allow the continuance "amounted to a gross abuse of discretion," citing People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, 53 P. 553; People v. Diaz, 6 Cal. 248; People v. McCrory, 41 Cal. 458; People v. Lee, 2 Cal. Unrep. 569, 8 P. 685; Graham v. State, 50 Ark. 161, 167, 6 S. W. 721; Newton v. State, 21 Fla. 53, 70; People v. Wallach, 62 Cal. App. 385, 217 P. 81.

The appellant was arraigned on March 26, 1923, and on that same day the court set the trial for Tuesday, June 12, 1923. On June 1, 1923, counsel for appellant moved for an order continuing the trial on the ground that a material witness for appellant had moved out of the jurisdiction of the court. C. L. Bradley, one of the attorneys for appellant, filed a supporting affidavit which averred that Father O'Keefe is a material and necessary witness; that his presence cannot be secured nor his evidence obtained before June 12, 1923; that, if the trial is postponed, the presence of said witness can be secured or his testimony obtained; that this witness will testify that appellant was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor; that he was with appellant throughout the day of the accident, and that when he left Tulare appellant was in possession of his normal faculties; that due diligence to secure the attendance of this witness was used; that the subpoena was caused to be issued on May 12, 1923, and on that day placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county of Tulare, with instructions and the witness' address; that the sheriff informed the affiant that the witness had left the state of California, and is now in Ireland visiting his parents; that he took his departure before service could be had upon him; and that affiant is informed and believes that this witness will be without the jurisdiction of the court for a period of about two or three months.

Following argument on the motion to continue the trial the motion was denied. Again on June 12, 1923, the day set for the trial, counsel for appellant made another motion for continuance, and filed four supporting affidavits; the court also heard the testimony of John Hazen, a deputy sheriff of the county of Tulare. The affidavit of the appellant was similar to the affidavit of C. L. Bradley, and further averred that for a period of eight days subsequent to May 12, 1923, the date of the issuance of the subpoena, Father O'Keefe was within the jurisdiction of the court; that said witness will testify that he was in the company of appellant from 5 p. m. on February 25th to 10 p. m. on February 26th, the day of the accident; that appellant was sober all of this time; that appellant is unable to procure any other witness who will testify to these facts; that it is "extremely uncertain when the Rev. Stephen O'Keefe will return to the state of California," but that he is at the present time residing at Trieneragh, County Kerry, Ireland; that an application for an order to take his deposition accompanies the affidavit; and that appellant had no reason to believe that the said witness would depart from the state of California.

The affidavit of W. M. Conley, one of the attorneys for appellant, averred the above facts, and stated further that on May 12, 1923, he was informed that there was a likelihood of said witness departing from the state of California; that a subpoena was caused to be issued immediately; that it was placed in the hands of the sheriff for service; that said witness was within the jurisdiction of the court on May 20, 1923; that said witness is a pastor of the Roman Catholic Church at Tulare, and is under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Los Angeles, and the affiant had no reason to believe that he contemplated leaving prior to the trial; and that due diligence has been exercised whenever a subpoena is taken out and placed in the hands of the sheriff for service at a period of 30 days preceding the trial. On June 12, 1923, the affidavit of C. L. Bradley was again placed before the court and another of the appellant, in which he asked that a commission be issued directed to some person in Ireland to examine the witness upon prepared interrogatories.

John Hazen, the deputy sheriff of the county of Tulare, testified that the subpoena was placed in his hands on May 12, 1923, with the information that the witness was the pastor of the Catholic Church at Tulare; that he went to the parsonage the next day and asked for Father O'Keefe; that the lady who answered the doorbell said he was not there; that she did not know "for certain" when he would be back; that she thought he was in the south part of the state, and would probably be back about Thursday or Friday of the next week; that he went again the following Friday morning, May 18, 1923, and another priest came to the door; that he asked him where Father O'Keefe was, and "he said he thought he was with his people. 'Well,' he says, 'I don't think you can get any service on him.' I says, 'He is not in this county today, then?' 'No,' he says, 'he is not in this county'"; that he reported the result to the attorneys for the appellant; that the next week he gave the subpoena to a Mr. Smith to serve; that three days later he returned and was informed the witness was not in this state; and that he informed the attorneys for appellant about June 1, 1923, that he could not obtain service on the witness.

After argument the appellant's motion was denied by the court on the ground that due diligence had not been shown in the attempt to serve the witness.

The appellant contends that—

"Notwithstanding this showing of necessity * * * the trial court forced the defendant to go to trial immediately when the very basis of the charge of the people was that the defendant was drunk at the time of the accident. This denial of the right to testimony which would have established his innocence was fatal to the defendant, and the conviction which followed can be attributed solely to the fact that defendant was not accorded a fair chance to prove by the said witness that he was sober throughout the day of the accident and at the time of the collision."

[1] It does not appear to us that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant a continuance. The record shows that appellant had from March 26, 1923, the day he was arraigned and the case set for trial, until June 12, 1923, the date of the trial, in which to secure his witnesses. It does appear that until May 12, 1923, he was not aware the desired witness would not be available, when his attorney was informed that he was about to leave. From May 12, 1923, until June 12, 1923, was sufficient time in which to secure service, and, although it does appear the said witness left about May 20, 1923, still he had eight days within which to secure service. Sheriff Hazen had not, evidently, been informed of the priest's contemplated departure, because he made no special effort to obtain service, and made only two trips to the parsonage before May 20, 1923. The facts of People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, 53 P. 553, relied upon by appellant, are distinguishable from those at bar. In that case, in granting a new trial, the court held it was error to refuse an order for a continuance based on the ground of the illness of the defendant's wife, whose testimony would tend to entirely exonerate him, and that "she was the only person by whom he could prove any of these facts." The wife in that instance was under subpoena, but was taken ill two or three days before the trial, and, according to the certificates of two physicians who examined the witness, her attendance in court would be dangerous to her life. It was stated in the affidavit of the defendant that in a month she would have recovered her health and be able to appear and testify. This court, citing People v. McCrory, supra; People v. Dodge, 28 Cal. 445, and People v. Brown, 46 Cal. 103, held that the delay was not unreasonable. The other cases cited by appellant are not in point here.

[2-6] "It is a settled rule of practice that an application for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be reviewed except for the most cogent reasons. The trial court is apprised of all the circumstances of the case and the previous proceedings, and is therefore better able to decide upon the propriety of granting the application than an appellate court; and, when it exercises a reasonable and not an arbitrary discretion, its action will not be disturbed." 5 Cal. Jur. 968. The absence of a witness is no cause for a continuance, unless due diligence has been used by the party to procure his attendance at the trial, and due diligence means that the proper legal means must have been resorted to for the purpose of compelling the attendance of the witness. But, even if a subpoena is issued to compel attendance, still it must appear that due diligence has been used in seeing that such process is served. Jacks v. Buell, 47 Cal. 162; People v. Quincy, 8 Cal. 89; Frank v. Brady, 8 Cal. 47; People v. Sliger, 17 Cal. App. 464, 120 P. 40; Hawley v. Los Angeles Creamery Co., 16 Cal. App. 50, 116 P. 84. And, furthermore, although a subpoena has issued, if no effort to secure the testimony has been made within a reasonable time, there is not a sufficient showing of diligence. Tompkins v. Montgomery, 123 Cal. 219, 55 P. 997. And, if the supporting affidavits do not show where the desired witness is and that his testimony can be obtained within a reasonable time, it is not an abuse of discretion in the court to refuse to grant a continuance. Harper v. Lamping, 33 Cal. 641; Watson v. Columbia Basin Development Co., 22 Cal. App. 556, 135 P. 511. Under the above authorities it is proper to hold that the appellant did not use due diligence in obtaining service of the subpoena, knowing at least from May 12, 1923, that the desired witness was contemplating departure from the state. It is averred in one affidavit that he will be absent two or three months and in another that "it is extremely uncertain when he will return." Upon this showing the court could have found that the witness would not return within a reasonable time, or that the length of his absence could not be estimated.

[7, 8] In the second place, in order to obtain a continuance, the affidavit should state that the facts expected to be proved by the absent material witness cannot be otherwise proved. It is therefore "not prejudicially erroneous to refuse a continuance on account of the absence of a witness, if the substance of the testimony expected to be elicited from him has been given by another witness." 5 Cal. Jur. 993.

The fact sought to be proved by Father O'Keefe was that from 5 o'clock p. m. on February 25th to 10 p. m. on February 26th, the appellant was sober and was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Three other witnesses testified as to the sobriety of appellant during the greater part of this time.

The appellant, testifying in his own behalf, stated that between the hours of 8 o'clock on the evening of February 26th and 1 o'clock on the afternoon of February 27th he was not at any time under the influence of intoxicating liquor, and, further, that he had never seen the bottle which was picked up by the side of the road at the scene of the second accident and introduced into evidence as Exhibit 5 before it was shown to him in the courtroom at the trial.

Mrs. Kathleen Carroll, the housekeeper for Father O'Keefe at the parish house in Tulare, testified that on the evening of February 26th the appellant was at the parish house for dinner; that no liquor was served that she saw; that after the dinner was served she went into the kitchen; that she did not see the appellant drink anything while he was at the parish house and that he did not appear to be under the influence of liquor; that before the appellant left he went into the kitchen and bid her goodbye, and she did not notice anything peculiar in his actions; and that he was sober when he came at 6 o'clock and when he left.

Mrs. Elizabeth McNamara, who lived at a Mr. Spaulding's home in Visalia, testified that she first met the appellant in San Francisco; that she saw him on the evening of February 26th; that he came out to see her on insurance business about half past 8; that they went to the parish home in Tulare, and arrived about half past 9; that they remained about an hour, and she was in the company of the appellant the whole time; that he was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor and did not appear to be; that he was sober all the time; that she sat by him all evening, and, if he had been drinking, she could have detected liquor on his breath; that he left her at 10:30; that the appellant was driving his own car; and that it operated "perfectly all right" while she was driving with him.

[9] It is clear, therefore that the testimony of the absent witness would be merely cumulative, and that the court did not under the circumstances shown abuse its discretion in refusing to grant the continuance.

II. Appellant's second point is that the verdict of the jury does not support the judgment, for the reason that the verdict was an imperfect special verdict and is "insufficient in form to warrant a judgment of conviction thereon, since all of the ultimate facts upon which guilt could be predicated are not found by the jury."

Section 1152, Penal Code, is as follows:

"A special verdict is that by which the jury find the facts only, leaving the judgment to the court. It must present the conclusions of fact as established by the evidence, and not the evidence to prove them, and these conclusions of fact must be so presented as that nothing remains to the court but to draw conclusions of law upon them."

Section 1153 provides how special verdicts shall be rendered; section 1154 provides that they need not be in any particular form; section 1155 provides in part:

"The court must give judgment upon the special verdict as follows: 1. If the plea is not guilty, and the facts prove the defendant guilty of the offense charged in the indictment, * * * or of any other offense of which he could be convicted under that indictment, judgment must be given accordingly. But if otherwise, judgment of acquittal must be given."

Section 1156 provides that when special verdicts are defective a new trial shall be ordered, and section 1161 provides that, if the jury render a verdict which is neither general nor special, the court may direct them to reconsider, and it cannot be recorded until it is rendered in some form from which it can be clearly understood that the intent of the jury is to either render a general or special verdict.

[10-12] The first paragraph of what is asserted to be a special verdict is unquestionably a general verdict finding the appellant guilty as charged in the information, and does not depend for its efficacy as such upon the second paragraph. It is not an imperfect special verdict upon which the court should have pronounced a judgment of acquittal. If the finding of the jury be consistent with a verdict of guilty or of not guilty, it does not constitute a special verdict as that term is used in the statute. The verdict herein was unequivocal in meaning, for it found the appellant guilty as charged in the information. Plainly, the second paragraph is merely a recommendation for leniency, and apparently is based on the circumstance that the appellant was driving on the wrong side of the highway when approaching another car coming in the opposite direction. Evidently in the minds of the jury this mitigated the offense. It cannot be regarded as a special finding in any way qualifying the complete general verdict which preceded it. In State v. Schweitzer, 18 Idaho, 609, 111 P. 130, the verdict was "guilty of selling by short weights as charged in the complaint." The court held the words "of selling by short weights" are to be treated as surplusage, and the verdict was upheld. If a verdict contains words recommending mercy or leniency, it is well settled that they constitute no part of the verdict and may be rejected as surplusage. 8 Cal. Jur. 407. In People v. Mitchell, 61 Cal. App. 569, 215 P. 117, it is said:

"Counsel for defendant also objects to the form of the verdict which was rendered by the jury. It was as follows: 'We, the jury impaneled to try the above-entitled cause, find the defendant guilty as charged in the information and recommend to the court that his sentence be not over five years.' Section 1151 of the Penal Code provides that 'a general verdict upon a plea of not guilty is either "guilty" or "not guilty."' The effect of defendant's contention is that the recommendation of the jury annexed to the verdict, that the sentence be not over five years, is not mere surplusage, but is a condition which renders the verdict nugatory. In the case of People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444 (50 P. 675), it appears that a verdict was returned which, among other irregularities, prayed 'the extreme mercy of the court in its sentence and punishment.' The verdict was upheld on the ground that it should have a reasonable construction and be given effect according to its manifest intention. And see People v. Cornell, 29 Cal. App. 430 (155 P. 1026), in which the California authorities bearing upon the subject are reviewed. In People v. Bowman, 24 Cal. App. 781 (142 P. 495), where one of the verdicts returned by the jury was, 'We, the jury find the defendant guilty of the crime charged and leave to the mercy of the court,' it was held that such a verdict was not rendered invalid by reason of the concluding clause. The only matter to be considered here is the effect which the verdict, if any, produced by the recommendation as to the sentence to be imposed on defendant. A verdict is to be construed like any other instrument, and the rule is that, taking the verdict in its entirety, if the meaning intended to be conveyed may be clearly ascertained by common understanding, the verdict is sufficient, notwithstanding any surplusage or that there may be included therein irregularities in spelling or awkward or incorrect expressions from a grammatical standpoint. From the language used in the verdict in the instant case there is no difficulty in ascertaining the fact that the jury found the defendant guilty as charged in the information."

The language in the first paragraph that appellant is guilty of the crime of manslaughter as charged in the information is complete and unequivocal, and the intention of the jury to convict the appellant of the offense charged is unmistakably expressed.

III. Appellant's asserted third ground for reversal is that—

"Since the Legislature had prior to said alleged crime specifically eliminated from the definition of manslaughter the killing of another by a person driving an automobile while in an intoxicated condition, and denounced the act of killing by a person while driving an automobile in an intoxicated condition as a separate and distinct felony (section 367e, Pen. Code), the whole prosecution of the defendant under the manslaughter section of the Penal Code, section 192, was improper, the evidence of intoxication adduced was improperly and erroneously admitted, and the court should have instructed the jury to acquit the defendant."

The information charging the crime of manslaughter does not allege that the killing was due to the intoxication of appellant or to any act done by reason of such intoxication. Nor is it alleged that driving on the wrong side of the road was the cause of the accident. The offense is charged in the conventional form without any specification of the act which caused death. It is simply alleged that appellant "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously kill one Lewis Hawks." No reference is made to section 367e, and it is not otherwise attempted to set forth the means by which the death of the deceased was accomplished. The record does not show that the information was demurred to or that a motion in arrest of judgment was made. It is shown that, when judgment was about to be pronounced, a motion to dismiss was made on the ground the verdict was not sufficient within the meaning of section 1155 of the Penal Code. As already indicated, this motion was denied.

Before passing on the contention of appellant we will describe the evidence in the case. The evidence covers the accident on the highway in which the deceased was struck by appellant's Hudson coach and a collision between appellant's car and a truck and trailer belonging to A. E. Fiske, which occurred about an hour later on the highway about two miles north of Goshen. The following testimony relates principally to the claim that the appellant was intoxicated on the occasion in question:

George Scheidt testified that he met appellant at Tulare "just before the accident," on February 26th, on the sidewalk in front of the R. & R. cigar store; that A. L. Berry and a chap named Moss were present; and that appellant "asked me the road to Fresno, and he asked A. L. Berry the road to Fresno—and that is the first time he had been over the road, and he told me to tell Collins the road, because I had been over it before—so I told him the way to go, and he said he wanted to know the right road because he wanted to get to Fresno. Q. And did you note anything, particularly, in respect to his condition at that time, Mr. Scheidt? A. Well, yes, to a certain extent; he wasn't standing up right, teetered a little bit, and I smelled liquor on his breath." On cross-examination it was sought to impeach this witness' testimony by showing that at the coroner's inquest he did not testify that appellant "teetered." The witness explained that at the coroner's inquest he was nervous and could not remember everything because it was the first time he was on the witness stand. He further testified that he and his companions went into the cigar store for about three minutes, and that when they came out appellant had gone; that after the accident in which the deceased was injured he and his companions assisted appellant in getting his car out of the embankment, and that when they then proceeded to Fresno Moss rode with appellant, who went first, then the witness, driving his own car, and after him A. L. Berry in his car; that appellant pursued "an erratic course, from one side of the road to the other"; that about two miles north of Goshen the car of appellant collided with a Dodge commercial truck which was proceeding south on the west side of the road; that just before the collision appellant was off the highway on his right side and turned upon the highway and into the truck; that after the collision appellant's car went into the fence on the west side of the highway; that a bottle was found on the left side of appellant's car after it had stopped in the fence; that the speed maintained between Tulare and the scene of the accident was twenty-five miles an hour; and that after the first accident the left fender and left headlight on appellant's car were smashed.

A. L. Berry corroborated the testimony of George Scheidt as to the meeting with appellant in front of the cigar store. He testified that he thought appellant was drunk from "the way he acted and the way he talked at that time"; that he smelled whisky on his breath; and that after the first accident he talked to appellant, who said he did not know how the accident happened, and that "he didn't hit nobody." His testimony concerning the second accident corroborates that of George Scheidt. He testified that after the second accident Moss, who was riding with appellant, got out of the car and remarked that he had told appellant not to drive the car so fast because he was not in a condition to drive it that fast. On cross-examination he said he "saw him go backwards and forwards a little bit" in explaining appellant's condition before the deceased was struck. An attempt was made to impeach this witness' testimony by showing that at the coroner's inquest he did not testify that appellant was staggering, and he explained that he was not asked that question. His testimony was that appellant staggered down the road "just like that" (illustrating) after the accident, and at the coroner's inquest he had testified that he did not, at that time, after the accident, observe anything peculiar in appellant's walk. He also testified that appellant was nervous and excited after the accident to the deceased, but was not near the injured man, and made no attempt to have him safely conveyed to a hospital. It appears that at the coroner's inquest he testified appellant was "right by the motorcycle," and that he said "to get him into this car and get him to the hospital."

The witness also testified on cross-examination that the steering gear of appellant's car was stiff, but that he made no examination of the cause; that appellant staggered from his car over to the witness' car after the second accident; that at the A B C Garage in Fresno, where he took appellant after the second accident, appellant told the garageman to get his car, described it, stated who he was, and that he would pay for it; that after he took him to the hotel he staggered when he got out of the car; and that he did not see him stagger at the garage because he walked ahead of appellant. On redirect examination this witness testified that the gear of appellant's automobile steered "just a little hard, but a man that is used to driving an automobile can drive it any place"; and that the zigzag movements of appellant's car between the first and second accident were not the result of the condition of the steering gear. He further testified that when the second collision occurred with the truck and trailer the tire on the left front wheel of appellant's car blew out.

Charles Bass, who was riding in the truck when it was struck by appellant's car, testified that appellant "was plainly drunk," and he could distinctly smell liquor on his breath; and that appellant told him "about 16 or 17 times he was no bum and wasn't going to run away." On cross-examination he testified that the impact of the Hudson coach bent the axle of the trailer and knocked the hub off.

L. W. Kemp, one of the floor men at the A B C Garage, testified that between 12 and 1 o'clock on the morning of February 27th appellant, accompanied by another man, came into the garage; that he talked to him about 5 or 10 minutes; that he seemed sober, and it did not occur to him that he was intoxicated; that when the Hudson car was taken to the garage it had a tire blown out on the left front wheel, the axle was bent, the bumper torn off, and the left fender was bent.

Thomas E. Collins, a brother of appellant, testified that he had been at the Collins Hotel in Fresno during the day of February 26th; that he left for home about half past 8 or 9 o'clock every night; that he was not at the hotel at the time A. L. Berry testified that he gave appellant $15 with which to pay George Scheidt, Moss, and himself for their services; that about 10 o'clock the next morning he talked with appellant and that he was sober; that between 12 and 1 o'clock appellant went home with him and stayed there until half past 1; and that during that time he was sober. A. L. Berry had testified that he saw appellant at 1 o'clock and that he was drunk at that time.

Mrs. Ellen Collins, wife of appellant, testified that on the night of the accident she was at the hotel; that at about 12 o'clock her husband came home; that she was awakened; that he was perfectly sober; and that he was sober the next day.

The testimony of the housekeeper at the parish house concerning appellant's sobriety prior to the accident in which deceased was injured has already been mentioned, as well as that of Mrs. Elizabeth McNamara, who was with appellant until about half past 10 on the evening in question.

Two witnesses, W. A. Bean and Henry Avila, testified to the general reputation of appellant for sobriety.

The following testimony relates chiefly to the operation of appellant's car on the wrong side of the road when approaching another motor vehicle.

James Cross testified that on the night of the accident he met a motorcycle with a carrier about three miles and a half out of Hanford; that it had very good lights, and "was going at a very slow clip," about twenty-five or thirty miles an hour, and was on the right side of the road.

Leonard Coburn, a surveyor and engineer, testified concerning a drawing which purported to show the place where the deceased was injured. He identified a portion of the highway and the railroad track which was about four feet above the highway, the fence with the broken wires, a broken fence post, and the spot where the grass had been smashed down and smeared with grease which was about eight feet from the westerly edge of the paved highway, and the two tracks "caused by slipping rubber tires, tires of an automobile, starting from the point here on the highway, and going more in a westerly direction, till it ran onto the railroad embankment perhaps eight inches or a foot. * * * the car had apparently set its brakes and left the marks on the highway." He also testified that about two miles north of the place the deceased was found there was a spot very similar to the one above mentioned where the car had gone off the highway and swerved into the fence and broke it down. This witness identified a bottle, two pieces of iron, which were a hub cap marked "L. A. Trailer Company," which were found next to the fence, south of the car.

Charles Bass testified that he and A. E. Fiske were coming from Stockton in the latter's Dodge truck and trailer on the night of the accident, and "about three miles north of Goshen Junction, and there is a car coming zigzagging along the road, and, if I recall well, with one light"; that it slanted across the highway and ran into the running board of the Dodge car, hit the trailer, circled, and hit the fence; and that he took the number of the car and the name of appellant on the registration certificate.

Charles Crum testified that on the night of February 26th he and his nephew were proceeding south from Fresno to Tulare, and, seeing "lights shining over towards the railroad," he decided to stop, and saw a motorcycle with a side car on the west side of the highway facing northwest and about five or six feet off the highway; that he saw the deceased, George Scheidt, and A. L. Berry, who asked him to take deceased to Tulare to the hospital; that he sat in the back seat with the deceased, holding him in his arms; that the deceased said to hurry, "I am dying," he says, 'I can't live'; that he repeated this several times before they reached the hospital; that the deceased said "he tried to get out of this man's way, but he kept on coming towards him, and he said he couldn't get out of reach of him"; and that he was on the right-hand side of the road going south at the time he was struck.

Marvin Crum, a nephew of the last witness, who was present at the time, corroborated a part of the foregoing testimony, but said he did not hear the declarations of the deceased, as he was driving the car.

W. F. Seaman testified that on the night in question he met Charles and Marvin Crum with the deceased, and they took him to the hospital; that he was very badly injured and called for the doctor; that in the presence of the nurse and Charles Crum the deceased said "he was coming south to Tulare on his motorcycle, driving just as far on the edge of the west side of the highway as he could drive, and this big car came along, and deliberately, he said, well, he said it deliberately shot square across the highway on an angle like that, and struck his motorcycle, and he had no chance of getting out of the way. Those were the words that Mr. Hawks used."

Mrs. Lillian McCarthy, sister-in-law of deceased, testified that she saw him at the San Joaquin Hospital in Tulare; that the wife of deceased and a Miss Hickey were there also, and, that she "asked him if he could tell me what happened, and he said, 'Yes.' He said he was hit by an automobile, and I said, 'Were your lights all right?' He said, 'Yes.' And, I said, I asked him if he was on his own side of the road, and he said, 'Yes'; he said, 'He came right straight for me, and I couldn't get out of his way'; and I said to him, 'did he render you any assistance in any way?' and he said 'No.'"

[13-15] In aid of the discussion we have set forth the evidence somewhat in detail, and it is abundantly clear from the summary thereof that it is sufficient as matter of law to establish at least two propositions of fact—(1) That the appellant was in a state of voluntary intoxication at the time of the accident; and (2) that he was driving the car on the wrong side of the highway when approaching another motor vehicle—and that one or both of these propositions was the proximate cause of the death of the deceased. It was attempted to show some contradictions and inconsistencies in the testimony, but it was within the province of the jury to harmonize as far as possible the evidence as a whole in resolving it into facts. On appeal all conflicts must be resolved on the side of the judgment. It is not disputed that appellant was driving on the wrong side of the highway, and it is well within the record to declare that, while the jury in its appeal for leniency stated that the verdict is based on the unlawful operation of the automobile on the wrong side of the highway, this is not to be taken as the equivalent of an implied finding that appellant was not intoxicated when his car inflicted injuries which caused the death of the deceased.

We will now consider the application of the evidence to the law involved. The charge is manslaughter. Section 192 of the Penal Code provides:

"Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being, without malice. It is of two kinds: 1. Voluntary—upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion. 2. Involuntary—in the commission of an unlawful act, not amounting to felony; or in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death, in an unlawful manner, or without due caution and circumspection."

Under this definition two elements enter into voluntary manslaughter: (a) When it is committed upon a sudden quarrel or in the heat of passion. Involuntary manslaughter may be committed (b) in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to felony, or (c) in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death in an unlawful manner, or without due caution and circumspection.

Appellant, as we have seen, contends that section 367e has created a new felony which has taken the place of involuntary manslaughter, and that the charge should have been prosecuted thereunder.

The theory of the prosecution was that the appellant was guilty of intoxication and of driving on the wrong side of the highway, and we will therefore set forth the pertinent provisions of the law as it stood at the time of the accident.

Section 367d of the Penal Code provides:

"Any person operating or driving an automobile, motorcycle or other motor vehicle who becomes or is intoxicated while so engaged in operating or driving such automobile, motorcycle or other motor vehicle shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Section 367e of the Penal Code reads:

"Any person operating or driving an automobile, motorcycle or other motor vehicle who becomes or is intoxicated while so engaged in operating or driving such automobile, motorcycle or other motor vehicle, and who by reason of such intoxication does any act, or neglects any duty imposed by law, which act or neglect of duty causes the death of, or bodily injury to, any person, shall be punishable by imprisonment in the state's prison not exceeding five years, or in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $500, or by both such fine and imprisonment." (Stats. 1911, p. 288.)

The Vehicle Act declares:

"Sec. 17. No person who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor * * * shall operate or drive a motor or other vehicle on any public highway within this state. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for not less than six months nor more than one year or by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one or more than three years or by a fine of not less than five hundred dollars nor more than five thousand dollars." (Stats. 1919, p. 214.)

"Sec. 20. (a) The driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway shall drive or operate such vehicle in a careful manner with due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians and of all other vehicles or traffic upon such highway, and wherever practicable shall travel on the right-hand side of such highway. Two vehicles which are passing each other in opposite directions shall have the right of way, and no other vehicle to the rear of either of such two vehicles shall pass or attempt to pass such two vehicles. On all occasions the driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway shall travel upon the right half of such highway unless the road ahead on the left-hand side is clear and unobstructed for at least one hundred yards ahead and in all cases while crossing an intersecting highway. * * *

"(b) Vehicles proceeding in opposite directions shall pass each other to the right, each giving to the other one-half the road as nearly as possible." (Stats. 1919, p. 215.)

"Sec. 32. (a) Excepting as in this act otherwise provided, or where a different penalty is expressly fixed by this act, any person violating any of its provisions * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, unless in this act otherwise provided, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment." (Stats. 1919, p. 225.)

No change was made in the foregoing provisions by the Legislature of 1921, but in 1923 the "California Vehicle Act" (Stats. 1923, p. 517) was enacted, recasting the law, making a number of modifications, and creating several new crimes punishable as felonies and a number of additional misdemeanors. To illustrate the character of changes, section 112 (Id., p. 553) thereof makes the punishment for conviction of driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor imprisonment in the county jail for not less than 90 days nor more than 1 year, or by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than 1 nor more than 3 years, or by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $5,000. Section 112 is an amendment of section 17 of the "Vehicle Act" of 1919. Section 121 (Id., p. 557) provides that any person who knowingly and willfully drives any vehicle upon a public highway, either without due caution and circumspection, or in such manner as to endanger the life, limb, or property of any person, shall be guilty of reckless driving and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for a period of not less than 5 days nor more than 90 days or by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $250, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Section 141 is new, and makes it a felony to fail to stop in case of collision; the punishment being imprisonment not exceeding 5 years in the state prison or not exceeding 1 year in the county jail. Section 28 of the 1919 act made the punishment for driving a car without the owner's consent imprisonment in the state prison for not less than 1 year nor more than 5 years. Section 146 of the 1923 act adds certain acts to the crime prescribed in the 1919 act and provides that a violation thereof shall be deemed a felony, which under section 18 and 18a of the Penal Code the minimum punishment would be 6 months and the maximum 5 years in the state prison. For additional misdemeanors by the act of 1923 see sections 135(c), 147, 148, 149, 150, and 153(b).

The crime charged against the appellant was alleged to have been committed on February 26, 1923, and the foregoing statutes of that year did not go into effect until August 31 following. They are not therefore applicable to this prosecution, but we have referred to them merely to show the tendency to prescribe additional crimes for the unlawful operation of vehicles which in cases of death resulting from a violation of the "California Vehicle Act" may be intended to form a basis of prosecution for either murder or manslaughter.

We will next consider appellant's contention that the adoption of section 367e superseded the statute of involuntary manslaughter. No ground appears to us for holding that the adoption of section 367e had the legal effect claimed. For instance, it makes a neglect of duty which merely results in bodily injury the same crime as when such neglect results in death, and, of course, mere bodily injury would not justify a charge of manslaughter. To hold that the legal effect of section 367e is to withdraw from the crime of involuntary manslaughter all prosecutions where death is caused by intoxication is to impute to the Legislature an intention to eliminate from that offense prosecutions for perhaps the most prolific source of fatal accidents, and thereby reduce the maximum punishment for such offenders by one-half. That is not the tendency of recent legislation. Thus, section 367d, adopted in 1911, which we have quoted, prescribed a misdemeanor punishment for any person who is or becomes intoxicated while engaged in operating or driving such vehicles; but sections 17 of the 1919 act and 112 of the 1923 act make driving in such intoxicated condition a felony. Judging from the increased number of felonies prescribed by the Legislature for violations of the Motor Vehicle Law, subsequent to section 367e, it is more likely that in adopting such provisions it was intended to create a more drastic law for cases of death or bodily injury due to intoxication. It may have been intended to make such acts in proper cases the basis of a prosecution for either murder or manslaughter. In cases where either felonious or misdemeanor punishment may be imposed for the same criminal act the charge may be prosecuted as a felony. In People v. War, 20 Cal. 117, the defendant was indicted for a felonious assault in the use of a deadly weapon with the intent to indict upon the person of another a bodily injury. The punishment prescribed for the said offense was either by confinement in the state prison or the payment of a fine. Upon the grounds hereinafter stated a demurrer was interposed by the defendant and sustained. From the judgment entered thereon the state appealed. In criminal actions the Supreme Court at that time had appellate jurisdiction in cases of felony only, and, the indictment not having characterized the criminal act as a felony, it was urged by the defendant on appeal that it is not sufficient to show that, if prosecuted farther, the offense might have amounted to a felony; that it must be a felony at the time the appeal is taken, and that the indictment does not show whether defendant is accused of a felony or a misdemeanor. In reversing the judgment and directing the court below to give judgment for the state on the demurrer, with leave for the defendant to plead to the indictment, the court said:

"The discretion given as to the punishment certainly does not make the same act two offenses, and it would be a singular consequence if the fixing alternative punishments belonging to the different classes of crimes should prevent a criminal act from being indictable as any crime. We think, however, there is no uncertainty as to the grade of the crime charged. 'A felony is a public offense, punishable by death or by imprisonment in a state prison. Every other public offense is a misdemeanor.' (Act to regulate proceedings in criminal cases, §§ 4, 5.) Under these definitions, any offense which may be or is liable to be punished by death or imprisonment in the state prison, is a felony. Any offense which is not liable to such punishment—that is, for which that grade of punishment cannot under any circumstances be inflicted—is a misdemeanor. Although the offense charged in this indictment may, in the discretion of the court in any particular case, be only punished by a fine, yet the offense is one which is punishable, which is liable to be punished, by imprisonment in the state prison, and hence it must be prosecuted with the forms and solemnities of a crime of the grade of a felony."

This is also true of a case of death resulting from a violation of section 17 of the Vehicle Act, for that section also provides for felonious punishment, although the extent thereof varies from that prescribed by section 367e. However, if felonious punishment is not imposed, the crime for all purposes shall be deemed a misdemeanor. Section 17, Pen. Code.

It would follow that under section 17 of the Vehicle Act and section 367e of the Penal Code, as those provisions stood in 1919, manslaughter was properly charged against appellant, and we will now proceed to consider whether under the evidence and the legal tests we have applied appellant is guilty of that offense.

To constitute involuntary manslaughter death may be due either to the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony or to the commission of a lawful act which might produce death in an unlawful manner, or without due caution and circumspection. We have said that the evidence would support a finding that appellant at the time of the injury was driving on the wrong side of the highway. This, as we have shown, is an unlawful act constituting a misdemeanor, thus bringing the case within the first sentence of subdivision 2, § 192.

As previously stated, the evidence is sufficient to sustain a finding that appellant was in a state of voluntary intoxication when the collision occurred. This would be an unlawful act amounting to a felony.

With regard to the next element in involuntary manslaughter—the commission of a lawful act in an unlawful manner or without due caution and circumspection—the driving of the automobile on the highway was a lawful act, but the jury might have found that it was operated in an unlawful manner, either by having been driven on the wrong side of the highway or by appellant being in a state of voluntary intoxication, or by both. If the jury had so found, the death of the deceased might have been traced either to the commission of a misdemeanor, driving on the wrong side, or a felony—being in a state of voluntary intoxication.

Under the circumstances it will serve no purpose to consider the remaining element, without due caution and circumspection.

[16] We conclude that appellant was properly prosecuted for manslaughter; that a violation of section 367e may be prosecuted either as a distinct crime of felony or be made the basis of a prosecution for manslaughter; that the evidence would support a finding that appellant was driving on the wrong side of the highway, and that he was in a state of voluntary intoxication; and that either act would support the verdict.

IV. The fourth ground of appeal is that "the court erred in permitting the introduction of other testimony during the course of the trial, which errors were extremely prejudicial to the rights of the defendant." Appellant contends that the testimony of the second accident was improperly admitted for two reasons: (1) Because the facts relating to the second accident did not in any way form a part of the res gestæ; and (2) because the relation by the witnesses of the facts concerning the second accident constituted evidence of a separate and distinct offense, to wit, reckless driving, as defined in the Vehicle Act, and that it tended to prejudice the minds of the jurors against the appellant.

[17] We have sufficiently set forth the testimony relating to the second accident. The evidence thereof, of course, does not tend to prove that the appellant was driving on the wrong side of the highway at the time he collided with the motorcycle, but it does tend to prove that appellant was carelessly operating his automobile during the journey from the scene of the first accident to the second. With regard to appellant's objection to the admission of this testimony that it tended to prove the commission of another offense—reckless driving—than that on which he was charged, it may be remarked that "reckless driving" was not made a crime until after the offense at bar was committed. The exceptions to the rule that evidence of other crimes is not admissible are well recognized, but appellant contends that "the evidence improperly introduced by the prosecution in this case does not fall under any of the exceptions to the general rule.

* * * And certainly the second collision in this case cannot be claimed to be any part of the res gestæ, happening at a place seven miles from the scene of the fatal accident, and about an hour thereafter, and with equal certainty it can be said that the fact of a second collision 'does not tend logically, naturally and by reasonable inference' to establish any fact material to the proof of the alleged crime." Respondent points out that the evidence of the second accident was not offered as a part of the res gestæ—it "was offered for the express purpose of showing that the defendant was in an intoxicated condition. Incidentally, and in the course of proving the defendant's intoxicated condition, evidence of the second accident was inseparable from and a logical part of the testimony offered to establish this intoxicated condition, that is, the proving of the second accident was merely an incident in the proving of defendant's intoxicated condition." The intoxication of appellant was an issue in the case, and it was therefore proper to prove that he was intoxicated at the time and evidence of his condition both before and after the accident was relevant if it tended to show his condition when the deceased was struck, even though "it may tend to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors by inducing the belief that he had been the perpetrator of another crime." People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 114, 193 P. 92, 96. It is required that the period of time be such "that the condition may be reasonably supposed to be continuous." 1 Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) § 235. The second accident occurred an hour after the first, and it was for the jury to determine whether his condition on the second occasion was a continuation of that on the first. The remoteness of the testimony would go to the weight and not to its admissibility. Section 1870, subd. 15, Code Civ. Proc.; 10 Cal. Jur. 798. We perceive no error in the ruling.

V. The fifth ground of appeal is that the court erred in instructing the jury as to matters of law. From the following instruction appellant contends "the jury might well infer that because the accident itself happened, the defendant was not driving his automobile with 'due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians.'"

"If you find that the defendant was willfully and unlawfully driving an automobile upon a public highway in a manner not then and there careful, and without due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians, and all other vehicles upon such highway, and that said unlawful act by him was the proximate cause of the death of said Lewis Hawks, then I instruct you that the said defendant is responsible under the criminal law, regardless of whether or not the said Lewis Hawks' failure to use due care for his own safety contributed to his death."

[18-20] It was apparently intended by the entire instruction to convey the idea that, if appellant violated the law, the contributory negligence of the deceased, if any, would not excuse the crime. There was no evidence that the deceased did not use ordinary care, and his dying declaration would indicate he was entirely free from blame. In any event we do not think appellant was prejudiced by the closing sentence. Appellant also contends that the technical words of "negligence," "measure of care," or "proximate cause" are not defined in this instruction. These are terms used in civil suits, and, moreover, appellant did not propose or request that such definitions be given. The other instructions to the jury included one to the effect that, if the injury caused death, then the wound "is to be regarded as the cause of death." The appellant contends that the jury should have been instructed that he "was under no legal duty to accompany the deceased * * * from the scene of the accident to the city of Tulare." It is shown by the evidence that appellant saw that the deceased was put in the care of proper persons, and it did not seem to be necessary that he should go to the hospital with the others. It does not appear that he refused to render any aid. It is claimed that counsel for the prosecution mentioned the failure of appellant to accompany the party to the hospital. Assuming that the proposed instruction contained a statement of a legal principle, we are unable to see how the failure to give it injured appellant.

[21] VI. Under this assignment of error the appellant contends that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in making "numerous improper statements and arguments" to which exception was made at the time. It appears that the stenographer who reported the trial did not take down in shorthand any of the argument of the district attorney, and it is asserted that for this reason the appellant is not able to present the facts concerning the misconduct. It does not appear that appellant otherwise attempted to present a record covering the alleged misconduct, and in the absence of such a record we are unable to pass on the merits of the point.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

MARR v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA GAS CO. et al. (L. A. 8185.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1925.)

Judges ¶51(4)—Judge's denial to charge of bias in motion after judgment to disqualify him for bias held sufficient to warrant denial of motion.

Where rulings and remarks relied on in motion after judgment to disqualify judge from hearing motion for new trial were not irreconcilable with the conclusion that the judge was entirely unbiased and impartial, judge's affidavit in opposition to motion "that he has not now any bias or prejudice against the plaintiff in said cause, and never has had any bias or prejudice against the said plaintiff," held sufficient denial to warrant overruling of motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Winifred F. Marr against the Southern California Gas Company and others. From an order after judgment denying plaintiff's motion to disqualify judge from hearing motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order after judgment denying appellant's motion to disqualify the trial judge from hearing and acting upon her motion for new trial on the ground of bias and prejudice, under Code of Civil Procedure, section 170, subdivision 4. The affidavit in support of the motion consists principally of recitals of rulings made, and things said, by the trial judge in the course of the trial. In the concluding paragraph thereof affiant states that "by reason of the facts and circumstances herein in this affidavit set forth, affiant states that on and according to her information and belief, that she cannot have a fair and impartial hearing of said motion for new trial, or a fair and impartial trial of said action," before the judge who had tried the case, "by reason of the bias and prejudice of said judge." The allegation of bias and prejudice is thus apparently limited to such bias and prejudice as is indicated by the facts and circumstances set forth in the affidavit. We do not think that any of these facts and circumstances, or any group of them, or all of them together, are irreconcilable with the conclusion that the trial judge was entirely unbiased and impartial. They do perhaps indicate that he at times became irritated and out of patience because of the fact that appellant, who is not an attorney, was attempting to try her own case which, as stated by him, involved difficult and technical propositions of law. In response to the motion the trial judge made and filed an affidavit wherein he deposed, "that he has not now any bias or prejudice against the plaintiff in said cause, and never has had any bias or prejudice against the said plaintiff." We are of the opinion that this was an entirely sufficient denial under the circumstances of this particular case.

The order is affirmed.

12. Trusts — 283(1) — Contract by which trustee gains inequitable advantage over beneficiary is voidable at election of beneficiary.

Contract by which trustee gains an inequitable advantage over beneficiary, either by inadequacy of consideration or otherwise, is not void, but voidable, at election of beneficiary.

13. Courts — 198 — Remedy of heirs to rescind contract in behalf of testatrix required to be pursued in equity.

If heirs of testatrix after her death were entitled to remedy of rescission of contract regarding disposition of her property by will, remedy was required to be pursued in court of equity and not in probate.

14. Wills — 58(2) — Finding that agreement by which testatrix disposed of her property by will was not unfair sustained.

Evidence held to sustain finding that agreement by which testatrix disposed of her property by will was in no sense unfair or inequitable.

Trial court is fully justified in giving credit to testimony, where it is not inherently incredible nor improbable, and is in large part corroborated by other evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Thomas, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Rockie Berry, deceased. Petition by C. H. Johnson and others to revoke the probate of the last will of Rockie Berry, deceased, opposed by Olive Williams, executrix. Judgment denying petition for revocation and contestants appeal. Affirmed.

U. W. Breeden, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Lloyd O. Miller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. This is an appeal by contestants from a judgment denying their petition to revoke the probate of the last will of the deceased. It is difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain from an examination of appellants' opening brief what specific questions of law are presented for adjudication upon this appeal. The record upon appeal consists of typewritten clerk's transcript and reporter's transcript prepared pursuant to sections 953a et seq., Code of Civil Procedure. The brief contains no statement of facts, no statement of the issues, none of the allegations of the pleadings, no statement of the facts found (except as to the so-called special findings to be mentioned presently), or of the conclusions of law. Appended to the brief is a printed supplement which contains excerpts from the testimony of a number of witnesses and copies of certain exhibits. Included therein under the heading "Suggestions of points and special findings thereon" is set forth what appears to be a series of questions and answers, 50 in number. These are in no way identified, nor is their presence in the supplement in any way explained in the brief. It cannot be ascertained therefrom whether they are taken from some portion of the record of the trial court or derived from some other source. They are from time to time referred to in the brief by number as "special findings." We are, however, informed by counsel for respondent in his brief that at the conclusion of the trial below the trial judge announced his decision against the contestants and ordered judgment in favor of the defendant; that counsel for the defendant thereafter prepared proposed findings and conclusions of law, and served and filed the same, and thereupon counsel for contestants served upon the trial judge "Suggestions for points and request for findings hereon," 50 in number. These suggestions and requests without exception related to probative and evidentiary facts as distinguished from ultimate facts. The trial judge prepared his own findings of fact and conclusions of law, fully and adequately responsive to all of the issues framed by the pleadings. Having done this, he was under no obligation or duty whatsoever to give any consideration to or take any action upon appellants' "Suggestions for points and request for findings," but nevertheless he did, with remarkable patience and industry, prepare written answers to each of the 50 questions, and added them to the findings of fact which he had prepared, giving to each a number corresponding to the question propounded by appellants, to which the same was an answer. These answers are referred to by counsel as "special findings."

[1-3] The nature of appellants' contentions upon this appeal can best be arrived at by a process of elimination. There is no suggestion in their brief of any defect or deficiency in the pleadings, or that the court failed to find upon any issue framed thereby, or that any finding of fact is irrelevant to the issues, or that the findings fail to support the judgment, or that any error was committed at the trial, or that any conclusion of law is erroneous. We are thus brought to the conclusion that the gist of appellants' contention is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of fact, but no such contention is anywhere stated in their brief (except with respect to the so-called "special findings"). There is no specification of such insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of ultimate facts, and if there were, it could not be reviewed except by reference to the findings themselves, which are nowhere to be found, either in appellants' brief or in the supplement thereto. A proper course to be followed by this court under such circumstances would be to affirm the judgment without further consideration of the appeal. The appellate court is not required to assume the vexatious burden of searching the typewritten transcript for error or for deficiencies therein. Scott v. Hollywood Park Co., 176 Cal. 680, 169 P. 379; Marcucci v. Vowinkel, 164 Cal. 693, 180 P. 430; Eddy v. Stowe, 43 Cal. App. 789, 185 P. 1024; Pasadena Realty Co. v. Clune, 34 Cal. App. 33, 166 P. 1025. When the Code was amended in 1907 to provide for a new and alternative method for the preparation of record to be used upon appeal and permitting the use thereof of a typewritten clerk's transcript and reporter's transcript in lieu of the printed judgment roll and bill of exceptions theretofore required (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a et seq.), it was provided therein that—

"In filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Code Civ. Proc. § 953c.

Under this provision of the law it was repeatedly held and reiterated in some scores of cases that the appellate court is not required to look at the typewritten transcript for matters which are not set forth in the printed briefs or supplements thereto, and that, if the appellant failed to print in his brief or supplement sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment, the same should be affirmed on the ground that the record failed to show error. 2 Cal. Jur. 644 to 647, and cases cited. In 1919 (St. 1919, p. 261) this section was amended by adding thereto a proviso that—

"No appeal shall be dismissed nor shall any appeal be decided adversely to any party for failure to print in his brief the portion of the record or any part thereof in support of his points. * * *

The purpose and effect of this amendment was to relieve litigants from the natural and logical consequence of their failure to comply with the statutory mandate to print in their briefs the portions of the record relied upon and to impose upon the appellate court the burden of investigating and determining what portions of the record ought to be printed as a basis for reviewing the contentions urged by the respective parties. 2 Cal. Jur. 647 to 650, and cases cited. In 1923 (St. 1923, p. 748) section 953c was again amended by striking out therefrom the proviso which had been added in 1919, leaving the section substantially as it had been from 1907 to 1919. The purpose and effect of this amendment was undoubtedly to return to the rule of law which had obtained during the period last mentioned and to reinstate the rule of decision which was then applied thereto. The result is not only that it was the plain duty of appellants to print in their brief or in the supplement thereto all portions of the record necessary to be considered by this court before arriving at a conclusion that the judgment should be reversed, but also that, because of their failure so to do, this court would be fully justified in affirming the judgment appealed from without further consideration of the record. Appellants seem to believe that they have performed their duty fully in this respect when they have printed the portions of the evidence upon which they rely. They overlook the fact that, in order to determine whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain a given finding, we must have before us not only the evidence but also the finding. If we had the finding before us, and should conclude that the evidence was insufficient to support it, we still could not determine whether or not such finding was essential to support the judgment, unless we had before us the pleadings or at least an accurate statement of the issues framed thereby. Appellants state in their reply brief in evident good faith that they have endeavored to fully comply with the requirements of the statute in respect to the printing of the record, and believe that they have done so, but that, if other portions of the record be deemed necessary for the consideration of the appeal upon its merits, they stand ready to print the same. We are disposed, therefore, to proceed with the consideration of this appeal upon its merits, making such examinations of the typewritten transcripts as are necessary to that end. It may be doubted, however, that we would be justified in reversing a judgment upon a ground not disclosed by an inspection of appellants' printed brief and supplement, and the existence of which can be ascertained only by an examination of the typewritten transcript. Pearson v. Parsons, 173 Cal. 331, 336, 340, 159 P. 1171.

[4-7] An examination of the pleadings discloses that there were four grounds of contest herein; namely, unsoundness of mind, informality of the execution of the will, fraud, and undue influence. Appellants state in their reply brief that they have abandoned the first two grounds for the purposes of this appeal, leaving only questions relating to fraud and undue influence to be considered herein. Appellants' brief is wholly devoted to attacks upon the so-called "special findings." Twenty of these are attacked upon the ground that they are not supported by the evidence. Without unduly prolonging this opinion, it must suffice to say that we find in the record evidence which is legally sufficient to support each of the special findings so attacked. This matter, however, is wholly inconsequential. The 20 special findings so attacked, or, for that matter, all 50 of the special findings, might be eliminated from the record without in any way affecting the validity of the judgment. The general findings which were prepared by the trial judge are most comprehensive. They cover thoroughly the entire field of the case, are adequately responsive to all of the issues framed by the pleadings, and fully support the judgment rendered.

Others of the special findings are attacked upon the ground that they are not responsive to the interrogatories submitted to the trial judge by counsel for appellants. This is immaterial for the reason that the trial judge owed no duty to respond to any of those interrogatories. Appellants seem to think that, if the trial judge failed to make a special finding responsive to any of the interrogatories submitted by them, he committed error therein. That conclusion is rested upon what was said by this court in Hidden v. Jordan, 28 Cal. 301, 304; Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 403, 89 Am. Dec. 124; and Porter v. Woodward, 57 Cal. 535, but what was there said was based upon a particular statute enacted in 1861 (Stats. 1861, p. 589), the substance of which was carried into the Code in 1872 as section 635 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was repealed in 1876. The only duty resting upon the trial judge in this behalf is to make and file findings of fact which shall be adequately responsive to the issues of ultimate fact which are framed by the pleadings. Appellants are in error in assuming that the question whether or not there was a fiduciary relation existing between the testatrix and the respondent is a question of ultimate fact upon which the trial court was required to specifically find. It was no more than a probative or evidentiary fact. The existence of such relation would be a circumstance relevant to the issue of ultimate fact whether the will was the product of fraud and to the issue of ultimate fact whether the will was the product of undue influence. A finding either way upon the question of the existence of such fiduciary relation would not of itself be determinative either way as to either of these questions of ultimate fact. The inference of one fact from others, unless such fact is a necessary conclusion from those others, must be made by the trial court, and where probative facts are found by it, if they are such as might authorize different inferences therefrom, it will be assumed upon appeal that the inference made by the trial court was one that will uphold rather than defeat its judgment. Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 31 P. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Gould v. Eaton, 111 Cal. 639, 644, 44 P. 319, 52 Am. St. Rep. 201; Nevills v. Moore Mining Co., 135 Cal. 561, 566, 67 P. 1054.

[8-10] Appellants assert that the will in question is the product of an agreement between testatrix and respondent under the terms of which respondent was to convey to testatrix certain property in Oklahoma and to live with and care for testatrix while she lived, in consideration of which testatrix was to devise to respondent the property in Los Angeles, which was in fact devised to respondent in the will. Appellants assert that this contract was breached by respondent in that she failed to convey to the testatrix some of the property so agreed to be conveyed to her. They conclude from this that the will should be denied probate. No authority is cited to support this conclusion. We pointed out in a recent case that the fact that a will is executed in violation of a contract which called for a different testamentary disposition affords no ground for the denial of the probate thereof. The remedy for a wrong arising out of the violation of a contract in respect of the making of a will cannot be litigated in a probate court, but must be pursued in a court of law or a court of equity. Estate of Rolls (Cal. Sup.) 226 P. 608. There is, however, no basis herein for the assumption that the contract was breached by the respondent. The trial court found that the respondent fully kept and performed all of her promises and agreements with the testatrix. The evidence fully sustains this finding. The fact that there is also evidence which might have sustained a contrary finding merely presents the familiar situation of a conflict of evidence as to which the finding of the trial court is conclusive.

Appellants next contend that the agreement above mentioned was the product of fraud, both actual and constructive, practiced upon the testatrix by the respondent. We need not pause to inquire whether if this be so the will itself must be deemed to be the product of such fraud, because the trial court found that no fraud or deception was practiced by or in behalf of the respondent. This finding is amply supported by the evidence, even if we accept appellants' contention that a confidential relationship was shown to exist between the testatrix and the respondent, and that the effect thereof was to impose the burden of proof upon the latter.

[11-14] The court found, in response to special interrogatories, that the value of the property devised to respondent was $12,000, and that the value of the real property conveyed by respondent to testatrix was $2,400. Appellants assert that this shows a gross inadequacy of consideration, and they argue that, inasmuch as a confidential relationship existed between testatrix and respondent, it follows that the contract was fraudulent as a matter of law. It is undoubtedly true that, if a contract is entered into between a trustee and his beneficiary through which the former gains an equitable advantage, either by reason of inadequacy of consideration or otherwise, the latter is entitled to rescind the contract, subject to the limitations imposed by the law governing the application of this remedy. Such contract, however, is not void, but is voidable at the election of the beneficiary. Appellants seem to assume that they are entitled in this proceeding to invoke the remedy of rescission which the testatrix might have invoked had she lived, and that they are entitled to have this remedy effectuated by means of a revocation of the probate of the will. Whether or not after the death of the testatrix her heir or a group of her heirs may be entitled to accomplish a rescission in her behalf need not now be determined. It is plain that such remedy, if it be available, must be pursued in a court of equity, not in a court of probate. Estate of Rolls, supra. The trial court found that the agreement between the testatrix and respondent was in no sense unfair or inequitable. This finding is supported by two considerations which the appellants have ignored. An important element of the consideration was the promise of respondent to live with and care for the testatrix during the remainder of the latter's life, which promise was fully kept and performed. The testatrix was suffering in an advanced stage of tuberculosis, was physically helpless, requiring constant care and attention day and night. In addition to giving this care and attention, which was not only most arduous but involved the risk of infection, respondent performed the work and labor of supervising, maintaining, and conducting the lodging house which constituted the sole estate of testatrix. While, as afterward transpired, the testatrix died within less than four weeks after the making of this agreement, none of the parties could then know but that she might continue to live many months or even years thereafter. Furthermore, respondent was the natural object of the bounty of testatrix. She was her nearest of kin and only surviving sister, and there is evidence to the effect that her relationship to the testatrix was closer, more intimate, and more affectionate than that of any of the other heirs. If the testatrix had devised the greater portion of her estate to respondent without having received any consideration therefor from the latter, such disposition of her estate could not have been regarded as unnatural under the circumstances in evidence. In appraising the consideration it is also to be noted that the agreement was not one for the immediate exchange of property. Under it the respondent conveyed her Oklahoma property to testatrix forthwith, but respondent could not hope to come into the enjoyment of the Los Angeles property belonging to testatrix until after the death of the latter and the administration of her estate.

[15] Appellants' contention that the will is the product of undue influence exercised upon the testatrix by the respondent is in the main based upon the same claimed facts and circumstances which are urged by them in support of their allegations of fraud. To review these in detail herein would prolong this opinion to inordinate length. The trial court found that the respondent never at any time exercised any undue influence over the testatrix and that the will was made by the testatrix of her own free will and accord, wholly uninfluenced by any person whatsoever. The testimony of the respondent alone was legally sufficient to support this finding, if believed by the trial judge, as it evidently was. This testimony was not inherently incredible, it was not even improbable, and it was in large part corroborated by other evidence. The trial court was fully justified in giving credit to it. It may be conceded for the purposes hereof that the respondent occupied a fiduciary relationship toward the testatrix; that she gained an advantage from the will; that she was active in the matter of the execution of the will; and that the burden of proof therefore rested upon her to show the absence of fraud and undue influence. The fact remains that the evidence amply supports the findings of the trial court, which fully negative the allegations of fraud and undue influence. No other error or insufficiency is suggested by appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

FEDERAL MUT. LIABILITY INS. CO. v.
INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION
et al. (L. A. 8372.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 16, 1925.)

Master and servant — 388—Child held entitled to compensation as "dependent" of divorced father.

Where divorce decree awarded custody of infant to mother, and husband failed to pay for child's support as directed, for several years, after which he resumed contributions thereto, held that child was entitled to compensation, as dependent, for father's death; the conclusive presumption of total dependency created by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14, subd. a(2), as amended by St. 1919, p. 917, § 5, being applicable, notwithstanding that mother, who had remarried and resided in foreign country, also contributed to child's support.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Charlotte C. Nagel, a minor, by her guardian, for death of her father, opposed by the Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, insurer of the Stephens-Adamson Manufacturing Company, employer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, the insurer petitions for certiorari. Award affirmed.

Willis I. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

W. H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein applies for a writ of review whereby it seeks to have a decision and award of the Industrial Accident Commission reviewed and annulled. The petitioner was and is the insurer of Stephens-Adamson Manufacturing Company of Los Angeles, which was, at the time of his death, the employer of one Carl C. Nagel, whose daughter, Charlotte C. Nagel, a minor, was the applicant for and was granted the award. The facts out of which the present application arose are practically undisputed, and are these: Carl C. Nagel and his wife, Nanette Nagel, who had been married in 1907, were living in the state of Colorado in 1916, having at that time a daughter 7 years old. Nanette Nagel in that year sued her husband for divorce, and, after personal service upon the latter, and in due course, obtained a decree of divorce based upon his misconduct, and whereby it was ordered that the sole care, custody, and control of the said minor child should be and was thereby awarded to the plaintiff, her mother, and that the defendant pay the sum of $25 monthly for the support and maintenance of said minor child until said minor child reached her majority. The plaintiff, after receiving said divorce, continued for some time to reside in the state of Colorado with her minor child, but in the year 1920 remarried and removed to Mexico, where she has since resided, placing her minor daughter at the time in the keeping of Mr. and Mrs. Loftus, the uncle and aunt of said minor, who lived in San Diego, and with whom Charlotte has since resided. Her father, Carl C. Nagel, disappeared at or about the time of the divorce, and made no payments upon the obligation for the support of his minor daughter, who was maintained by her mother while living in Colorado, and by her aunt and mother after she came to reside in San Diego, up to the time when in 1923, the father reappeared and began visiting his daughter and contributing to her support. At that time the father was employed by Stephens-Adamson Manufacturing Company in Los Angeles, and so continued to be up to April 5, 1924, when he was killed while in such employ and in the course of his employment. The child at the time her father thus resumed his parental relations and obligations toward her was of the age of about 15 years. She was attending school and the cost of her food, clothing, incidentals and education was approximately $75 a month. The father from the time he began to visit his daughter began also paying various sums which were applied to her support, and which, according to a fair interpretation of the testimony of Mrs. Loftus, amounted to $35 or $40 a month. He also brought or bought her on the occasion of his visits gifts of various kinds, and took her out with him and gave her pleasure. The mother also during this time sent contributions toward the girl's support. While these conditions existed, Nagel was killed while in the employ of the Stephens-Adamson Manufacturing Company on April 5, 1924; and in due course an application for compensation was filed on behalf of his said daughter by her guardian, Mrs. Loftus, an award upon the basis of total dependency being applied for. The Commission, upon the hearing thereon, at which the foregoing facts were adduced, made an award of $4,900, based upon the conclusive presumption of total dependency under the terms of section 14a of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1919, p. 917), which reads in part as follows:

"Sec. 14 (a) The following shall be conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee * * *

(2) A child or children under the age of eighteen years, * * * upon the parent with whom he or they are living at the time of the injury of such parent or for whose maintenance such parent was legally liable at the time of injury, there being no surviving dependent parent."

The petitioner herein contends that the facts as above set forth furnish no sufficient basis for the application of the conclusive presumption of total dependency provided for in the foregoing section of the Workmen's Compensation Act. In making this contention it relies chiefly upon certain decisions of this court touching the legal liability of a father for the support of his minor child of whose custody he has been deprived by a decree of divorce in an action instituted against him by the mother of the child, and who is by the decree therein awarded the custody of said child. These cases are Matter of McMullin, 164 Cal. 504, 129 P. 773; Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 163 P. 42; and Davies v. Fisher, 34 Cal. App. 137, 166 P. 833. It may be said, however, that, while these several decisions have not been directly overruled in so far as they might be applicable to the particular facts or procedure out of which they arose, they have been materially modified in their application to other facts and circumstances more nearly analogous to the facts of the present proceeding and also in their application to proceedings of this character.

In the case of Sherer, etc., v. Industrial Accident Commission, 182 Cal. 488, 188 P. 798, an award had been made to the minor daughter of a deceased employee upon the basis of total dependency. The facts before the Commission showed that the mother of the child had obtained a decree of divorce against her husband, the deceased employee, wherein she had been awarded the custody of the child, and the father had been ordered to pay $20 a month for its support. The contention was made in that proceeding that the provision in the decree of divorce requiring payment by the father of a specified sum at stated intervals for the support of the child, the custody of which was given to the mother, relieved the father from his legal liability for the support of his child, creating in the place thereof an ordinary debt or obligation. This court held that contention to be without merit; and further held that, when the court in a divorce action had fixed a specified sum for the support of the child, which sum it might vary from time to time in the exercise of a sound discretion, it was competent for the Commission to determine under section 14a (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act that the father was legally liable for the entire maintenance of the child, particularly where, as in that case, the Commission found that the sum of $20 per month was fully sufficient for the support of the child while thus in the custody of its mother. It may be noted at this point and in relation to the case at bar that at the time of the entry of the decree of divorce by the Colorado court the minor child of the parties was but 7 years old, and that the implication from the terms of said decree is that the sum of $25 therein provided for the support of the child was fully sufficient for its support, and hence that the court by the terms of said decree imposed upon the father full liability for the support of the child, in which event the doctrine of the foregoing case would have full application to the case at bar.

In the case of Pacific Gold Dredging Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 184 Cal. 462, 194 P. 1, 13 A. L. R. 725, wherein by its decision the Commission had awarded the maximum amount for total dependency to the minor child upon the death of his father, from whom his mother had some years previous obtained a decree of divorce for the father's misconduct, wherein she had been awarded the exclusive custody of the child, but without any award against the father for its support, and had subsequently disappeared, leaving the child in an orphanage, this court held that, while the father might by such decree be temporarily, and, as between himself and the mother, relieved of his legal duty to support the child while it remained in the custody of the mother, his obligation in that regard might be reassumed by his voluntary contributions toward the support of the child, indicating his resumption of his legal and moral responsibility for the support of his dependent child. This court further said:

"We find no authority for holding that, as between parent and child, the father is absolved from his legal duty to provide support to his minor child who has no other source of maintenance, because, on account of his own fault, he has been deprived of the custody of such child. Both a legal and moral obligation rests upon a father to support his minor children. And while, as between himself and third parties, that obligation may be shifted in proceedings of divorce or guardianship, and he may by misconduct forfeit his right to the custody of his child, it may be doubted if by such proceedings, to which he is not a party, a minor can be deprived of his natural right to turn to his father for maintenance, if the substituted source of supply fails. It has been held that such right to look to a father for maintenance cannot be taken from the infant by contract between the parents (Fernandez v. Aburrea, 42 Cal. App. 131 [183 Pac. 366]), and it certainly would be a reproach upon the law if a father, by his own misconduct making him an unfit custodian of the child, could absolve himself from legal responsibility for its support. He, at least, may voluntarily resume his legal responsibility."

In the case of Llewellyn Iron Works v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 28, 214 P. 846, this court approved the doctrine enunciated in the case last above cited, giving application of its principles to a case wherein there had been a decree of divorce between the father and mother of the child, wherein its custody and control had been awarded to the mother without any provision in the decree for the support of the child by the father. The court held that the attitude and conduct of the father toward the child in buying clothing for it, in making certain payments on account of its support, in having the child in his company at week-ends and on other occasions, in engaging the services of a doctor to correct deficiencies in the eyes of the child, were sufficient to justify the Commission in finding that the father had voluntarily resumed his parental relations and obligations to the child, even though the mother had the custody of the child and was assisting to support it and herself by her labors; and that under such circumstances the relations of parent and child had been restored, and the condition of dependency existed at the time of the father's death as though it had never been disturbed.

In the case of Svoboda v. Superior Court, 190 Cal. 727, 214 P. 440, this court had occasion to further review and reconsider the cases above referred to upon which the petitioner in the instant proceeding chiefly relies. That was a proceeding wherein the superior court of the county of Alameda, sitting as a juvenile court, required the father of a minor child to pay a certain sum monthly to the county in order to reimburse it for the expense of the support of the minor child at the Preston School of Industry, to which said minor had been committed as a ward of said court. The father undertook by his application for a writ of review to have annulled the order of said court made in that behalf, alleging that by a decree of divorce theretofore made and entered against him and in favor of his wife, the child's mother, the custody of the child had been taken from him and awarded to its mother without the imposition in said decree of any obligation upon him for the support of the child. He relied therefore upon the foregoing cases of Lewis v. Lewis, supra, and Matter of McMullin, supra, as absolving him from his legal liability for the further support of the child. This court, however, held that these cases were not to be given such effect, and that the better rule was that announced in the case of Pacific Gold Dredging Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, as above quoted, and should be given application to the facts of that case.

The effect of the foregoing decisions, when applied to the facts of the proceeding before us, is to give full support to the finding of the Commission that a case had been presented to which the provisions of section 14a of the Workmen's Compensation Act, creating a conclusive presumption of total dependency in favor of the minor child of the deceased employee of the Stephens-Adamson Manufacturing Company, of which the petitioner herein was the insurer, could be given application. Whether such conclusion is based upon the proofs of the voluntary resumption on the part of the father of his parental relations and obligations to his child, or upon the legal liability for the support of his child imposed by the terms of the divorce decree, or upon the broader ground of the basic legal obligation imposed by law upon a father to support his dependent child to the end that it shall not become a public charge, the award of the Commission upon either and all of these grounds can be sustained. The fact that the mother of the child, who had committed its custody to other relations, and had remarried and was living in a foreign land and beyond the jurisdiction of our local court, was also contributing somewhat to the child's support is, we think, an entirely immaterial feature of the case.

The award is affirmed.

HAMBLIN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (S. F. 11288.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1925.)

1. Divorce ⇐168—Defense to mandamus on ground that session of court was unauthorized held a collateral attack on judgment.

Where judge granted plaintiff an interlocutory decree of divorce, but later refused to entertain a contempt proceeding based thereon, and defended mandamus proceeding on ground that session of court during which he entered such decree was unauthorized, such contention on his part was in nature of a collateral attack upon judgment.

2. Courts ⇐74, 75—Time and place as essential to valid functioning as presence of judicial officers.

The elements of time and place are as essential to valid functioning of court as presence of duly constituted judicial officers.

3. Courts ⇐74—Divorce ⇐168—Taking of evidence at unauthorized place does not render proceedings absolutely void.

Where complaint in divorce proceedings was duly filed at clerk's office at county seat, summons was issued therefrom and returned thereto with proof of service, and default entered there, taking of testimony in unauthorized place, while error redressible by direct attack, did not render proceedings absolutely void, or vulnerable to collateral attack, especially in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 585.

4. Courts ⇐74—Taking of evidence at unauthorized place, after default, not a "trial."

In a divorce suit, the hearing of testimony at an unauthorized place, after default, was not a "trial" but a hearing by the judge in chambers of evidence, which Civ. Code, § 130, requires to be taken before court.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trial.]

5. Divorce ⇐146—Hearing of evidence in divorce proceedings before court held not jurisdictional.

The requirement of Civ. Code, § 130, requiring proof of facts in divorce proceedings to be taken before court, though mandatory, is not jurisdictional.

6. Judgment §495(1) — All presumptions in favor of judgment on appeal therefrom or where judgment collaterally attacked.

Upon appeal from a judgment, all intentions and presumptions are in support thereof, and this rule applies in cases of collateral attack upon a judgment.

7. Divorce §168—Cannot be collaterally attacked, unless void on face.

A judgment of court of record cannot be collaterally attacked, unless it is void on its face, and this rule applies to a judgment of divorce.

8. Judgment §485—Judgment not void on face, unless alleged defects apparent from judgment roll.

Judgment is not void on its face, unless alleged defects are apparent from inspection of judgment roll.

Application for writ of mandate by Edna R. Hamblin against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Hartley Shaw, Judge. Writ issued.

P. B. Dougherty, of Los Angeles, and J. E. Pawson and Underwood, Burke & Cree, all of Long Beach, for petitioner.

Roy W. Dowds, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MYERS, C. J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent court and the respondent judge thereof to proceed with the hearing and determination of a certain contempt proceeding now pending before it, the object of which is the enforcement of the provisions of an interlocutory decree heretofore rendered by said court in a suit for divorce. The facts are undisputed, and the matter is submitted for determination upon the allegations of the petition and a general demurrer thereto. Petitioner herein is the plaintiff in whose favor the interlocutory decree above mentioned was rendered in the divorce action. The defendant therein, who was personally served with summons, defaulted, and, his default having been regularly entered, the cause was thereafter assigned to and set for hearing before Department 28 of the superior court of Los Angeles county, sitting at the city of Long Beach, in said county, and was there heard on the day set, at which time and place an interlocutory decree of divorce was ordered by the court in favor of plaintiff, with provision therein for the payment by defendant to plaintiff of certain alimony and suit money. An interlocutory decree in accordance with this order was thereafter signed by the judge and filed in said action in the office of the county clerk of said county in the courthouse at the county seat thereof, and was duly entered in the judgment records of said court in said office. Thereafter the defendant therein, having neglected to make the payments so ordered, was cited to appear before the court to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. When that matter came on for hearing, the respondent judge, being of the opinion that the sessions of court at Long Beach were unauthorized, and that the interlocutory decree was therefore void, announced his refusal to further entertain the contempt proceeding based thereon, whereupon this proceeding was initiated for the purpose of compelling him to proceed with the hearing and determination thereof. It has since been determined that the statute which purported to authorize the holding of sessions of the superior court of Los Angeles county at Long Beach is unconstitutional, as being special legislation (In re Brady [Cal. App.] 224 P. 252; In re Seiler [Cal. Sup.] 227 P. 1116), and respondent contends that the judgment so rendered is void as a consequence.

[1] This contention on respondent's part is in the nature of a collateral attack upon the judgment (Howe v. Southrey, 144 Cal. 767, 769, 78 P. 259; see, also, Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 484, 86 P. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491), and the question to be determined upon this proceeding, therefore, is whether the judgment so rendered is wholly void or merely erroneous. Respondent suggests that this question has already been determined in and by the two cases first above cited. It is true that those cases, being proceedings in habeas corpus, were in the nature of collateral attacks upon the proceedings then pending before the superior court at Long Beach, (15 Cal. Jur. p. 46), and the granting of the writ therein might therefore be regarded as an implied adjudication that the court proceedings thus attacked were void. But neither of said cases expressly so holds, and it does not appear to have been the intention of the court in either case to decide this particular question. There was no controversy upon this question in the Seiler Case, either in the briefs of counsel or at the hearing. The petitioner therein asserted that the statute purporting to authorize the sessions of the court at Long Beach was unconstitutional, and that the proceedings at such session were therefore void. Counsel for respondent therein did not challenge the latter assertion, but devoted all of their argument to the question of the constitutionality of the statute, so that this was the only question in controversy between the parties in that proceeding. Counsel for respondent in the Brady Case expressly conceded that, if the statute was unconstitutional, the proceedings would be void, and the court was not called upon to decide the question here presented. It may be that counsel in those cases were so desirous of procuring an adjudication of the question of the constitutionality of the statute that they purposely refrained from argument upon the other question. While we are satisfied with and adhere to the conclusion expressed in those two cases, namely, that the act purporting to authorize the holding of sessions of the superior court at Long Beach is unconstitutional, nevertheless, for the reasons indicated, we are not disposed to regard those cases as determinative of the question here presented.

[2] The general rule is that the elements of time and place are as essential to the valid functioning of a court as is the presence of the duly constituted judicial officers. White County Commissioners v. Gwin, 136 Ind. 562, 36 N. E. 237, 22 L. R. A. 402; State v. Atherton, 19 Nev. 332, 10 P. 901; Lewis v. City of Hoboken, 42 N. J. Law, 377; In re McClaskey, 2 Okl. 568, 37 P. 854; In re Lawyers' Tax Cases, 8 Heisk. (55 Tenn.) 565, at 650; Levey v. Bigelow, 6 Ind. App. 677, 34 N. E. 128; 15 Cor. Jur. 895; 7 R. C. L. 992. This rule is well stated in White County Commissioners v. Gwin, supra, as follows:

"A court is an instrumentality of government. It is a creation of the law, and in some respects it is an imaginary thing, that exists only in legal contemplation, very similar to a corporation. A time when, a place where, and the persons by whom, judicial functions are to be exercised are essential to complete the idea of a court. It is in its organized aspect, with all these constituent elements of time, place, and officers, that completes the idea of a court in the general legal acceptance of the term."

When we come to consider the effect upon the validity of the proceedings of the absence of one of these constituent elements, as to whether the proceedings are thereby rendered void or merely erroneous, we find no uniformity of decision. There are numerous cases holding that the proceedings of a court at a time or place other than that prescribed by law are coram non iudice and void. Johnston v. Hunter, 50 W. Va. 52, 40 S. E. 448; Ex parte Gardner, 22 Nev. 280, 39 P. 570; Coulter v. Routt County, 9 Colo. 258, 11 P. 199; Patton v. State, 160 Ala. 111, 49 So. 809; Williams v. Reutzel, 60 Ark. 155, 29 S. W. 374; Hanley v. City of Medford, 56 Or. 171, 108 P. 188; Shold v. Van Treeck, 82 Neb. 99, 117 N. W. 113; Mattox v. Dunklin, 39 So. 579; State v. Osborn, 36 Kan. 530, 13 P. 850. Many of the cases so holding, however, are cases of direct attack by appeal, wherein the question whether the proceedings were void, as distinguished from erroneous, was not necessarily involved. Some of them were cases wherein a court of one judicial district had attempted to function within the territorial limits of another judicial district. Johnston v. Hunter, supra; Ex parte Gardner, supra, and Hanley v. City of Medford, supra. Others were cases wherein all of the proceedings in the action, from the filing of the first pleading to the entry of final judgment, were had at a place unauthorized by law (Patton v. State, supra; Williams v. Reutzel, supra, and Mattox v. Dunklin, supra), or where the court had not been legally created (In re Davis, 62 Kan. 231, 61 P. 809), or where an attempt was made to hold a county court in an unorganized county (State v. Osborn, 36 Kan. 530, 13 P. 850), or where a hearing was held at an unauthorized place and without any notice (White v. Riggs, 27 Me. 114).

[3, 4] It is to be noted that in the case here under consideration the only thing that was done by the court at an unauthorized place was the hearing of testimony. The complaint was duly filed at the clerk's office at the county seat. The summons was issued therefrom, was personally served, and was returned with proof of service thereto and filed therein. The default of the defendant was duly entered and noted by the clerk at his office at the county seat. The case was set for hearing by the presiding judge sitting at the county seat and by him assigned to the department sitting at Long Beach. The decision, consisting of the findings, conclusions, and judgment signed by the judge, was filed in the clerk's office at the county seat, and there entered in the judgment record. The only defect in the proceeding, therefore, consists in the taking of evidence at an unauthorized place. While this constitutes error redressible by means of a direct attack by motion or appeal, it is not usually regarded as rendering the proceedings absolutely void so as to be vulnerable to a collateral attack. Selleck v. Janesville, 100 Wis. 157, 75 N. W. 975, 69 Am. St. Rep. 906, 41 L. R. A. 563, and note; Bell v. Jarvis, 98 Minn. 109, 107 N. W. 547, 8 Ann. Cas. 938; Carter v. State, 100 Miss. 343, 56 So. 454, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 369, and note; People v. Pompa, 192 Cal. 412, 221 P. 198. Respondent suggests that the Pompa Case is to be distinguished from the one here under consideration by the circumstance that in that case the court met regularly at the time and place provided by law, and there proceeded to the trial of the case; that the trial was regularly held and conducted at the place provided by law, with the sole exception that some testimony was taken during a view of the premises by the jurors; that this constituted a mere irregularity insufficient to deprive the court of that jurisdiction which it acquired by the beginning of the trial at the regular time and place, whereas, in the present case, the entire trial was held at an unauthorized place. It is to be noted, however, that the taking of testimony in the present case did not constitute the holding of a trial in the strict sense of the word. There were no issues of fact upon which a trial was required. The default of the defendant admitted all of the allegations of the complaint. Upon the entry of such default the court might have rendered judgment for the plaintiff without the taking of any evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 585; City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles F. & M. Co., 150 Cal. 647, 89 P. 615), except for the requirement of section 130 of the Civil Code, which forbids the granting of a divorce upon the default of the defendant or upon the uncorroborated admissions of the parties. This section requires proof of the facts alleged, either "taken before the court" or "upon written questions and answers," but it is not to be construed as raising "issues of fact" in case of default, nor as constituting the taking of proof, in such case, a "trial," as that term is used in the provisions relating to new trial (Foley v. Foley, 120 Cal. 33, 52 P. 122, 65 Am. St. Rep. 147), nor as requiring written findings of fact and conclusions of law (Waldecker v. Waldecker, 178 Cal. 566, 174 P. 36). This case, therefore, strictly speaking, is not one where a trial was had at an unauthorized place, but is rather one wherein proof which the law requires to be "taken before the court" was in fact taken before the judge.

This court in its early decisions applied with great strictness the rule which requires the concurrence of the elements of time, place, and judicial officers to render valid a judgment or order which under the law could be made only by the court. In Smith v. Chichester, 1 Cal. 409, a judgment of the district court which was rendered in vacation between two terms of court was held invalid. In Wicks v. Ludwig, 9 Cal. 173, and in Bates v. Gage, 40 Cal. 183, judgments rendered under similar circumstances were held to be void. In Larco v. Casaneuava, 30 Cal. 560, where, in an action pending in San Mateo county, the trial judge, while sitting in chambers in the city and county of San Francisco, heard and acted upon a motion to strike out defendant's demurrers as sham, this action was held to be error, but the judgment for plaintiff was nevertheless affirmed. In Norwood v. Kenfield, 34 Cal. 329, where the trial judge made an order at chambers continuing the trial of a case to a time in vacation between terms of court, and held the trial at that time over the objection of defendant, this court held that the judge at chambers had no authority to make such order, and that the order so made and the trial so held in vacation pursuant thereto were void. It may be that the strictness with which the rule was applied in those early cases was one of the considerations which moved the framers of the Constitution of 1879 to abolish terms of court and to provide that the superior court "shall always be open (legal holidays and non-judicial days excepted) * * *," Article 6, § 5. However this may be, the strictness of the early rule was abrogated and the early cases above cited (though not mentioned therein) were in effect overruled in 1872 in the case of Ex parte Bennett, 44 Cal. 84. This case is very nearly on all fours with the case at bar. It also involved a contempt proceeding, the object of which was the enforcement of a decree of divorce. It, however, was not a default case, but one in which an answer had been filed raising issues of fact. By consent of the parties it was set for hearing before the judge at chambers in vacation between terms of court, and was so heard and decided, and judgment was rendered in vacation and entered nunc pro tunc as of the preceding term of court. There, as here, the defendant having failed to make the payments provided for in the decree, was cited in a contempt proceeding, and there made the point that the judgment, being based upon a trial had at a time and at a place not authorized by law, was void. The contention was rejected by this court, and the following language from the opinion is especially pertinent to the present situation:

"The principal objection made for the petitioner, as we understand it, is that the cause was tried at chambers, and not in open court; and it is said that there is no authority to try a cause except in open court.

"But, even if this be so, we do not see that it would follow that a judgment rendered in a cause which had been tried at chambers would for that reason necessarily be void in the absolute sense.

"The district court in Sonoma unquestionably had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties litigant. Had the court itself rendered the judgment in question in open session at a regular term, without trial, without proof, and even without submission of the cause for decision, such judgment, however erroneous, would not be held void upon a mere collateral attack. To maintain that it would, would be to ignore the obvious distinction between a total want of authority upon the one hand, and the erroneous exercise of conceded authority upon the other. * * *

"The hearing of proofs, the argument of counsel—in other words, the trial had, or the absence of any or all of these—neither confer jurisdiction in the first instance, nor take it away after it has once fully attached."

The cases of Johnston v. S. F. Savings Union, 75 Cal. 134, 139, 16 P. 753, 7 Am. St. Rep. 129; Beaulieu Vineyard Co. v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 242, 248, 250, 91 P. 1015; Dahlgren v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 622, 626 et seq., 97 P. 681; People v. Maljan, 34 Cal. App. 384, 167 P. 547; and McGrath v. Langford, 35 Cal. App. 215, 169 P. 424, also lend support to the conclusions there reached. The case last cited is quite in point here. In that case a demurrer to the complaint filed in the justice's court was set for hearing at 3 o'clock p. m. on a Saturday, which was a nonjudicial day. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 10, 133, 134. The demurrer was heard and overruled at that time in the absence of the defendant. It was held that this action was erroneous but not void, and that the judgment based thereon was invulnerable upon collateral attack. There is language used in the opinion in Shepherd v. Superior Court, 54 Cal. App. 673, 202 P. 466, which, when read apart from its context, seems to conflict with the conclusions indicated in the last cited cases, but when it is read in the light of the facts of the case there under consideration no such conflict will be found. It may be conceded that a judgment cannot be legally rendered by the mere telephoning of a statement to that effect from the judge's residence to the office of the clerk upon a nonjudicial day, but the filing in the clerk's office of a written judgment signed by the judge (as was done here) does constitute in law a rendition of such judgment. In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 221, 16 P. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146; Baker v. Brickell, 102 Cal. 620, 623, 36 P. 950; Powell v. Mohr (Cal. App.) 230 P. 27.

[5] It must be conceded that the department of the superior court while sitting at Long Beach was not regularly functioning as a court. The result is that the evidence so heard by it was in effect heard by the judge "in chambers." Under the rule adhered to in the later decisions of this state this circumstance does not render the judgment void. It was undoubtedly erroneous, and might have furnished ground for a reversal of the judgment upon appeal, unless the suffering of default by the defendant be deemed a waiver of his right to object to such irregularity or be regarded as a consent thereto. It was a violation of the mandate contained in section 130 of the Civil Code requiring proof of the facts alleged to be "taken before the court." But we are satisfied that this requirement, though mandatory, is not jurisdictional. The provision of section 128 of the Civil Code, forbidding the granting of a divorce unless the plaintiff has been a resident of the state and of the county for the time specified, is of a similar character. This requirement has sometimes been spoken of as "jurisdictional." Flynn v. Flynn, 171 Cal. 746, 154 P. 837; Gould v. Gould, 188 Cal. 505, 205 P. 1072. But it has never been so decided, so far as we are advised, in any case wherein that question was actually involved. In the cases in which this question has been actually involved and decided it has been held that this requirement is not jurisdictional, and that the failure to comply with it is nothing more than error in the exercise of jurisdiction. Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 339, 100 P. 1086; Dahne v. Superior Court, 31 Cal. App. 664, 161 P. 280; Bullard v. Bullard, 189 Cal. 502, 506, 209 P. 361. The same reasoning applies with equal force to the provisions of section 130 of the Civil Code, and it follows by parity of reasoning that these requirements are not jurisdictional and that a failure to comply with them results in mere error, correctible only by means of a direct attack by appeal or motion in the same case.

[6-8] It may be suggested that we are not entitled to assume upon the record herein that the court in the divorce action did fail to comply with the requirements of section 130. These requirements are, in the alternative, that the court require proof of the facts alleged, either "taken before the court" or "upon written questions and answers." It is nowhere alleged herein that the proofs taken herein were not taken upon written questions and answers. Upon an appeal from a judgment all intentions and presumptions are in support thereof, and this rule applies a fortiori in cases of collateral attack upon a judgment. But we are satisfied, for the reasons above indicated, that a failure to comply with the requirements of this section would not render the judgment void. In our consideration of the case thus far we have assumed as a fact that the judgment under consideration is subject to the defects which we have been discussing, but it is to be doubted that such assumption is justified by the record herein. The general rule is that a judgment of a court of record cannot be collaterally assailed unless it is void on its face. 15 Cal. Jur. p. 45. This rule applies equally to a judgment of divorce. 9 Cal. Jur., p. 750. A judgment of a court of record is not void upon its face, unless the defects which render it void are apparent upon an inspection of the judgment roll. Estate of McNeil, supra. It nowhere appears from the record herein that the defects that we have been here considering are apparent from an inspection of the judgment roll, nor does it seem probable that they would so appear. On the contrary, it seems most probable that an inspection of the judgment roll in the divorce action would disclose no defect whatever therein.

It is our conclusion that upon the showing here made the judgment in question cannot be said to be void, and it must therefore be deemed to be valid for the purposes of this proceeding. It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue herein, directing the respondents to proceed as soon as practicable with the hearing and determination of said contempt proceeding.

BAUER et al. v. WILLIS, Judge.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1925.)

Executors and administrators §35(19)—Order denying petition to remove executor held appealable, and it was duty of judge to settle and certify transcript on appeal therefrom.

An order denying petition to remove an executor is in effect an order refusing to revoke letters testamentary, and hence is appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, and, where petitioners, in appealing from such order, complied with section 953 et seq., it was duty of judge to settle and certify transcript to be used upon such appeal.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Hamilton A. Bauer and others to be directed to Frank R. Willis, as Judge of Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles, to compel respondent to certify transcript on appeal. Writ granted.

Hamilton A. Bauer, of San Francisco, and O. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Stanley K. Brown, of Pasadena, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application to compel the respondent, as judge of the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, to certify a transcript to be used upon appeal from an order heretofore made and entered by said court. There is no controversy as to the facts herein, and it appears from the record that one of the petitioners herein heretofore filed a petition in said court in the matter of the estate of Emile Bauer, deceased, for an order restraining the executors of the will of said deceased from selling and disposing of certain assets of the estate claimed to have been specifically bequeathed to petitioners. Thereafter another petition was filed therein by others of the petitioners herein, praying for the same relief, and in addition thereto asking for "the removal of said executors." A citation was issued, the matter came on for hearing before the court, and a hearing was had and evidence taken upon both of said petitions. Both of said petitions were thereupon regularly submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and thereafter the court made its order denying said petitions, which was in part as follows:

"Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed * * * that the citation issued herein be and the same is hereby dismissed, and the petition for removal of executors be and the same is hereby denied."

Said order also awarded costs in favor of the respondents therein and against the petitioners herein. Thereafter and within due time the petitioners appealed from said order, requested and procured a transcript of the testimony, etc., pursuant to section 953 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, and presented the same to the respondent judge for settlement and certification. Respondent refused to settle or certify the same solely upon the ground that the said order was not an appealable order. Petitioners point to the fact that appeals from similar orders have been frequently entertained and acted upon without question by this court and by the District Court of Appeal, citing In re Newell, 18 Cal. App. 258, 122 P. 1099; Estate of Healy, 137 Cal. 474, 70 P. 455; Estate of Bell, 135 Cal. 194, 67 P. 123; Estate of Rathgeb, 125 Cal. 302, 57 P. 1010; Estate of Welch, 86 Cal. 179, 24 P. 943; Estate of Kelley, 122 Cal. 379, 55 P. 136. To this respondent replied that in none of these cases was the point argued as to whether or not an appeal was proper, "and in no case was the discretion of a trial court disturbed by a successful appeal." Respondent is correct in his first point but incorrect as to the second. In the Estate of Welch, supra, the order of the trial court removing an administrator was reversed upon appeal. It is true that the cited cases are not to be regarded as direct determinations upon the question of the appealability of an order removing or refusing to remove an executor or administrator. They are somewhat persuasive, however, in view of the circumstance that some of them appear to have been vigorously litigated, and yet it does not appear that in any of them the appealability of the order was even questioned. This question, however, is settled by the provisions of the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3. It is there provided that an appeal may be taken "from a judgment or order granting or refusing to grant, revoking or refusing to revoke, letters testamentary, or of administration. * * *" The removal of an executor of necessity involves and includes the revocation of his letters testamentary, and it follows that an order refusing to remove an executor is in effect an order refusing to revoke letters testamentary. It follows that the order involved herein is appealable to the extent that it denied the petition for the removal of the executors, and it was the duty of the respondent judge to settle and certify the transcript to be used upon such appeal.

It is therefore ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue herein as prayed.

1. Insurance — 587—Beneficiary, preventing indorsement of change of beneficiary through fraud and concealment of policy, cannot urge absence of such indorsement.

Beneficiary, preventing indorsement of change of beneficiary on policy by fraud and deceit and concealing policy, cannot claim proceeds because of absence of such indorsement, where insured has done all in his power to effect the change.

2. Insurance — 587, 780—Principles governing change of beneficiary apply to fraternal and ordinary life insurance companies.

Equitable principles governing right to change beneficiary apply alike to fraternal and ordinary life insurance companies.

3. Insurance — 587—Indorsement of change of beneficiary on policy can be enforced after death of insured.

Although name of new beneficiary was not indorsed on policy under which insured had right to change beneficiary, he could still enforce such indorsement after insured's death, where policy provided that change should relate back to date insured signed notice.

4. Insurance — 587—Judgment for new beneficiary not reversed, although name not indorsed on policy.

Although name of new beneficiary was not indorsed on policy, judgment awarding her proceeds of policy will not be reversed, where indorsement could be enforced after insured's death so as to make her sole beneficiary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Action in interpleader by the New York Life Insurance Company against Tony S. Rose and Mary S. Rose, also known as Mrs. R. S. Rose. From judgment for last named defendant, first named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. Gonsalves and E. E. Gehring, both of Oakland, for appellant.

A. A. Rogers, of Oakland (Henry G. Tardy, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an action in interpleader wherein plaintiff, New York Life Insurance Company, required the two defendants to litigate their respective claims to the proceeds of a certain policy of life insurance issued to Joe L. Rose. The insurance company deposited the proceeds of the policy, less certain expenses, and was discharged. The trial was had upon the cross-complaint of Mary S. Rose and the answer thereto filed by Tony S. Rose. Judgment went to Mary S. Rose, from which Tony S. Rose appeals under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The facts of the case as found by the trial court are that on July 8, 1919, the insurance company issued its policy of insurance upon the life of Joe L. Rose in the sum of $2,000. His mother, Mary S. Rose, and her husband were named the beneficiaries. On October 17, 1921, the insured requested the insurer to substitute Tony S. Rose, an uncle of the insured, as sole beneficiary, and the change was duly indorsed upon the policy by the insurer. The policy so indorsed was then delivered by the insured to the new beneficiary, who kept it in his possession. Thereafter, and on December 20, 1922, the insured desired to substitute his mother as sole beneficiary, and from that date until February 3, 1923, made frequent demands upon his uncle for the surrender of the policy. To these demands the uncle replied that the policy was lost; that he did not have it in his possession, and did not know where it was; that all these statements were false and untrue; that the uncle "kept and concealed said policy of insurance for the purpose of endeavoring to prevent said insured, Joe L. Rose, from designating Mary S. Rose * * * as beneficiary thereunder and for the purpose of securing the proceeds of said policy of insurance for himself; and that he so kept and concealed said policy of insurance until after the death of said insured." On February 3, 1923, the insured signed a written request for a change of beneficiary to Mary S. Rose, and mailed this to the insurer, together with his affidavit showing the loss of the policy through his uncle's refusal to make delivery thereof. These documents were received by the insurer after the death of the insured, but the company did not indorse the change of beneficiary on the face of the policy, as required by its rules, because the insurer was unable to deliver the policy for that purpose. The court found that the insured complied with all the rules of the company for the purpose of making the substitution to the extent to which he had the power to comply. He also found that, after these proceedings were commenced, Tony S. Rose surrendered the original policy to the insurer and demanded the full amount due thereunder.

[1] The outstanding fact in these findings, the truth of which is not controverted, is that the appellant, through fraud and deceit, prevented the insured from making a complete substitution of the beneficiary and concealed the policy in order to secure the proceeds for himself. On these facts the trial court held that equity foreclosed the appellant from asserting any claim to the proceeds of the policy.

In the argument on appeal the appellant insists that we should follow the rule of Freund v. Freund, 218 Ill. 189, 75 N. E. 925, 109 Am. St. Rep. 283, where the Supreme Court of Illinois in a similar case held that, as the insurance policy provided that no change of beneficiary should be effective until indorsed on the policy at the company's home office, an attempt to make such a change by written notice mailed before the death of the insured but received by the company after the death did not confer any rights upon the new beneficiary. The case was decided in 1905, and involved an interpretation of a policy which did not give to the insured the absolute right to change the beneficiary, but required the consent of the company before a change should become effective. The rule of the decision is really based on this distinction, the court holding that the policy was a contract between the insured and the company in which both agreed that a substitution could be effected only in the manner specified. However, the court expressly recognized the rule of those cases which holds that, when the insured reserves the right to change the beneficiary and the indorsement of the company is merely a ministerial act, the original beneficiary cannot by his own fraud prevent an indorsement of the substitution and then prevail over the one who was attempted to be substituted. The respondent concedes that the general rule is as stated in the Illinois case, but she relies upon the well-recognized exception to this rule that, where the original beneficiary through fraud prevents an indorsement by the company of a change in the beneficiary, or where the insured has done all in his power to effect the change, and the indorsement is merely a ministerial act, the old beneficiary cannot urge that the change was not effective because the indorsement was not made on the policy.

The proposition for which the respondent contends is supported by authorities in this state and by the great weight of authority in other jurisdictions. The leading case in this state is Jory v. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor, 105 Cal. 20, 38 P. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17. In that case the original beneficiary had possession of the insurance policy, and refused to deliver it to the insured, and kept it concealed in order to prevent the insured from substituting a new beneficiary. As in our case, the insured had taken all reasonable means to effect the change, but the insurer had refused to indorse the change without presentation of the policy. The Supreme Court held that the exception to the rule heretofore noted at pages 26 and 27 (38 P. 525), "is builded upon the principle that equity does not demand impossible things, and will consider that done which ought to have been done; and is embraced within the proposition that when the insured complies with all the requirements of the rules for the purpose of making the substitution of beneficiaries, with which he has the power to comply, he has done all that a court of equity demands;" citing cases. Again, in the same case the court said at page 27 (38 P. 526):

"But there is another well-settled principle of equity equally fatal to appellant's claims. No person can take advantage of his own wrong * * * if a fraud of her own [the original beneficiary] practicing prevented a legal substitution of beneficiaries, then as against her an equitable substitution will be held to have taken place."

This rule has been followed by the courts of so many jurisdictions that it has become an accepted principle. See Supreme Conclave, etc., v. Cappella (C. C.) 41 F. 1, 7; Rollins v. McHatton, 16 Colo. 203, 27 P. 254, 255, 25 Am. St. Rep. 260; Marsh v. Supreme Council American Legion of Honor, 149 Mass. 512, 21 N. E. 1070, 1072, 4 L. R. A. 382; Taff v. Smith, 114 S. C. 306, 103 S. E. 551, 553; John Hancock Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Bedford et al., 36 R. I. 116, 89 A. 154, 155; Polish Nat. Alliance of the United States v. Nagrabski, 71 N. J. Eq. 621, 64 A. 471, 473; Holden v. Modern Brotherhood of America, 151 Ga. 673, 132 N. W. 329, 332; Gross v. Strzyzowski, 124 Ill. App. 300. In the latter case the opinion was written at about the same time that Freund v. Freund was written by the Illinois Supreme Court. A petition for rehearing was filed in the Gross Case based on the opinion in the Freund Case. In denying the petition the appellate court drew the distinction between a case of mere failure to comply with the company's rules in changing the beneficiary and a case where the change was prevented by the fraud of the beneficiary.

[2] Appellant argues that the rule of Jory v. Supreme Council, etc., and similar cases should be confined to policies issued by fraternal insurance societies, while the rule of the Freund Case should govern policies issued by ordinary life insurance companies. There is really no distinction in this respect between the two kinds of policies as now issued. Love v. Clune, 24 Colo. 237, 50 P. 34. The cases upon which appellant relies involved policies of ordinary life insurance companies in which the insured had not reserved the right to change the beneficiary, but where this right is reserved the equitable principles which we have discussed apply with like effect to both classes of policies.

[3, 4] The policy under consideration in our case expressly reserved to the insured the right at any time to change the beneficiary without the consent of the original beneficiary. It provided that such change must be indorsed on the policy by the insurer, and that after such indorsement the change should relate back to the date the insured signed the notice of change "whether the insured be living at the time of such indorsement or not." It was therefore merely a ministerial duty on the part of the insurer to indorse the change. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Lowther, 22 Colo. App. 622, 126 P. 882, 885; Quist v. Western & Southern Life Ins. Co., 219 Mich. 406, 189 N. W. 49, 51. This would become effective as of February 3, 1923, prior to the death of the insured. If we should reverse the case, the respondent would still have the right to enforce this indorsement, and in that event she would become the sole beneficiary as of February 3, 1923. Thus a reversal would have no other effect than to cause useless and unnecessary litigation which must result in a judgment for the respondent such as we now have on this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

LYLE v. SELLER et al. (Civ. 4909.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 19, 1924.)

1. Damages ⇐39—Recoverable where plaintiff deprived of use of her machine while being repaired.

Where defendant's negligence caused automobile collision, plaintiff could recover damages for use of her machine while being repaired.

2. Damages ⇐188(1)—Finding that 23 days was reasonable time to make repairs on plaintiff's machine sustained.

Evidence held to sustain finding that reasonable time for making repairs on plaintiff's machine, damaged by defendant's negligence, was 23 days.

3. Damages ⇐39—Automobile owner entitled to damages for deprivation of its use, including delay in arrival of parts.

Plaintiff physician, whose car was damaged by collision occasioned by defendant's negligence, held entitled to damages for deprivation of its use during time necessarily consumed in making proper repairs, including delay in arrival of parts ordered from a distant city because unavailable elsewhere.

4. Damages ⇐42—Amount paid chauffeur during time car was out of commission held recoverable.

Where defendant's negligence caused automobile collision, plaintiff could recover reasonable amount which she was compelled to pay her chauffeur during time her car was out of commission, where payment was shown to have been made, and she had no use for chauffeur during that time.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Annie G. Lyle against Mrs. A. Seller and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Theodore Hale and Barry J. Colding, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Peter A. Breen and Wilson & Wilson, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages in the sum of $1,008.75 claimed to have been suffered by the plaintiff as the result of an automobile collision brought about through the negligence of defendant Mrs. A. Seller. The amount sued for is composed of the following items: $234.05, cost of making repairs to plaintiff's automobile; $487 for deprivation of its use while undergoing such repairs; and the sum of $80 paid as wages by plaintiff to a chauffeur regularly employed by her to drive her said car.

At the trial it was shown in evidence that plaintiff is a regularly licensed and practicing physician and surgeon engaged in the practice of her profession in San Francisco, in the carrying on of which she requires the constant use of an automobile. It was admitted by said defendant that the collision occurred solely through her negligence, and that the sum of $234.05 was actually paid for repairs necessitated by the collision, and that she is liable for said amount; her objections being directed to other items of damage included in the judgment against her. In this behalf it appeared from the evidence that the repairs to plaintiff's car included the installation of a new radiator; that part of her automobile having been rendered entirely useless by the collision. It also appears that certain necessary parts for the repair of the car had to be procured from the East, and this entailed considerable delay. After arranging for the repair of the automobile plaintiff hired a taxicab for her professional use during a period of three weeks, the cost of which is included in the amount claimed for deprivation of the use of her car. She also during the whole time that it was undergoing repairs retained in her service her regularly employed chauffeur, to whom she paid wages at the rate of $25 a week. In her claim for damages she has included such wages for a period of about three weeks, although, as she testified she was deprived of the use of her car for upwards of three months.

Upon this evidence the court found that the cost of repairing the automobile was $234.05; that plaintiff was deprived of the use thereof for the period of 23 days, to her damage in the sum of $140, and that she was further damaged in the sum of $82.10 paid as wages to her chauffeur during such period of deprivation. Judgment was accordingly entered for the sum of $456.15, the total of the foregoing amounts.

Appellant concedes the correctness of the judgment in so far as it awards to plaintiff the cost of repairs of the automobile, but contends that the amount allowed for loss of use is excessive, and plaintiff's right to recover the amount paid as wages to her chauffeur is denied. The only questions therefore to be considered are: First, was the amount allowed as damages for loss of use excessive? and, second, is plaintiff entitled to recover as damages the wages paid to her regularly employed chauffeur while the damaged car was being repaired?

[1-4] The evidence is clearly sufficient to support the findings. The claim that the greater portion of the time consumed in making the repairs was due to the delay in the arrival of the necessary parts from the East can avail appellant nothing. Plaintiff was entitled to have her machine restored to the same condition it was in immediately prior to the injury. She was also entitled to damages for deprivation of its use during the time necessarily consumed in making the proper repairs. It was due to no fault of hers that the collision occurred, and she was not responsible for the delay made necessary by reason of the fact that the parts were not immediately available. So far as the evidence shows, she was not informed that it was necessary to send East for them, and she knew nothing about the matter when the repairs were ordered to be made, being merely informed that it would not take long to repair the car and in the meantime she hired a taxicab for her professional use. Nor does it appear that there was any unreasonable delay in the arrival of the parts. That temporary repairs might have been made permitting of the use of the car pending the arrival of the parts from the East was also a matter she was not informed of, so far as the record shows, if indeed it could be said that it was incumbent upon her, if she had such knowledge, to use a damaged car pending the arrival of the parts. Moreover, the court limited its award of damages for deprivation of the use of the car to 23 days, thus discounting quite liberally plaintiff's claim under this head. The time consumed in making repairs of the character here involved was a proper element of damage, and the evidence fully supports the finding in this particular. Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 201 P. 471. The court having found that the reasonable time for making the necessary repairs to the plaintiff's car was a period of 23 days, it included in the judgment a corresponding amount for the chauffeur's wages. The reasonable amount which an owner of an automobile is compelled to pay a chauffeur during the time that the car is out of commission is also a proper element of damage when payment is shown to have been made and the owner had no use for the chauffeur during that time. Cook v. Packard Motor Car Co., 88 Conn. 590, 92 A. 413, L. R. A. 1915C, 319; Blakemore on Motor Vehicles (2d Ed.) § 1745.

There is ample evidence in the record to sustain both of the elements of damage objected to. This being so, the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas Monroe, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Pickering against Cora Havens. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Leon R. Yankwich and F. W. Shelley, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hahn, Hahn & Landreth, of Pasadena, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Action to recover damages for malicious prosecution. Judgment rendered in favor of defendant and plaintiff appeals. Appellant and her husband, John W. Pickering, were the owners of the Raymond Villa, a rooming house in the city of Pasadena, together with the furniture therein. On February 16, 1920, they leased these premises to the respondent, and at the same time they sold to respondent all the furniture in said rooming house, excepting certain specific articles. A written lease to the premises was executed by the parties and appellant and her husband also gave to respondent a bill of sale of the furniture sold. In the bill of sale the furniture reserved from the sale by appellant and her husband was particularly described and excepted from the sale. There was also a separate list of this reserved furniture, made out and signed by respondent, and given to the Pickerings. It was agreed by the parties at the time, and so specified in writing, that the furniture reserved by the appellant and her husband should remain in the lodging house until other furniture belonging to the respondent should arrive from the East. Respondent paid to the appellant and her husband for said furniture the sum of $1,200. She also paid them two months' rental of the rooming house and took possession of the house and furniture immediately after the sale. A Mr. Hisey had acted as the agent of appellant and her husband in their negotiations with the respondent, and had prepared the above-mentioned papers evidencing the transaction between the parties. Some time after the sale, and probably a few days prior to March 31, 1920, appellant's husband called upon Mr. Hisey and said to him "that, when they went out to look for a house or apartment such as they thought they wanted, they found that the rents and everything had gone very high, much higher than they had expected, and he thought they had sold their stuff too cheap." He practically demanded of Mr. Hisey that the latter do something to annul the sale or change it. Mr. Hisey explained to Mr. Pickering that the sale had been made as agreed upon, and that the transaction was a closed one, and that it was beyond his power to do anything in the way of changing the terms of the sale. A rather lengthy conversation was had between the two, and finally Mr. Pickering said:

"Well, we have been a couple of old fools, that is all. I'm going to law about this anyway."

About this time Mr. Pickering called upon respondent and stated that he was going to sell what things he had in the house. Respondent replied that he hadn't anything except the things he had reserved. Pickering replied, "Why I certainly have." Respondent then got her bill of sale and showed it to Pickering, who said, "We did sign that, didn't we; I didn't remember?" He then said, "We will have to go to law about this." The next day Pickering and his wife came to the lodging house and began removing a portion of the furniture which they had sold to respondent and loading it on a truck. They did not at this time make any claim to the ownership of the furniture, nor did they offer any explanation of their action in removing the furniture. They simply by sheer force began its removal. At the trial it appears that they claimed that they did not sign the bill of sale or that they did not intend to sell all the property called for by the bill of sale which they did sign. They did not, however, prior to their attempting to remove the furniture from the lodging house, or at the time of its attempted removal, make known to respondent either of these claims. The respondent, being unable to prevent them from taking the furniture, called the constable of the township, who stated to respondent that he could do nothing without a warrant of arrest. Whereupon, respondent sought the advice of Edwin F. Hahn, Esquire, a practicing attorney in the city of Pasadena, and now one of the superior judges of the county of Los Angeles. She stated the facts of the case to him, and was advised by him that the Pickerings were guilty of larceny and that she should proceed to the office of the justice of the peace, and have a warrant for their arrest issued by that magistrate. Respondent did as advised by her attorney and a warrant for the arrest of appellant and her husband was issued and delivered to a peace officer for service. It was served upon appellant by the peace officer taking her into custody. He did not, however, imprison her, but suffered her to go upon her own recognizance. Two days thereafter her preliminary examination was held. After hearing the testimony of Mr. Hisey, the charge against appellant, upon motion of the district attorney, was dismissed, and appellant was discharged. Whereupon plaintiff instituted this action for malicious prosecution.

[1] It is well settled in actions of malicious prosecution that plaintiff, in order to recover against the defendant, must show want of probable cause for the institution of the criminal prosecution and malice on the part of the defendant in instituting said prosecution. Redgate v. Southern Pacific Co., 24 Cal. App. 573, 141 P. 1191. In the present action the court instructed the jury regarding probable cause as follows:

"It is for the court to determine whether there is probable cause or not, and I instruct the jury that there was not probable cause for the bringing of this criminal action."

In view of this instruction, we will limit our consideration of the case to the contention of appellant that the evidence is not sufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that defendant did not act with malice in the institution of the criminal action. In doing so we do not wish to be understood as approving the action of the court in giving this instruction:

"The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show it probable are true and existed is a matter of fact, and to be determined by the jury; but whether, supposing this to be true, they amount to probable cause, is a question of law." Newell on Malicious Prosecution, p. 276; Sandell v. Sherman, 107 Cal. 391-394, 40 P. 493.

The first contention of appellant is that malice appears affirmatively from the evidence. In this connection appellant claims that the evidence shows that the only motive of respondent in instituting the criminal action was for the protection of her property from the appellant and her husband. This claim is based upon the testimony of respondent, and particularly that contained in the following question propounded to respondent by the court and her answer thereto:

"You did that [institute the criminal proceeding] not for the purpose of having the laws enforced, but you did it for the purpose of protecting your property? A. Yes."

From this answer, appellant contends, it conclusively appears that the only motive of respondent in instituting the criminal action was for the protection of her property. Such a motive, appellant insists, for the institution of a criminal action, is by law deemed to be malicious. In support of this contention appellant has cited a number of authorities among which are Cochran v. Bones, 1 Cal. App. 729, 82 P. 970, and Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 204 P. 578. A number of cases from other jurisdictions are cited by appellant, but these two from the courts of California are fairly typical of all those cited. In each of these cases the verdict of the jury was in favor of the plaintiff and on appeal it was held that the evidence in each case was sufficient to justify the verdict. In each of these cases it is apparent from the facts, as stated in the opinion, that the defendant was actuated by express malice in the institution of the criminal proceedings. In Cochran v. Bones, supra, the defendant had charged the plaintiff with the theft of a hog. The appellate court, in sustaining the judgment, said:

"That it [the prosecution] was malicious there can be no doubt. As has been seen, the parties had talked about the detention of the hog, in which plaintiff informed the defendant that the hog had strayed onto his premises, did damage, and was detained until damage done by said hog should be paid for. Defendant knew he could get his hog by paying the damage done, and instead of doing so had declared he would have the hog, and would have plaintiff arrested for stealing, and on going to the justice * * * he concealed the facts which, if they had been disclosed, would have shown the justice * * * that there had been no crime committed."

In Burke v. Watts, supra, the parties had a dispute about the ownership of a number of folding beds which had been a part of the furnishings of an apartment house. The plaintiff claimed to own them by virtue of a purchase by him of the furniture in said apartment house. The defendant, who was the owner of the building, claimed that they were a part of the building and therefore belonged to him. They were removed by the plaintiff from the apartment house and the defendant swore to a complaint, charging the plaintiff with grand larceny in taking and stealing them from the building. At the preliminary examination the criminal action was dismissed. Plaintiff then instituted an action against the defendant to recover damages, claiming that the prosecution was malicious. At the trial it appeared that the defendant had said to the plaintiff,

"I'll fix you; I fixed you once, and I'll fix you again. I told you I would fix you, you crook; I'll fix you all the time."

And on another occasion the defendant, referring to plaintiff, had said to the officer who arrested plaintiff:

"There he is. Arrest him and take him down, lock him up, put him in jail; he is a crook. I am going to send him to the penitentiary."

In its opinion affirming the judgment in this action, the Supreme Court said:

"There is other evidence that before this conversation appellant showed anger toward respondent as a result of their dealings. From this testimony and evidence that appellant knew respondent actually claimed title to the beds, the jury might have concluded that appellant was prompted by a malicious motive in causing the prosecution of respondent."

[2] We think it will be conceded that neither of these cases can be considered as an authority supporting appellant's contention that a prosecution, instituted for the sole purpose of protecting property, is conclusively deemed to be malicious. The other cases cited by appellant from foreign jurisdictions are no more favorable to her contention than are the two cases which we have briefly reviewed, and which were decided by the courts of our own state.

[3] Furthermore, we are convinced, from a consideration of the testimony in the case as a whole, that the jury were justified in rendering a verdict in defendant's favor, on the ground that no malice was shown. We think the testimony shows that defendant, at the time she swore to the complaint against the plaintiff, believed that the plaintiff and her husband were guilty of the crime charged therein. The defendant was a woman of limited business experience and unfamiliar with legal terms or court procedure. When this trouble arose, she sought the advice of a competent and reliable attorney, and made to him a full and fair statement of all the facts of the case. Upon hearing her statement, the attorney advised her that the Pickerings were guilty of larceny, and that she might have them arrested. She acted upon this advice and went to the office of the justice of the peace for this purpose. This officer concluded that the charge should be burglary instead of larceny, and prepared the complaint accordingly. Why should she not believe these men? One, following the law as a profession, and the other, executing it as an official, caused her to have every confidence in them, and to believe that they were familiar with the laws governing her case. When they told her that appellant and her husband were committing a crime in entering her house and removing therefrom property that she had bought from them, it is very evident to us that she believed what they told her. Had they advised her to institute a civil action, there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that she would not have followed their advice as readily and as willingly as she did when they advised a criminal proceeding. Furthermore, we have not had called to our attention, nor have we found from an independent examination of the testimony in the case, one act or word of the defendant that would indicate in the least degree that in the institution of the criminal action she acted with any ill will toward the plaintiff, or with any desire to injure her.

[4] "There is no legal presumption of malice, and, although malice may be inferred from want of probable cause or other circumstance, as an inference of fact, still, whether by inference or otherwise, it must be proven as a fact. 'To constitute malice there must be malus animus denoting that the party who instituted the proceeding was actuated by wrong motives,' i. e., he must have had in his mind some evil or sinister purpose." Redgate v. Southern Pacific Co., 24 Cal. App. 573, 584, 141 P. 1191.

As the evidence fails to show that the defendant was actuated by any such "evil or sinister purpose" in the institution of the criminal proceeding against the plaintiff in this case, we conclude, not only that malice does not appear affirmatively from the evidence, but that the verdict of the jury in defendant's favor is fully justified and supported by the evidence.

[5] The next contention of appellant is in reference to the instructions. Appellant excepts to the instruction of the court that—

"Under the evidence in this case the defendant Mrs. Havens was not guilty of any fraud in the execution of the bill of sale."

No fraud was pleaded, nor was there any evidence that the defendant had practiced fraud upon the plaintiff. It was claimed by appellant and her husband that they did not intend to sign any bill of sale of any furniture, and that, if they did sign any such document, it was not done intentionally or with knowledge of its contents. The papers evidencing the agreement of these parties, as we have already seen, were prepared by Mr. Hisey, the agent of the Pickerings. There is an intimation that Mr. Hisey had prepared papers different from those which the Pickerings had agreed to sign, and which they understood he was to prepare, and that, when they signed them, they did not understand their contents, nor realize that they were executing a bill of sale of any furniture. The testimony of the Pickerings upon this point is vague, uncertain, and unsatisfactory, and but little, if any, weight could be given to it. But aside from its infirmity in this respect, it does not in any way connect, or attempt to connect, the defendant with any acts of Mr. Hisey which they contend were improper. The instruction under these circumstances, therefore, was in no way prejudicial to appellant. There was absolutely no proof of fraud.

[6] A further objection is made to the action of the court in refusing to give an instruction, proposed by appellant:

"That the commencement of a criminal prosecution by a defendant simply for the purpose of enforcing a civil right of said defendant, or of defeating a civil right or claim to a civil right of the person so prosecuted, would be an abuse of the process of the court and would be conclusive evidence of malice on the part of the person commencing such prosecution, and in such case the advice of counsel would be no protection."

In the place and stead of this instruction the court gave the following instruction:

"If you find from the evidence that the Pickerings' claim to the property was made in good faith, and that such claim was known to Mrs. Havens, and that it was made under such circumstances as would lead a reasonable person to believe that it was made in good faith, and you further find that Mrs. Havens instituted the prosecution maliciously, with intent to further her claim to the property in dispute, and to retain the same or to escape a lawsuit therefor, you may find for the plaintiff, Mary Pickering, even though you are unable to determine whose claim was just and to whom the property belonged."

The only criticism offered by appellant to this instruction is to the word "maliciously" contained therein. This criticism is stated by appellant's counsel in their brief as follows:

"The instruction given by the court, however, added another element not required by law, to wit, malice, and made it necessary for the jury to find that: (1) The proceeding was instituted solely for private gain, and (2) that it was instituted maliciously before they could return a verdict for the plaintiff."

[7] As we have before stated, in discussing the first point made by appellant, the authorities cited by her fail to support her contention that the institution of a criminal action, solely for the purpose of protecting property, conclusively shows malice, and we know of no authorities declaring such a doctrine. Furthermore, in this action we find no evidence tending to show any such motive on the part of the defendant. It is true that from her answer to the question of the court above referred to, it might be inferred that such was her motive, yet, when we consider her whole testimony, we can draw no such inference. In our opinion, the instruction given by the court was unobjectionable. As to the instruction proposed by appellant and refused by the court, there was no evidence in the case that would justify the giving of this instruction, and it was properly refused by the court.

Judgment affirmed.

STIEGLITZ et al. v. SETTLE. (Civ. 4319.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 23, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 19, 1925.)

1. Brokers ⚡71—Contract for sale of land at "net" price per acre held not to mean that vendor would pay no commission.

That broker's contract with purchaser provided for sale of interest in land at $400 per acre "net," if owner of remaining interest sold at such price, held not to mean that vendor, in such case, would pay no commission to broker; "net" being intended only to guard against deductions purchaser might claim.

2. Evidence ⚡450(6)—Doubt as to meaning of word "net" in broker's contract for sale of land open to solution by testimony as to parties' intent.

Any doubt as to whether broker's written contract for sale of land at stated sum "net" meant that vendor need pay no commission or referred only to deductions purchaser might claim was open to solution by testimony as to parties' intent.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1099(3)—Confidential relation of attorney and client between broker and principal held not established as law of case by decision on former appeal.

Confidential relation of attorney and client between broker procuring sale and vendor held not established, as law of case, by decision of Court of Appeal, on appeal from judgment on instructed verdict for broker, suing for commission, that, taking evidence favorable to defendant, case was made out for jury; subsequent trial resulting in first and only finding of fact responding to vendor's claim.

4. Attorney and client ⚡106—Attorney must act in highest good faith toward client.

Attorney or other person occupying confidential relation of trust toward another must act in highest good faith toward principal or beneficiary.

5. Appeal and error ⚡1011(1)—Judgment on fact findings, supported by sufficient evidence, affirmed.

Judgment on court's findings, supported by sufficient evidence, though conflicting, that broker suing for commission for selling land was not defendant's attorney in relation to sale and did not contract with purchaser to represent him in same transaction, nor receive fee for so doing, will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Henry Stieglitz, after whose death Rhoda Stieglitz and another, as executors of his estate, were substituted as plaintiffs, against Maria Encarnacion de Settle. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 175 Cal. 131, 165 P. 436; 50 Cal. App. 581, 195 P. 705.

Henry T. Gage, Ingall W. Bull, and W. C. Petchner, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. A. Alderson and K. A. Miller, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This action was commenced by Henry Stieglitz, now deceased, to recover his commissions as broker for services which he had rendered in the sale of certain of defendant's land. After the death of Mr. Stieglitz the present plaintiffs as executors of his estate were substituted as plaintiffs. The present appeal is from the judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff after the third trial of the action.

At the first trial the court granted a nonsuit upon the ground that—

"The plaintiff has failed to prove a sufficient case for the jury, and the evidence introduced was insufficient to support a judgment for the plaintiff."

On appeal the judgment of nonsuit was reversed. Stieglitz v. Settle, 175 Cal. 131, 165 P. 436. The judgment under review on that appeal was not a judgment on the merits. The Supreme Court, in reviewing that judgment, merely applied the rule that in passing upon a motion for nonsuit "every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the plaintiff." After the second trial the appeal was from a judgment against defendant, entered upon an instructed verdict. That verdict was rendered under instructions whereby the trial court, following what it deemed to be the law of the case, practically withdrew the question at issue from the consideration of the jury. On that appeal the District Court of Appeal (First District, Division 1) held that the evidence presented a case on which the defendant was entitled to have the facts determined by the jury. The Court of Appeal, after reviewing the evidence, said:

"All we have endeavored to show in the foregoing references to the testimony is that, taking the evidence favorable to the defendant, a case was made out for the consideration of the jury, just as the Supreme Court in the former appeal demonstrated that considering the evidence favorable to the plaintiff, the court committed error in granting the defendant's motion for nonsuit. As to the former opinion in this case, it cannot be held that what the court there said is the law of the case. Here we are not considering an appeal from a judgment following the granting of a nonsuit, and there is a substantial difference in the evidence in the two trials." Stieglitz v. Settle, 50 Cal. App. 581, 587, 195 P. 705, 707.

The third trial was before the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment against defendant, based upon findings of fact made and conclusions drawn therefrom by the judge of the trial court. Thus it is seen that now for the first time there has been a judgment on the merits, based upon findings covering the issues of fact presented by the pleadings. The present appeal is similar to the case as presented on the former appeals, in that in each instance there was, upon some of the important questions of fact, evidence favorable to the party against whom the judgment was allowed in the superior court. But the record on the present appeal approximates more nearly to the case as considered on the first appeal, because the facts found by the court at the third trial harmonize closely with the evidence favorable to the plaintiffs as we find that evidence summarized in the decision of the Supreme Court.

The defendant, by Richard Mahar, her attorney in fact, delivered to Stieglitz a written agreement, dated March 17, 1912, authorizing Stieglitz to sell to George H. Peck all of the interest of defendant in the described real property (being a one-half interest therein), "at a price to be agreed upon between myself as the attorney in fact of the said Maria Encarnacion de Sepulveda and Geo. H. Peck, subject to the ratification or consent of Maria Encarnacion de Sepulveda"; and agreed to pay to Stieglitz for making such sale the regular or customary commission for making said sale as fixed by the realty board of the city of Los Angeles. Said agreement was dated back to March 17th to synchronize with a verbal agreement as to said commission, arranged between Stieglitz and Mahar. The legality of such an arrangement having been upheld by the Supreme Court, appellant makes no point against the agreement by reason of its date. It is also a conceded fact that at the time of making said agreement, Mahar was the attorney in fact of defendant, under a general power of attorney, which was sufficient to cover a transaction of this kind. Moreover, Mr. Mahar testified that before making the commission contract he went to Mrs. Sepulveda (appellant), and obtained her consent that Stieglitz should have a commission in case he should find a purchaser. It was after the execution of that agreement, and after the sale, but prior to the commencement of this action, that Mrs. Sepulveda became Mrs. Settle, which is her present name.

Proceeding under and in accordance with said written authority, Stieglitz procured the purchase of defendant's land by George H. Peck, to whom the property was conveyed for an actual consideration of $400 per acre; the total price paid to the defendant being the sum of $177,200. The price to be paid by the purchaser, as named in the negotiations between him and Stieglitz, was $375 per acre. But in the contract of sale between the purchaser and the seller a contingent addition to the price was provided for under the following circumstances: The one-half interest in the land, not owned by defendant, was the property of her daughter, Esperanza Larson. It was ascertained that negotiations were then pending by which it was hoped or expected by Mrs. Larson that she would be able to sell her interest in the land at the rate of $400 per acre. In view of this fact, the contract provided for the sale of defendant's land to Peck at the price of $375 per acre, "with the express understanding that if Esperanza Larson, the owner of the remaining one-half interest in said property, should on or before the first day of May, 1912, succeed in getting a purchaser for her said undivided one-half interest in the land herein described, then in that event the said party of the second part shall pay to the said party of the first part an additional sum of $25.00 per acre, making the sale price of this agreement $400.00 per acre net instead of $375.00. * * * And the said party of the second part agrees to pay the said sums of money in the manner and according to the terms and conditions, and at the times hereinbefore specified, that is to say, he will pay $375.00 per acre for said land, and in the event the said Esperanza Larson should get a buyer at $400.00 net per acre, the said second party will then pay the said party of the first part the sum of $400.00 an acre instead of $375.00. * * *

It was pursuant to the contract as thus made that the purchaser George Peck ultimately paid to defendant the full price of $400 per acre.

[1] Counsel for appellant claim that the controlling point of this case lies in the interpretation of the contract with Peck whereby defendant agreed to sell her property; that by the terms of that contract she was to get from Peck the sum of $400 per acre net (without paying commission); that therefore appellant is entitled to refuse payment of any commission to her agent, because if she is required to make that payment she then will have received not $400 per acre net for her property, but approximately $20 per acre less than said agreed price. In determining the question thus presented, it will serve to clarify the matter if we first consider and interpret the Peck contract solely as it affected the rights of the vendor and the vendee as between themselves. As thus considered, there is no obscurity in the words of the contract. It is provided that in the event of the contingency which afterwards occurred, the sale price of the property was to be "$400.00 per acre net."

Appellant argues that in the light of the fact that Mrs. Larson then expected to obtain, and in fact did obtain, from her purchasers $400 per acre, without paying a commission to any agent, the provision in the Peck contract, "making the sale price of this agreement $400.00 per acre net instead of $375.00," plainly and certainly meant that the vendor Mrs. Sepulveda would pay no commission to her agent; that, therefore, the court erred in overruling appellant's objections to testimony offered for the purpose of proving that the terms of the contract were not intended to cover the subject of commissions. We think, as do counsel for appellant, that the contract is clear and certain in relation to this matter; but we give it a different interpretation. To the purchaser it was a matter of no concern that the vendor would pay, or would not pay, a commission to some third person. Payment of such commission by her would add nothing to the price paid by him. As between the parties to the contract, therefore, the word "net," as used in the contract, must have referred to something other than expenditures made by the vendor. It did not mean, for example, that the vendor would be excused from paying the cost of the revenue stamps on her deed, or that the purchaser would pay that expense. It was merely one of those words, often inserted "from excess of caution," in agreements, and in this instance was intended to guard against any deductions which the purchaser might claim. The fact that this was not necessary, or that the word used was not apt for the intended purpose, does not give to the word some other equally useless and unexplained meaning. This is not a case like those cited by appellant, where the vendor, in making his contract of employment with the broker, specifies that the sale to be procured by the broker must be for a price which will produce to the vendor a specified sum, "net." In such a contract with the agent or broker, the word so used could have no possible meaning other than that the price to be received must be sufficient to leave in the hands of the vendor a stated sum, exclusive of all expenses which the vendor might have to incur by reason of such sale.

[2] If we concede, for a moment, that the contract as written did not necessarily mean that the word "net" referred only to such deductions as otherwise possibly might be claimed by Peck, then it will follow, quite obviously, that the true meaning is doubtful, and that this doubt was open to solution by testimony showing the actual intention of the parties. On this theory the court was not in error in receiving such testimony.

It is also worthy of consideration that, under the Peck contract, if Mrs. Larson had not sold her property prior to May 1st, Peck would have obtained the property of Mrs. Sepulveda at $375, and as to that price the word "net" was not used. It would be a strange result if the defendant was obligated to pay a commission on a sale for $375 per acre, and yet would be wholly exempted from that obligation in the contingency that the sale was consummated at a larger price.

The real problem of this case relates to the questions pertaining to the relations existing between Stieglitz and the defendant. If Stieglitz was in no sense a party to the Peck contract, and not in any way bound thereby, then under the terms of his contract with the defendant he was entitled to the commission claimed by him. This may be illustrated by supposing that defendant had ordered and obtained from a searcher of records an abstract of the title of her land and had then refused to pay for the abstract, for the alleged reason that under her contract with the purchaser she was to receive a stated "net compensation." Undoubtedly, the searcher of records, who had nothing to do with the Peck contract, would be entitled to recover his compensation. To him it would be a matter of indifference whether the defendant paid him out of the proceeds of the sale of the land or paid him out of funds derived from some other source. So here Stieglitz, as broker, became entitled to recover under his contract, unless it can be established that by reason of some relation existing between him and the defendant, affecting the terms of the Peck contract in its application to the payment of a commission, defendant's obligation to him under the brokerage contract never matured.

[3] Appellant contends that there did exist between Stieglitz and defendant a confidential relation of attorney and client as to this very matter in dispute, and at the same time with respect to other matters; and that the fact of such relationship is now a part of the law of the case as determined by the Court of Appeal in its decision on the last appeal. The decision of the Court of Appeal cannot be considered as binding in the sense claimed by appellant. We have quoted the words of the court in that decision which show how the decision was limited to the proposition that, "taking the evidence favorable to the defendant, a case was made out for the consideration of the jury." The subsequent trial resulted in the first and only finding of fact responding to the claim of appellant that Stieglitz was her attorney. The point relied upon is that because (as appellant claims) the relation of attorney and client existed between Stieglitz and herself, he was required to act in the highest good faith toward her throughout the transaction; and that the circumstances and terms of the sale and of his relationship thereto are such that it would not be an act of good faith for him to demand and recover the commissions claimed in this action.

[4] It is not necessary to cite decisions affirming the duty of an attorney or other person occupying a confidential relation of trust toward another to act in the highest good faith toward his principal or beneficiary. The two questions at issue are: Was Stieglitz the attorney of appellant in relation to the sale of this property or at all? If he was her attorney, was he, in good faith and conscience, entitled to recover this commission?

[5] The court found, and it is an admitted fact, that at the time of the transactions in question and long prior thereto Henry Stieglitz was an attorney engaged in practice in the county of Los Angeles, with an office at San Pedro. Referring to paragraph IV of the answer, the court further found that prior to March, 1912, he had performed services for appellant as an attorney at law in a condemnation proceeding mentioned in the answer, and in a partition action of Mrs. Larson against the defendant, and had performed professional services in the matter of the estate of Sepulveda, deceased husband of the defendant (having been employed by the administrator Mahar therein); and that said partition proceedings affected the particular property mentioned in the complaint herein.

"But the court finds that it is not true, as alleged in said paragraph, that said deceased performed services as attorney at law to the defendant in all matters requiring legal advice or services, and that he was so actively engaged in her behalf until after the sale of said property by said deceased, as alleged in the complaint; that it is not true that said deceased was at all times, or at all, the general attorney or the legal counselor of the defendant; that it is not true that the defendant relied exclusively on said deceased for legal advice and direction in all, or any, matters; that it is not true that the defendant followed explicitly, or at all, the advice and counsel of the deceased. The court finds that at the time the defendant and said Henry Stieglitz, deceased, entered into said commission contract the commissioners in said partition proceeding had filed their report; that the engagement of said Henry Stieglitz as the attorney for the administrator of the estate of the husband of the defendant had terminated in December, 1910; that in rendering professional services in said proceedings, said Henry Stieglitz did so through said Richard Mahar, attorney in fact for the defendant; that deceased never met the defendant but two or three times, and could not converse with her because the defendant could only speak Spanish and said Henry Stieglitz could not speak Spanish.

"The court finds that it is not true that said deceased performed any professional services to or on behalf of the defendant, except as employed by the attorney in fact of the defendant, and only in the particular matters aforesaid; that at no time was said deceased the general attorney and counselor of the defendant.

"The court finds that it is not true that the defendant, for any reason, placed an unusual reliance in said deceased as her legal adviser in any matters, and particularly it is not true that she placed any reliance in the deceased as an attorney in respect to the sale of the property mentioned in the complaint; that it is not true that because of any relation of said deceased to the defendant professionally that he gained great familiarity with and knowledge of the property and rights and business affairs of the defendant, but deceased only in a general way knew about such matters and as he was informed by reason of the professional services rendered by him in the proceedings mentioned aforesaid.

"The court finds that it is untrue, as alleged in paragraph VI of said second amended answer, that the defendant advised frequently with said defendant, but the court finds that said deceased only on two or three occasions personally met the defendant; that said deceased was employed by said attorney in fact and at all times relied upon said attorney in fact for his instructions, authority and directions in any and all matters in which he was so employed. The court finds that it is not true that the commission contract set forth in the complaint was attempted to be made, or was made, by the deceased and said attorney in fact clandestinely or surreptitiously, or without the knowledge, consent or acquiescence of the defendant, or that said contract was wrongfully or fraudulently entered into in such manner by said deceased and said attorney in fact, Richard Mahar, with the purpose to take advantage of the confidential and fiduciary relations existing between them and between them and the defendant and to impose upon the ignorance of the defendant at all or to deprive the defendant of any property or rights; that it is not true that there was any understanding or agreement between said Henry Stieglitz and said Richard Mahar that they would divide between them, or at all, any commission that might be paid or collected pursuant to said contract, or any sum from any source whatever; that it is not true that there was any conspiracy at all between said deceased and said attorney in fact to do anything for their own benefit or the benefit of either one of them."

The foregoing findings are very much in line with the evidence referred to by the Supreme Court and relating to the same issues, as that evidence is described in the decision of the Supreme Court on appeal from the judgment of nonsuit. That evidence was in effect the same as the evidence received at the last trial, which resulted in the findings which we have quoted. Commenting thereon, the Supreme Court said:

"Touching Mr. Stieglitz' position and conduct, there is absolutely nothing shown in the evidence which would forbid him, on either legal or ethical grounds, from entering into a contract with Mrs. Sepulveda which had no bearing on or relation to his position as her attorney at law in the partition suit, especially so as in the making of the contract he did not even personally see her and so could not have personally influenced her, and the explanation of the contract was made by and her assent given to her trusted agent and man of affairs. An attorney is under no actual incapacity to deal with or purchase from his client. All that is required where the relation of confidence exists and where the questioned transaction has a bearing upon that relationship is a clear showing that there has been no abuse of confidence and no advantage taken."

In aid of the contention of appellant that Stieglitz did not act in good faith toward her in relation to the sale to Peck, appellant alleged that without her knowledge, and while Stieglitz was representing appellant as her attorney in drawing the Peck contract, and while representing and advising her and her attorney in fact concerning said sale, Stieglitz also contracted with Peck to represent, advise, and protect him in relation to the same transaction, and for his services to Peck received from him a fee of $500.

The court found adversely to appellant upon this issue. Specifically, however, the court found that after the consummation of the sale, Peck voluntarily and upon his own initiative paid to Mahar the sum of $500; that said sum was not on account of and had nothing to do with the purchase price for said land, or said commission contract; that thereafter Mahar, as the attorney in fact of defendant, paid Stieglitz the sum of $250; that said payment to Stieglitz was on another and different account than the sale of said land to Peck and the performance of said commission contract by Stieglitz; that there never was any agreement between Peck, Mahar, and Stieglitz, or any of them, for the payment of said or any sum by Peck, or as to a division between Stieglitz and Mahar of said or any sum; that Stieglitz never solicited or expected any sum whatever from any source on account of the matters which constitute the subject of this action, other than the payment to him of the commission provided for in said commission contract. These findings are adequately supported by the evidence. On the last trial, as on the first, the same testimony was produced which was summarized by the Supreme Court in its decision, wherein it referred to the testimony of Stieglitz "that there had been no previous agreement between himself and Mr. Peck, or between himself and Mr. Mahar, concerning the $500, and that he never had any agreement with Mr. Mahar by which he—Mr. Mahar—was to receive any part of the commissions for the sale of the land." And notwithstanding that there was evidence tending to contradict this testimony, it was held that the evidence concerning this matter was not sufficient to destroy the force and effect of the other evidence in the case, and was not sufficient to sustain the judgment of nonsuit. And now, although the court has made its findings of fact upon conflicting evidence, yet it is apparent that they rest upon sufficient evidence.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

ODSON v. SWANSON et ux. (Civ. 2858.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 17, 1924.)

1. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 37(2)—Representations as to acreage of tract held to constitute deceit.

Under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1710, that vendor had told purchaser that he did not know its acreage; that it might be little more or less than 6 acres, but that his grantor had said it was that, when he knew acreage to be less, was sufficient to constitute deceit.

2. Evidence $\S$ 434(11)—Parol evidence admissible to show misrepresentation in acreage of tract.

In action to cancel land contract, where it called for six acres more or less, purchaser may show by parol that vendor, knowing there was less, represented that there were six acres, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1856, making such evidence admissible to show fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Suit by Gilbert H. Odson against O. H. Swanson and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hugh H. Sydenham and William Rigby, both of Sacramento, for appellants.

Charles A. Bliss, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff and the defendants entered into a written contract by the terms of which the latter agreed to sell and the former to buy an irregular tract of land which, according to a subsequent survey, contains 4.82 acres. The agreed purchase price was $1,650, of which the sum of $650 was paid at or before the execution of the contract. The remainder was to be paid in semiannual installments. This action was instituted for the cancellation of the contract and the recovery of the sum paid, on the ground of misrepresentations alleged to have been made by defendants as to the number of acres contained in the tract. The plaintiff was given judgment as prayed for, and the defendants have appealed.

The defendants had resided on the premises for about two years prior to the execution of the contract. They listed the property for sale with a real estate agent and authorized him to sell the same at the price and upon the terms which were later embodied in the contract of sale. Mr. Swanson testified that, at the time the property was listed with the agent—

"I told him the party that sold to me told me there was six [acres]; I did not know."

The agent placed a card in his window describing the property and stating that it contained six acres. The card attracted the plaintiff's attention and, after making inquiries of the agent, he inspected the property and, while on the premises, he inquired of Mr. Swanson how many acres were in the tract. The defendant testified:

"He asked me how many acres in there. I told him I did not know how many acres there were there, but the party that sold to me told me there were six acres, but I could not tell him how many acres there were. * * * He asked me if there were six acres. * * * I told him I did not know."

Plaintiff testified, relative to the same conversation with Swanson:

"I said, 'Well, it is kind of hard to see, being an irregular piece like that, but it looks very likely it is six acres.' * * * He said, 'It may be less, it may be a little more.'"

On the same day the plaintiff returned to the agent's office and paid $50 on the purchase price of the property. The agent thereupon signed and delivered to the plaintiff an instrument acknowledging receipt of the $50 "as a deposit on account of the purchase of * * * 6 acres more or less * * * now owned by O. H. Swanson" and stating the terms of the sale. The plaintiff also signed the instrument. Thereafter the plaintiff and the defendants executed the written contract first referred to and the plaintiff paid the additional sum of $600 and took possession of the property. A few days later the plaintiff measured the land and computed its area as 4.7 acres. Thereafter the plaintiff served notice of rescission of the contract and demanded the return of the money paid. One witness testified that he saw Swanson measuring the land before the latter purchased it. Another testified that, while Swanson was residing on the premises, he told the witness that the tract contained 4.75 acres. A receipt for taxes paid by the defendants refers to the tract as containing 4.375 acres. Mr. Swanson testified that he "never looked inside of the tax receipt."

Appellants urge the following grounds for reversal:

"(1) That the contract of purchase and sale being in writing * * * could not be varied by the testimony admitted in evidence; (2) that the judgment * * * is not supported by the evidence, and is contrary to the entire evidence; * * * (3) that no fraudulent misrepresentations were made to the respondent by the appellants; (4) that the respondent has failed to show that he was in any way damaged by any misrepresentations made to him by appellants; * * * (5) the contract being in writing, the lower court erred in overruling the demurrer of appellants, and denying their motion to strike out parts of the complaint."

[1, 2] There is ample evidence to show that the tract was represented to plaintiff as containing 25 per cent. more land than it actually does contain. If the defendants are chargeable with such misrepresentation, it is clear that plaintiff was entitled to rescind and recover the amount paid by him. There is sufficient evidence, if believed, to show that Swanson knew the number of acres in the tract; that he led the agent to believe that it contained six acres; that, acting on such information, the agent so represented it to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff believed such representation and relied upon it in his purchase of the property; and that Swanson, knowing of such belief and knowledge, and knowing the actual acreage in the tract, answered plaintiff's inquiry relative to such acreage by stating that he "did not know how many acres there were," that "it may be less, it may be a little more," than six acres, that the person from whom he had purchased the land told him "there were six acres." Section 1710 of the Civil Code defines deceit as:

"(1) The suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true. * * *

"(3) The suppression of a fact, by one who is bound to disclose it, or who gives information of other facts which are likely to mislead for want of communication of that fact."

The evidence is sufficient to bring Swanson's conduct within the provisions of the foregoing section. This disposes of all of the appellants' contentions, except that to the effect that parol evidence was improperly admitted to vary the terms of the written contract. Section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure, cited by appellants in support of their contention, expressly provides that such evidence is admissible to establish fraud. Most of appellants' contentions are sufficiently answered by citing Mooney v.

Cyriacks, 185 Cal. 70, 195 P. 922, in which similar contentions were overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 17, 1924.)

1. Landlord and tenant — 144, 291(1) — Duty of tenant to surrender possession of premises as soon as tenancy expires; if tenant continues in possession without permission, action may be begun without notice.

Tenant must, as soon as his tenancy expires by its own limitations, surrender possession of premises, and no notice of termination is necessary; and, if he continues in possession beyond that period without permission of landlord, he is guilty of unlawful detainer, and action may be commenced under Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 1, at once without service on him of any notice.

2. Landlord and tenant — 291(1) — Tenants held not entitled under hold-over clause to notice before suit for restitution could be brought.

Where tenants continued in possession of premises beyond term fixed by lease in violation of its terms and against express will and consent of lessors, no notice under hold-over clause was necessary to terminate their tenancy before suit could be commenced for restitution of premises, where such clause gave tenants no right to continue in possession without plaintiffs' permission.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Dwight E. Ryland and another against Max Appelbaum and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Harry K. Wolff, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Timothy Healy, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Unlawful detainer. On April 10, 1920, plaintiffs leased certain real property to defendants for a term of three years, commencing May 1, 1920, and ending April 30, 1923, under a written lease, which provided for a surrender of the premises at the expiration of the term, and also that—

"Should the said lessee hold over the term herein created, such tenancy shall be from month to month only, and be on the same terms and conditions herein stated."

On January 17, 1923, the lessees were personally served with written notice, signed by the lessors, to the effect that the lease would "terminate and end on the 30th day of April, 1923, at twelve (12) o'clock midnight," and that the defendants would be required to vacate said premises and surrender and deliver the possession of the same to plaintiffs "on or before April 30, 1923." Subsequently, on April 20, 1923, in a letter written by plaintiffs' attorney, the defendants were reminded of the previous notice served upon them by the lessors, to the effect that the lease would not be renewed, and suggesting that if defendants would consult an attorney they would be advised that they had no right to continue the occupancy of said premises beyond April 30, 1923. Said letter further stated:

"Also, please take notice that under the terms of the lease you must surrender possession of the premises on the expiration of the lease. Should you fail to do so, it will become my duty to institute proceedings on behalf of the owners of the property."

Notwithstanding these two notices, defendants continued in possession after April 30, 1923, and on May 1, 1923, the day following the expiration of the term of the lease, plaintiffs commenced this action in unlawful detainer under subdivision 1 of section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and on June 28, 1923, were given judgment for the restitution of the premises and for the payment of damages for the unlawful detention thereof.

Defendants have appealed from the judgment upon the sole ground that service upon them of a three-day notice after the expiration of the term fixed by the lease was a necessary prerequisite to the commencement of this action, which notice was not given. In other words, defendants contend that because they continued in possession of the premises beyond the term fixed by the lease, in violation of its terms and against the expressed will and consent of lessors, they became tenants from month to month under the hold-over clause of the lease, and that consequently a three-day notice was necessary to terminate such monthly tenancy before suit could be properly commenced against them for restitution of the premises.

[1, 2] The contention is wholly without merit. It is well established that it is the duty of the tenant as soon as his tenancy expires, by its own limitations, to surrender the possession of the premises, and that no notice of termination is necessary, the lease itself terminating the tenancy; and if he continues in possession, beyond that period, without the permission of the landlord, he is guilty of unlawful detainer, and an action may be commenced against him at once, under the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure, without the service upon him of any notice. Earl Orchard Co. v. Fava, 138 Cal. 76, 70 P. 1073; Bettens v. Hoover, 12 Cal. App. 313, 107 P. 329; Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong & Co., 91 Cal. 593, 28 P. 45; Kuhn v. Smith, 125 Cal. 615, 58 P. 204, 73 Am. St. Rep. 79; McKissick v. Ashby, 98 Cal. 425, 33 P. 729; *Canning v. Manifestly, the hold-over clause of the lease did not operate to create a new tenancy unless it was consented to by the landlord, nor can it be considered as an option for a renewal. It gave defendants no right whatever to continue in possession without plaintiffs' permission, which, as we have already seen, was positively refused. The cases cited by defendants in support of their position are not in point for the reason that they arose under a state of facts where there was an existing tenancy at will to be terminated, or under subdivision 2 of said section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure, wherein the tenancy already created was sought to be terminated by the lessor, prior to the expiration of the term of the lease, for default in payment of rent, or where the tenant was permitted to hold over, beyond the term fixed by the lease, with the express or implied permission of the landlord. Judgment affirmed.

Verdict of $5,000 for death of plaintiffs' daughter when struck by defendant's automobile was not excessive, where she was 21 years old and in view of her training would soon have acquired a substantial earning capacity to contribute to support of her parents, notwithstanding that father was earning a living for himself and wife and that they were not dependent on daughter for support.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for $5,000 against him in an action brought to recover damages for the death of the daughter of plaintiffs. It is alleged that said death was caused by the negligence of defendant in driving an automobile in the city of Oakland, Cal.

The accident happened at the intersection of Moraga avenue and Pleasant Valley avenue. Moraga avenue enters Pleasant Valley avenue with a sharp curve. At about 8 o'clock in the morning on November 15, 1922, the defendant drove a Ford automobile down Moraga avenue and into its intersection with Pleasant Valley avenue at a speed variously estimated at 20 and 25 miles an hour. He came down quite a grade as he approached this intersection and did not sound any warning signal as he descended the hill, approached the intersection, or rounded the curve.

Dorothy Little, the 21-year-old daughter of plaintiffs, was crossing Moraga avenue at the intersection and was struck and dragged by defendant's automobile, suffering injuries from which she died in a few days.

Another feature of the case is that along the curb at the intersection of the streets are 12 trees, which at the time of the accident were 15 feet high and had been trimmed into a mushroom shape so that they hung down to about 4 or 5 feet from the ground. Because of the curve in the street, these trees obstructed the vision of one crossing at the intersection so that he could not see up Moraga avenue after he had reached a point about in the middle of the street. In other words, it appears in evidence that an automobile coming down Moraga avenue on the right-hand side of the street could be seen by a person at the time he started across the intersection and until he reached about the center of the street, when the view was lost around the curve because of the in-interference of the trees. Moraga avenue is 32 feet wide, so for about 16 feet of the crossing it would be impossible to see a vehicle coming down the hill toward the place of intersection.

At the time of the accident the deceased was accompanied by her cousin, Miss Fake, who testified at the trial that before she and deceased started across the street, Miss Fake looked up Moraga avenue and saw the automobile of the defendant several hundred feet up Moraga avenue coming down the hill. She did not know whether deceased looked and saw the automobile or not. Miss Fake did not again look at the automobile, but continued across the street with deceased and was not aware of the proximity of the automobile until both girls were struck by it. Miss Fake stated that she did not know whether deceased looked toward the north, the direction from which the automobile came, while she was crossing the street, and that she (Miss Fake) did not look in that direction except as she started to cross; that when they got halfway across, they quickened their pace and were struck about 7 feet away from the curb.

Appellants do not deny that the record shows negligence upon the part of the defendant, but it is contended that it also shows contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, proximately causing the injury. It is contended that it was negligence as a matter of law for deceased not to have looked in the direction from which traffic might be expected when she reached the center of the street and was about to continue across with her view to the north obstructed; and because the record is silent as to whether deceased did or did not look to the north upon reaching the center of the street, appellant takes both horns of the dilemma and argues that if deceased did not look she was negligent, and if she did look she must have seen the automobile and was negligent in attempting to cross. Appellant then argues the question of proximate cause, contending that the proximate cause of the injury and death was the negligence of deceased.

[1, 2] Defendant moved for a nonsuit after the plaintiffs' case was rested; this motion was denied. The defendant declined to offer any testimony other than a map of the vicinity of the accident. The case was submitted to a jury and a verdict returned for plaintiffs. The question thus presented is as to the correctness of the court's ruling upon the motion for nonsuit, and we think this question but presents another: Is there any evidence from which a jury might reasonably draw the conclusion that the deceased was in the exercise of ordinary care? We think there was such evidence. True, the evidence regarding the conduct of deceased is scanty, but in the absence of contradiction we have the presumption of law that deceased used due care for her own protection and preservation. Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. Min. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 506, 143 P. 714; Drouillard v. So. Pac. Co., 36 Cal. App. 447, 172 P. 405; Ross v. Railways Co., 47 Cal. App. 753, 761, 191 P. 703. This presumption and the facts appearing in the record make it reasonable for the jury to conclude that deceased looked north before leaving the curb and seeing an automobile quite a distance away from her up the hill concluded that she had ample time to cross the street and attempted to do so, making a mistake of judgment due to her inability to judge the speed of the automobile.

The situation thus presented comes directly within the rule laid down in Burgesser v. Bullock's, 190 Cal. 673, 214 P. 649, wherein it is said:

"It is sufficient for the purposes of a new trial in this case to say that where the evidence showed that the decedent looked in the direction of the approaching automobile and saw the automobile, and, nevertheless, proceeded to cross the street, it is for the jury to say whether or not his conduct with reference to the approaching automobile was, under all the circumstances at the time and place and conditions of the traffic, negligence on the part of the decedent."

In the case last cited our Supreme Court considered most of the cases relied upon by appellant upon this appeal and found them not in conflict with the rule above quoted. The matter was one for the jury's determination, therefore, and the motion for nonsuit was properly denied.

[3] The only other contention requiring discussion is that the verdict is excessive. As before stated, the verdict was for $5,000. The deceased was 21 years old. She lived with her parents and assisted her mother with the household duties when her school work permitted and gave to her parents the comfort and pleasure of her society during her leisure hours. She was a graduate of the high school and at the time of her death was a student at the Arts and Crafts School. It is evident that a girl with this training would soon have a substantial earning capacity and be in a position to contribute to the support of her parents if such contribution became necessary. But the appellant urges that the record discloses that the father was earning a living for himself and his wife and that the parents were not dependent upon this daughter for support. This argument is answered in the case of Atkeson v. Jackson Estate, 72 Wash. 233, 130 P. 102, wherein it is said:

"But, since adversity and misfortune are sometimes the accompaniments of life, as well as prosperity and success, there is another side to the picture. It is possible that the respondents may lose the property they have accumulated, and at the same time their health and ability to earn money. If such a misfortune should befall them, might it not be said that the daughter's earnings, had she lived, would have greatly exceeded her cost of maintenance?"

And who shall say that such a misfortune may not befall them? And if the probability exists, why may not a recovery be based thereon? There is, of course, no certain measure of damages in cases of this character; but, notwithstanding this difficulty, the great weight of authority is that a substantial recovery may be had."

[4] The appellant asserts in his brief that error was committed by the trial court in admitting evidence of the amount paid by the plaintiffs for the funeral expenses of their daughter. In support of his position he quotes from Munro v. Dredging Co., 84 Cal. 523, 24 P. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248. An examination of that case discloses that the court, in using the language quoted by appellant herein, was stating the holding of an English case decided under the Lord Campbell Act, and tracing the history of an action for damages brought by heirs at law or personal representatives of a deceased person whose death had been caused by the wrongful act of another. The case is not authority for appellant's position, the question involved and decided therein being whether or not recovery could be had for grief and mental suffering of surviving parents.

On the other hand, the case of Koehl v. Carpenter, 47 Cal. App. 642, 191 P. 43, treats the question raised by appellant herein as settled in this state, saying:

"Lastly it is contended that the damages should not have included the amount paid to the undertaker, because the bill was not paid by either of the plaintiffs. The allegation of the complaint was that these expenses had been incurred. This was sufficient to support the finding that the plaintiffs had been damaged to the amount of $1,000, including funeral expenses of $272.50."

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. VELASQUEZ. (Cr. 1157.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 23, 1924.)

1. Criminal law §412(3)—Defendant's statements as to place of birth held competent.

In prosecution of alleged foreign-born non-citizen for unlawful possession of firearms, testimony concerning his statements as to place of his birth is competent.

2. Criminal law §535(2)—Defendant's extrajudicial admissions or confessions inadmissible to prove corpus delicti.

Defendant's extrajudicial admissions or confessions are inadmissible to prove corpus delicti.

3. Criminal law §563—Corpus delicti in prosecution of noncitizen for unlawful possession of firearms held sufficiently proved.

In prosecution of alleged foreign-born non-citizen for unlawful possession of firearms, defendant's testimony that he lived in Mexico from his earliest recollection until about six years before, and understands and speaks but little English, held sufficient proof of corpus delicti.

4. Criminal law §315—Prosecution proving defendant's foreign birth need not show that he was never naturalized.

In prosecution of alleged foreign-born non-citizen for unlawful possession of firearm, prosecution, after showing that defendant was foreign-born, need not show that he was never naturalized; presumption being that status shown continues until contrary is shown.

5. Criminal law §447—Naturalization not provable by parol.

Naturalization is judicial act, provable only by record or duly authenticated copy, and not by parol.

6. Criminal law §327—Burden of proving negatively averred fact peculiarly within defendant's knowledge is on him.

Where subject-matter of negative averment in information is peculiarly within defendant's knowledge, burden of proof is on him.

7. Aliens §17—State need not prove that alleged noncitizen prosecuted for unlawful possession of firearm was never naturalized.

Defendant's naturalization being peculiarly within his own knowledge and easily provable by naturalization papers or properly authenticated copies, state, in prosecution of alleged foreign-born noncitizen for unlawful possession of firearms, need not prove that he was never naturalized.

8. Aliens §17—Allegation that defendant was never naturalized taken as true, in absence of proof to contrary.

Prosecution having proved foreign birth of defendant charged with unlawful possession of firearms, allegation of information that he was never naturalized must be taken as true, in absence of proof to contrary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; B. F. Warmer, Judge.

E. Velasquez was convicted of unlawful possession of firearms, and appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Hadaller, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. Defendant was charged with having under his control and in his possession a firearm capable of being concealed upon his person, he being then and there a foreign-born person and not a citizen of the United States. He was found guilty as charged.

The only question involved in this appeal is whether there was any legal evidence produced at the trial tending to prove that the defendant, at the time of the conviction of the offense charged, was an unnaturalized, foreign-born person. In support of the allegation of the information, charging that defendant was a foreign-born person and not a naturalized citizen of the United States, the prosecution called a police officer of the city of Riverside, and over the objection of the defendant asked this officer regarding certain statements made by said defendant, shortly after his arrest. The officer testified that the defendant, at the time in question, stated to him and two other police officers that he was born in Mexico and had been in the United States six years. It was further stipulated, without waiving any objection to the admission of this evidence, that the two other officers, if called, would testify in the same manner. The defendant took the stand in his own behalf and testified that his parents died in the state of Durango, Mexico, when he was only six years old; that neither his parents, nor any other person, ever told him where he was born; that his parents were Mexicans and lived in Mexico up to the time of their death; that he had no recollection of having ever lived in any other place, except in Mexico, before the death of his parents; that after the death of his parents he lived with his godfather in various places in Mexico, until about six years ago, when he came to this country; that he does not speak English and only understands a few English words; that he is 21 years of age and works picking oranges and in packing houses.

[1] The first point made by appellant is that the court erred in overruling his objection to the question asked the police officer relative to the statements made by the appellant that he was born in Mexico. Appellant contends that the testimony of a person as to the place of his birth is hearsay, and therefore not only would his evidence be inadmissible, but that his extrajudicial statements would also be inadmissible and incompetent to prove the place of birth. It is conceded that this question has never been directly decided by the appellate courts of this state. It has been repeatedly held, however, that a person can testify as to his own age. "A person's age may be proved by his own testimony, and the fact that knowledge of that age is derived from statements of the parents, or from family reputation, does not render it inadmissible." People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 133, 46 P. 915. We can conceive of no reason why a different rule should be invoked when the question in issue is not the date of the person's birth, but the place where he was born. As to either of these facts, the person himself can have no positive knowledge, and must rely entirely upon information received from other persons. Under our national mining laws, the citizenship of an applicant for a patent may be proven by his own affidavit. 17 Stats. at L. 94; 6 Fed. Stats. Ann. (2d Ed.) 522 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4616). It may also be proven by the testimony of the locator himself. Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 529, 530, 14 P. 182. Under the statutes of our own state, an applicant to purchase school lands must show by affidavit, among other things, that he is a citizen of the United States. Pol. Code, § 3495. While we find that the courts have decided, in proceedings under the above section of the Political Code, that the testimony of the applicant is incompetent to prove his naturalization (Prentice v. Miller, 82 Cal. 570, 575, 23 P. 189), we are unable to find any instance in which it was held that his testimony would not be received when offered for the purpose of proving his place of birth. We find cases in which the applicant testified regarding the place of his birth, and while his testimony appears to have been admitted without objection no question seems to have been raised either by the court or counsel as to its competency. Miller v. Prentice, 82 Cal. 104, 106, 23 P. 8; Prentice v. Miller, 82 Cal. 570, 574, 23 P. 189.

There are a number of early decisions, rendered both by the courts of England and by those of our own country, holding that a pauper cannot testify to the place of his birth. Chamberlayne's Law of Evidence, § 4066. These decisions were rendered in actions brought to determine the liability of the town, in which it was charged that the pauper was born, for the support of the pauper. There appears to be some diversity of opinion as to the grounds upon which such decisions are based. We do not find, however, that the rule excluding such testimony has been extended beyond those cases in which the support of the pauper himself has been involved. We see no good reason for extending it to include actions such as the one under consideration. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the statements of the defendant, as to the place of his birth, were competent evidence, and that the court committed no error in admitting in evidence such statements.

[2, 3] Appellant further contends that, even with this testimony admitted, the corpus delicti has not been proven. This contention is based upon the well-established principle of law that the extrajudicial admissions or confessions of the defendant are inadmissible to prove the corpus delicti. Conceding, as contended by the appellant, that the citizenship of appellant is a part of the corpus delicti, and therefore cannot be proven by his extrajudicial statements, it will be remembered that the appellant in this action took the stand in his own behalf and gave testimony that his parents were Mexicans and lived in Mexico up to the time of their death, which occurred when he was only six years of age, and that from his earliest recollection he lived in Mexico until about six years ago, when he came to this country, and that he now understands and speaks but little English. This evidence was sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the defendant was born in Mexico. Walther v. Rabolt, 30 Cal. 185. The facts in this case were much like those in the present case, and its syllabus is as follows:

"Evidence that a person was in Germany, living with German parents, when six years old, and that he remained in Germany until he was eighteen years old, when he came to the United States, and that he could not then speak the English language, is sufficient to justify the court in finding that he was an alien born."

The corpus delicti was therefore proven in court by the testimony of the defendant himself.

[4] Finally, the appellant contends that, even if it be conceded that there is proof of his foreign birth, there is no evidence tending to show that he had not been naturalized. Appellant argues that not only is the burden upon the prosecution of proving all the allegations of the information but that the presumption is that every person is a citizen of the country in which he resides. We have already shown that the evidence was sufficient to prove that the defendant was an alien by birth. The presumption is that this status continues until the contrary is shown. Bode v. Trimmer, 82 Cal. 513, 517, 23 P. 187. It was therefore unnecessary for the prosecution, after showing that the defendant was foreign-born, to further show that he had never been naturalized.

[5-8] In this connection the Attorney General has suggested that the allegation of the information, relative to the defendant not being a naturalized citizen of the United States, is an allegation of a negative fact which is peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, and therefore that it comes within the rule that the burden of proving such an allegation is cast upon the defendant. While no authorities are cited in support of this argument, we are nevertheless of the opinion that it is both reasonable and sound. Naturalization of an alien as a citizen of the United States is a judicial act. It can only be proven by the record itself, or a duly authenticated copy thereof. It cannot be proven by parol. Bode v. Trimmer, supra. On the other hand, to prove that a person had not been naturalized would require evidence to the effect that no court of this country, having jurisdiction of naturalization proceedings, had ever granted naturalization to defendant. The rule is well settled in this state that, where the subject-matter of a negative averment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, the burden of proving the fact rests with the defendant. 8 Cal. Jur. § 148. This is an exception to the general rule that the burden of proof rests upon the prosecution, and the reason given for such exception is that it would greatly inconvenience the prosecution to prove such fact, whereas the defendant can prove it with no inconvenience at all. 8 Cal. Jur. § 148. This rule is applied in the main to prosecutions of persons charged with the violation of statutes making it illegal to engage in certain business or to follow certain professions without first obtaining a license so to do. In most, if not in all of the cases of which we have any knowledge, the statute designates the particular board or officer from which such a license is to be obtained. The inconvenience in such a case of procuring evidence that the accused had no such license as required by the statute can hardly be compared with that cast upon the prosecution in an action like the present, if required to prove that the defendant had not been naturalized. In the former class of cases, it would only be necessary to examine the records of one board, or the books of one officer, to ascertain whether the required license had been issued or not, and to have as a witness one person from the office of such a board, or officer, to prove the fact that no license had been issued to the accused. In an action like that before us, owing to the fact that the defendant might have been naturalized in any one of a large number of courts, it would be necessary to have as witnesses at the trial representatives or officers from all of said courts, and possibly the records themselves to show, if such were the fact, that the defendant had never been naturalized in any of said courts. Such a requirement would cast upon the prosecution an interminable amount of labor and the greatest of inconvenience. On the other hand, to require the defendant to show that he was naturalized casts no unreasonable burden upon him. If he has had conferred upon him, by any court of competent jurisdiction, the privilege of citizenship, he either has his naturalization papers, or, if they have been lost, properly authenticated copies thereof might be procured with little trouble or expense from the court which granted the original. We are therefore of the opinion that this exception to the general rule, relative to the burden of proof, should apply to actions like the present, and that it was not obligatory on the part of the prosecution to prove that the defendant had not been naturalized. His naturalization, if such were the fact, was peculiarly within his own knowledge and could have been proven by him with but little inconvenience. The prosecution having proven by competent evidence the foreign birth of the defendant, the allegation of the information that he had never been naturalized must be taken as true in the absence of proof to the contrary. People v. Wah Hing, 47 Cal. App. 327, 190 P. 662.

PEOPLE v. CONNORS. (Cr. 779.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 20, 1924.)

1. Embracery ⇨—No defense that accused did not mail letter if he caused it to be mailed.

In prosecution for corruptly attempting to influence juror by sending letter to him, it is no defense that accused did not personally mail the letter, if he caused it to be mailed.

2. Embracery ⇨—Evidence held to sustain finding that letter sent with intent to corruptly influence juror.

In prosecution for corruptly attempting to influence juror in pending case by sending letter to him, evidence that defendant knew of pending syndicalism cases, that letter discussed situation of one of defendants and his family, and made disparaging statements relative to witnesses who would probably testify, and denounced prosecutions under Criminal Syndicalism Law, and that similar letters were sent to other counties in which syndicalism cases were pending, held to make question whether intent was present for jury, and to sustain finding that letter was sent with intent to corruptly influence juror.

3. Criminal law ⇨—§1170(3)—Erroneous exclusion of evidence not ground for complaint where later admitted.

Erroneous exclusion of evidence is not ground for complaint where such evidence was later admitted.

4. Embracery ⇨—General intent to corrupt all jurors in criminal syndicalism case includes particular intent to corrupt individual juror.

If defendant sent 20,000 copies of letter, in attempt to corruptly influence all jurors in respect to their verdict to be rendered in a particular case, and a copy was delivered to one of such jurors, that defendant did not know that such juror had been summoned was immaterial, because general intent to corrupt all jurors on panel included particular intent to corrupt such individual juror.

5. Criminal law ⇨—§1172(6)—Instruction permitting conviction if defendant attempted to influence juror in any pending case, held prejudicial error, where indictment alleged pending of only one case, and there were several pending cases.

Where indictment charged that defendant by means of letter attempted to corruptly influence a juror in respect to a named pending case, an instruction that if jury find that defendant attempted to influence juror in respect to his verdict in any pending cause or proceeding, they should find defendant guilty, held prejudicial error, where there were other cases pending, since jury may have based conviction upon finding that defendant attempted to influence juror as to one of such other three cases, and not case alleged in indictment.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of corruptly attempting to influence a juror in respect to his verdict in a criminal case pending in the superior court. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The indictment charges that on the — day of March, 1923, there was pending and set for trial and undecided "an action entitled the People of the State of California v. Barney Brooks et al."; that the defendants therein were charged with the crime of criminal syndicalism; that the trial of said action had been set for March 26, 1923; that a regular panel of jurors had been "duly summoned and drawn;" and that one of such jurors was H. D. Arnold; that defendant knew that Arnold had been so drawn and summoned, and that he "would continue as said summoned and drawn juror during the trial of" said criminal action; and that defendant corruptly attempted to influence said juror "in respect to his verdict to be thereafter rendered in said action of the People of the State of California v. Barney Brooks et al., * * * by means of a written communication then and there had by said" defendant "with said juror, H. D. Arnold." The indictment then sets forth those parts of the following writing which are herein italicized:

"March 15th, 1923.

"To the Citizens of Sacramento County:

"We wish to take only a moment of your time on a matter of importance to the people of this state. This matter is of great importance to all the people of California and of vital importance to all the Workers. At the present time if you will take trouble to do so, you may step into the county courthouse and view a very interesting case now being tried before the superior court.

"There you will find eight men being tried on a charge of having violated the Criminal Syndicalism Law. Their conviction means a prison sentence of from 1 to 14 years. These men are not accused of having committed any overt act or of otherwise doing any deliberate thing which would jeopardize their liberty.

However, they are at the present moment almost certain of being convicted and given a long prison term without having been even accused of having committed any overt act.

"The law which makes such gross injustice possible was introduced before your state Legislature by a representative who admits never having read it previous to that time. A trio of degenerates will be on hand when the prosecution offers its evidence, and these three persons will offer, as testimony, some weird tales of crimes committed by themselves. These men who go continually from place to place trading for a few pieces of gold the liberty of honest workmen by claiming that while members of a certain labor organization they themselves had committed certain crimes, at the same time admitting that no punishment has ever been meted out to them for having done so. To the intelligent this should prove a fair example of what extremities men will go to for the sake of $10 per day and expenses.

"Did you ever stop to consider that with a sometime membership of several hundred thousand members that only three persons are to be found who knew of these acts having been committed. Think again that these three are employed continually for this purpose, and besides being of a very low moral type they admit having remained members of this organization to further the interests of some certain corporate interests who have at all times shown bitter enmity toward all labor organizations.

"There is another matter we would like to mention. In your city there is a wife, a mother, and she is waiting for some one who does not come home. This woman is Mrs. Barney Brooks, who is alone with two very small children because of a certain law which states that a man must answer for the thoughts and ideas of others who may now be dead and forgotten, if ever they lived at all.

"This young man who led a good, clean life among you for years made an apparent mistake, but a mistake only from a very narrow and selfish point of view. He wishes to improve working conditions for his own and other people's children when they arrive at the proper age. His wife and kiddies await him at home, and he cannot go to them because three perverted minds have contrived to turn lies into dollars, and laws are enacted which corporations can twist and turn to their financial benefit. This young man is being held under bonds of $2,500, and others already convicted of the same charge are out awaiting appeal under bonds of $250 each.

"We leave these facts for your consideration, and trust that you will investigate them. Then write to your newspaper and responsible officials and, in the name of fairness and justice, demand the repeal of this extremely vicious and inhuman piece of legislation.

"Yours for fair play and justice to all,

"California Branch of the General Defense Committee."

March 2, 1923, an indictment was duly filed charging Barney Brooks, Joe Wagner, and R. C. Russell with the crime of criminal syndicalism. March 6th the defendants entered pleas of not guilty. The case was set to be tried on the 26th of the same month. The record does not show on what day the order was made setting the case for trial, or whether it was before or after the mailing of the foregoing communication. March 22d, Brooks withdrew his plea of not guilty, and entered a plea of guilty. He was thereupon placed on probation. The trial of the other defendants was commenced March 26th. During the month of March three other actions were pending, in which the defendants therein were charged with criminal syndicalism. The trial dates of these cases were set and successively continued as follows: People v. Vargo et al., November 2, 1922, and January 2, January 15, February 21, March 5, March 6, and March 26, 1923; People v. Flanagan et al., February 5, February 6, March 13, and April 27, 1923; People v. Stewart et al., February 5, February 6, March 19, and May 5, 1923. In addition to the foregoing cases, there was pending another criminal syndicalism case against eight defendants. The trial of that action was commenced March 5, 1923, and was still in progress as late as March 18th.

March 2, 1923, a regular panel of jurors was drawn for service commencing the 12th day of March. Arnold's name was one of those so drawn. From this panel the jury was selected to try Wagner and Russell. Arnold was called into the jury box, examined as to his qualifications, and excused from service in that case.

The Legislature was in session at the time the alleged communication was mailed. A movement was then in progress to bring about the repeal of the Criminal Syndicalism Law (St. 1919, p. 281). The defendant contended at the trial and now urges that the communication was not sent for the purpose of influencing any juror but that it was merely a part of a general agitation to influence public opinion in favor of the repeal of the law. Appellant says that "the evidence in this case is practically without conflict." This may be conceded, but conflicting inferences may be rationally drawn from the evidence as to the purpose or intent with which the communication was sent.

The general defense committee of the I. W. W., with headquarters in Chicago, had charge of the defense of persons arrested under criminal syndicalism statutes. The defendant was secretary of the California branch of the committee, with offices in San Francisco. He was in charge of the defense of criminal syndicalism cases in this state. The alleged communication was mailed in San Francisco March 17, 1923, and the envelope containing it was addressed to H. D. Arnold, Sacramento. The defendant testified that it was a multigraph letter, and that he caused 20,000 copies thereof to be mailed to residents of Sacramento county between the 5th and the 25th of March, 1923; that he knew there were several criminal syndicalism cases then pending in that county; that a part of his work was "to keep a record of all cases pending"; that he knew Brooks, Wagner, and Russell were "in jail in Sacramento at that time, and twelve other men throughout the state, which were not listed as cases, they were individuals, they were in jail—no indictment returned, to my knowledge—no record of it in our office at that time"; that he had no information that a jury had been drawn in Sacramento county; that he had never heard of the name H. D. Arnold or of any of the four other jurors who, the evidence shows, received copies of the letter; that the thought that any of the letters might reach jurors or prospective jurors never crossed his mind, was never thought of or mentioned; that similar letters were sent to residents of nine counties prior to his arrest; that 25,000 were sent to Lassen county; that his intention in sending copies of the letter to residents of Sacramento county "was to make the public acquainted with these facts, to create public opinion which we believed would cause the repeal of this act, and to raise funds to defend these cases"; that there were two Sacramento county telephone directories in his office from which names and addresses of residents of that county were taken in mailing out literature. There were inclosed in the envelopes containing these letters, two printed leaflets attacking the Syndicalism Law and prosecutions had thereunder. The defendant's office was searched at the time of his arrest, and packages of letters were found therein addressed to the residents of several counties, including Lassen and Siskiyou. The evidence shows that there was a criminal syndicalism case pending in each of those counties at that time.

[1] Appellant says that "the defendant caused to be mailed a large quantity of printed matter relating to the injustice of prosecutions under the Criminal Syndicalist Act and to the repeal of that act; that one of these letters was addressed to H. D. Arnold, and referred to the misfortune of one accused of this crime and whose case was pending in the same court in which H. D. Arnold had been summoned as a juror. The proof is utterly insufficient to show either that Mr. Connors had mailed the letter to Arnold, or, that, if he had done so, his act was corrupt." If the defendant caused the letter to be mailed, his guilt is not less than if he had personally mailed it. It may be conceded that the evidence does not show that the defendant actually knew of the existence even of such a person as Arnold, or that he had been drawn or summoned as a juror. It does not necessarily follow, however, that the defendant did not corruptly attempt to influence such juror. Had defendant given directions to one of his agents to place a copy of the letter in the hands of every person drawn as a juror in syndicalism cases, and the agent, in pursuance of such directions, had given a copy to Arnold, it would not be contended that the defendant could shield himself behind his ignorance of the fact that Arnold was one of such jurors. Neither is such a defense available to the defendant, if he caused copies of the letter to be mailed to 20,000 residents of Sacramento county in the hope and expectation of thereby reaching many jurors, and with the intent of corruptly influencing them. It is not a question of transfer of intent from one objective to another, as in People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 138, 78 P. 470; People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 75 P. 1093; People v. Ramirez, 64 Cal. App. 358, 221 P. 960, but the application of an intent manifested toward a class of persons to every individual of that class.

"A man out of general malignity may fire on a crowd or may displace a rail on a railway, and then, if any life be lost, he is responsible for murder, though he may have had no intention of taking any particular life. * * * When there is a general intent to do evil * * * of which evil the wrong actually done may be looked upon as a probable incident, then the party having such general intent is to be regarded as having intended the particular wrong. A man using a deadly weapon in a crowd, intending to kill, must be regarded as intending to kill all within the range of the weapon." Wharton's Criminal Law (11th Ed.), § 157.

If, in such a case, the person using the deadly weapon be charged with the intent to kill a particular person in the crowd, it would be no defense to prove that the defendant did not know of the existence of such person. On the other hand, if the defendant herein sent out copies of the letter promiscuously, in good faith, for the sole purpose of creating public opinion in favor of the repeal of the Syndicalism Law, and without any intention of influencing jurors, then the mere fact that copies of the letter were by chance sent to some of the jurors, the defendant not knowing that they were jurors, would not establish the corrupt intent essential to constitute the crime charged.

[2] In view of defendant's knowledge of the pendency of the syndicalism cases in court, of the discussion in the letter of the situation of one of the defendants and of his family, of the disparaging statements therein relative to witnesses who would probably testify in those cases, of the denunciation of prosecutions under the syndicalism law contained in the printed leaflets accompanying the letter, and of the fact that similar letters were sent to other counties in which syndicalism cases were pending, it cannot be said that there is not sufficient evidence to support the implied finding of the jury that the letter was sent with intent to corruptly influence the juror. Whether or not such intent was present in the act was a question for the jury under the conflicting evidence.

[3] Complaint is made of the court's refusal to permit the defendant to state the purpose and intent with which he sent out the copies of the letter and leaflets. Such evidence was clearly admissible, and, later in the trial, the court permitted the defendant to state fully such purpose and intent. Under those circumstances, the defendant's rights were not prejudiced by the erroneous ruling first made.

[4] Appellant contends that it was error to refuse a proposed instruction stating five elements of the crime necessary to justify a conviction. The instruction appears to be faultless except as to the fourth element of the crime charged. That part of the instruction was erroneous in stating that, in order to justify a conviction, it was necessary to find that, at the time the letter was sent, the defendant "knew that said H. D. Arnold was on the said jury list, and might be chosen as a juror on the trial of the said criminal action against Barney Brooks." As hereinbefore stated, if the defendant sent 20,000 copies of the letter in an attempt to corruptly influence all jurors into whose hands they probably would be delivered, in respect to their verdict to be rendered in the Brooks Case, and a copy was delivered to Arnold, the fact that the defendant did not know that Arnold had been summoned as a juror was immaterial, because the general intent to corrupt the jurors on the panel included the particular intent to corrupt Arnold. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that H. D. Arnold was a juror regularly summoned and drawn as such, in the superior court of the state of California, on the 12th day of March, 1923, and continued to be such juror until after the 20th day of March, 1923, and if you further find from the evidence that the defendant, Tom Connors, corruptly attempted, by a written communication, as alleged in the indictment, to influence said juror H. D. Arnold, in respect to his verdict in, or decision of any cause or proceeding pending, or about to be brought before him as such summoned or drawn juror, then you should find the defendant guilty."

Appellant contends that this instruction is prejudicially erroneous. The contention must be sustained. The indictment alleges the pendency of but one action, that of People v. Brooks et al., and charges a corrupt attempt to influence the juror Arnold in respect to his verdict to be rendered in that particular action. The indictment would have been fatally defective if it had failed to state the action, or class of actions, in respect to which the alleged attempt to influence the juror was made. It may be conceded that it would have been sufficient to allege that the corrupt attempt was made to influence the juror to vote not guilty in all pending criminal syndicalism cases in which he might sit as a juror, without naming any particular case. People v. Markham, 64 Cal. 157, 30 P. 620, 49 Am. Rep. 700. The indictment, however, was not framed upon that theory. The fact that the letter would probably tend as strongly to influence the juror in respect to his verdict in other pending syndicalism cases as in the Brooks Case is immaterial. It would probably have as much tendency to influence the other jurors who received copies thereof as Arnold, but no one would contend that, under the charge stated in the indictment, the defendant could be convicted of attempting to influence such other jurors. The vice of the instruction is that it authorized the jury to convict the defendant of a crime with which he was not charged. In State v. Moore, 178 Mo. 348, 77 S. W. 522, the information charged the defendant with a felonious assault upon one Nancy M. Lewis. It was held error to instruct the jury to find the defendant guilty, "if he unlawfully committed an assault upon Nancy M. Lewis, Troy Lewis or Roy Lewis, or any of them." Presumably, the assault had been made upon the three persons named. The instruction in that case, of course, was manifestly erroneous, but it did not differ in principle from the one here in question. Every person who enters any building "with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary." Pen. Code, § 459. In People v. Mulkey, 65 Cal. 501, 4 P. 507, it is said:

"The defendant was charged by information with the crime of feloniously entering a certain dwelling-house with intent to commit larceny. The court below instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the defendant entered the house with the intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony, they should find him guilty. This instruction was clearly erroneous. There is nothing better settled than that the crime charged must be proved before a conviction can be had."

If there had been no other syndicalism case pending at the time the letter was sent, the error in the instruction might be regarded as harmless, under the constitutional provision forbidding the reversal of judgments on the ground of mere technical errors (Const. art. 6, § 4½), because the letter would have no tendency to influence a juror in other classes of cases. But, as stated, three other syndicalism cases were then pending awaiting trial, and a fourth case was being tried, and the defendant testified that he knew of the pendency of these four cases, but did not know that an indictment had been found against Brooks, though he knew Brooks had been arrested. The trials of syndicalism cases often run through several weeks. The jury may have found that, at the time the letter was sent, the defendant reasonably believed that these cases would be tried in the order in which the indictments therein were found, and that consequently the panel of which Arnold was a member would be discharged before the Brooks Case was reached, and that, therefore, the letter was sent with the purpose of influencing Arnold's verdict in any of the three cases awaiting trial in which he might serve, rather than in the Brooks Case. If the jury had expressly found the defendant guilty of attempting to influence Arnold in respect to his verdict to be rendered in the Vargo, Flanagan or Stewart Case, it would not be contended that the verdict could be upheld, because the defendant was not charged with attempting to influence the verdict to be rendered in any of those cases. It is equally clear that the verdict returned cannot stand, because, under the instruction given, it may have been based upon a finding by the jury that the defendant attempted to influence Arnold's verdict to be rendered in one of the three cases last mentioned, and not in the case alleged in the indictment.

The judgment and the order are reversed.

AMERICAN MARINE PAINT CO. v. NYNO LINE, Inc. (Civ. 4800.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 30, 1924.)

1. Trial ⇨194(7)—Undisputed testimony held to show falsity of representations, if made so that instruction to that effect did invade jury's province.

Undisputed testimony held to show falsity of representations of broker's agent that broker was to receive only 2 per cent. from commission demanded for sale of defendant's vessel, so that instruction that the representation, if made, was false, did not invade jury's province.

In broker's action for commission for sale of vessel, defended on ground that broker's agent procured contract for 5 per cent. commission, by false representations that he was required to pay 3 per cent. to the buyers, an instruction, which inaptly used the word "he" as referring to broker, a company, held not misleading.

3. Trial ⇨295(1)—Instruction to be considered as whole.

In determining whether jury has been properly instructed, instructions are to be considered as a whole.

6. Brokers ⇨8(3)—Evidence held to establish between defendant company and broker's agent, an agency imposing exercise of highest good faith.

Evidence held to establish between broker's agent and broker's principal an agency to sell principal's vessel, which imposed upon the agent the duty to act in the highest good faith towards the principal, and precluded him from obtaining any advantage by virtue of his agency.

13. Brokers ⇨86(7)—Proof of actual loss from misrepresentation not necessary, but sufficient if necessary.

Broker's agent having obtained defendant's promise to pay commission of 5 per cent. on sale of vessel by falsely representing that it was necessary to pay 3 per cent. to buyers, proof of actual loss to defendant was not necessary to defeat recovery of commissions, but, if necessary, was supplied by fact that recovery would deprive plaintiff of money rightfully belonging to it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by the American Marine Paint Company against the Nyno Line, Inc. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ira S. Lillick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. G. Van Pelt and Loren O. Crenshaw, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. An appeal by plaintiff from a judgment rendered in favor of defendant, after verdict by a jury, in an action brought to recover the sum of $16,500, claimed to be due appellant as commission for the sale of the steamer Portland, belonging to the respondent, under a contract wherein a gross commission of 5 per cent. of the purchase price was agreed upon. The contention of respondent upon the merits was and is that W. C. Lacombe, the admitted agent and representative of the appellant company, with whom the agreement with respondent for the sale of said steamer was made, and by whom the transaction with the purchaser thereof was conducted, had procured the contract calling for a 5 per cent. commission through fraud, in that he had falsely and fraudulently represented to respondent that he would be required, in any sale which he would consummate, to pay the purchaser or purchasers of said steamer a sum equal to 3 per cent. of the purchase price, out of his commission, and that, for that reason, he would have to receive a commission equal to 5 per cent. of the purchase price, otherwise he could not consummate said sale, and would not undertake to do so. Respondent claims that, relying upon such representations, it agreed to make said sale and to pay said commission, which it otherwise would not have done.

This is the third time an appeal has been taken in this action. Juries in the two former trials found for the appellant, but the verdicts were set aside, and new trials were granted by the trial court, and the orders granting the same were, upon appeal, affirmed. The order granting the new trial following the first verdict was general in its terms, but upon appeal, when the question arose as to the ground upon which it was granted, it was held that, whether said order was based upon the insufficiency of evidence or confusing instructions, the trial court had not abused its discretion in granting the same. American Marine Paint Co. v. Nyno Line, 45 Cal. App. 1, 187 P. 71. The order, granting the retrial following the second verdict, was made upon the express ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict. Upon appeal it was again held that the trial court acted within its discretion in granting a new trial, and that therefore the order appealed from should be and was affirmed. American Marine Paint Co. v. Nyno Line, 56 Cal. App. 331, 205 P. 45. In this last trial the jury found a verdict for respondent, and judgment was entered accordingly. Appellant now seeks a reversal of said judgment upon the grounds that the instructions given to the jury were erroneous and that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The evidence offered during this last trial was practically the same as that presented upon the preceding trial.

[1] Briefly stated, it is to the effect that in January, 1916, the Portland was on drydock, near the city of New York, and at the request of a representative of the president of the respondent company, Lacombe agreed to interest himself in the sale of said steamer for a commission equal to 3 per cent. of the sale price. A month later Lacombe opened negotiations with one Aaby, who was the son and representative of a Norwegian shipowner, which resulted in the making of a tentative offer by Aaby for the purchase of said steamer for $325,000, which included the payment of a commission to Aaby out of the sale price. Lacombe forwarded the terms of Aaby's offer, by telegram, to Will E. Keller, the president of respondent company, who at that time was in California, and regarding commissions stated:

"Commissions 5 per cent. foreign buyers which makes additional commissions necessary to close deal."

Keller, in his reply telegram to Lacombe, after setting forth the terms upon which he would sell the vessel, stated:

"Out of this will pay you eight thousand dollars commissions."

A few days later Lacombe wrote Aaby a letter, offering on behalf of Keller to sell the steamer for a gross price of $325,000, and on the same day wrote him another letter wherein he stated that, upon final payment for the vessel, Aaby would receive a commission of 1 per cent. on the total purchase price. About the same time, pursuant to a previous private arrangement between Lacombe and one Palmer, Lacombe agreed to pay Palmer 1 per cent. of the purchase price. Later, on the same day, Lacombe sent a telegram to Keller reading:

"Compelled to allow buyers three per cent.; cannot complete deal less five per cent."

Afterwards, on the same day, February 29, 1916, Aaby handed Lacombe a letter specifying more particularly the terms of his offer and at the same time deposited with Lacombe a check for $25,000. Thereupon Lacombe immediately sent Keller a telegram embodying the terms of Aaby's offer, but making no mention of the commissions. Lacombe learned, for the first time, from the check and letter of Aaby, that the Kerr Steamship Company of New York City, and not Aaby's father, as he had previously supposed, was the prospective purchaser. The contents of the telegrams above mentioned are set forth in the opinion rendered upon the preceding appeal, making it unnecessary to again quote the same here. In order to avoid any misunderstanding about the matter, Lacombe in the evening of that same day, February 29, 1916, telephoned to Keller at Los Angeles, the former being at the time in New York, and the terms of that conversation, over the telephone, apparently served as the vital factor in the case, and about the truth of which the parties are wholly disagreed. Regarding the discussion of commissions over the telephone Lacombe testified:

"I asked Mr. Keller had he received my two telegrams. Mr. Keller replied that he had and said didn't I think the commission was rather stiff, and I told him 'No'; I had to have the amount stated in my telegram, and I had other parties to take care of. Mr. Keller's remark to me over the phone was 'Well, then go ahead and close it up.'"

Lacombe's testimony is, to some extent, corroborated by Palmer, who was with Lacombe when the latter telephoned. Keller's version of the telephone conversation is different. He testified as follows:

"He said he would have to allow the buyers 3 per cent. or the trade would not go through; claimed he would have to have 5 per cent. to put the trade through or it would not go. I objected to paying 5 per cent. and told him I thought it was entirely too high. He said the trade would not go through unless he could allow the purchaser of the boat 3 per cent. I told him I was anxious to sell the boat, and if it was absolutely necessary to make the trade, and he had to allow the buyers 3 per cent. to go ahead."

Keller's testimony is in a measure supported by Aaby, who was also present with Lacombe when the latter telephoned from New York. Later Keller, at Lacombe's request, made over the phone, confirmed by telegram the authority to sell the vessel, and regarding commissions, the telegram read:

"We to pay you five per cent. commission on three hundred and twenty five thousand dollars when remainder three hundred thousand is paid."

The vessel was afterwards delivered to the buyer and the purchase price was paid.

The court gave the following instruction to the jury, at the request of respondent:

"In considering the evidence, you must treat the American Marine Paint Company, the plaintiff herein, and Mr. Lacombe, as one person, and if you believe from the evidence that Mr. Lacombe in his telephone conversation with Mr. Keller led Mr. Keller to believe that he was receiving only 2 per cent., and that others were receiving 3 per cent. of the purchase price, as a commission, then such statements are false and untrue, for the evidence of Mr. Lacombe clearly shows that the plaintiff was receiving in excess of 2 per cent."

[2-5] Appellant contends that the instruction contains an inaccurate statement of the effect of Lacombe's evidence, and was an invasion of the province of the jury in that it was an instruction upon a question of fact. There is no merit in either point. The statement of the effect of Lacombe's evidence is in full accord with the undisputed testimony given by him upon that point. As stated in the instructions, Lacombe and his employer, American Marine Paint Company, must be treated as one person, and Lacombe admits that out of the transaction his employer was to receive 2 per cent. commission and he personally was to receive an additional 1 per cent., making a clear 3 per cent. commission for "plaintiff," which in itself proves the falsity of Lacombe's representation that plaintiff was receiving only 2 per cent. of the commissions, if, in fact, such representation was made. True, the pronoun "he" was inaptly used in said instruction as referring to plaintiff, but we think the jury could not have been misled thereby, in view of the fact that it has never been contended by any one at any time that Lacombe represented that he personally was going to receive 2 per cent. of the commissions. If, however, any confusion did arise therefrom, it was entirely dispelled by instruction No. 18, given at the request of respondent, which plainly stated to the jury the terms of the representation respondent claims was made by Lacombe; and, furthermore, the evidence upon this subject was perfectly clear. In determining whether a jury has been properly instructed as to the law, the instructions taken as a whole must be considered (Henderson v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 150 Cal. 689, 89 P. 976; Taylor v. Pacific Electric Co., 172 Cal. 638, 158 P. 119); and questionable instructions are not ground for reversal where the rights of appellant are clearly stated to the jury in other instructions. Moore v. San Vicente Lumber Co., 175 Cal. 212, 165 P. 687.

[6-9] Appellant also attacks instructions Nos. 12 and 22 upon the ground that said instructions contain an assumption of agency which is not supported by the evidence. In this respect appellant claims that the evidence shows that Lacombe was not vested with the discretion to fix the terms for the sale of said vessel, and therefore was not an agent or broker for the respondent company, but was merely a middleman, and as such owed no duty to respondent such as was described by the court in its instructions upon the question of fraud. We think it manifest from the evidence already narrated that, not only was there an agency established, but one that imposed upon Lacombe the duty to act in the highest good faith toward the principal and precluded him from obtaining any advantage over his principal in any transaction by virtue of his agency. Calmon v. Sarraile, 142 Cal. 638, 76 P. 486. The fact that he had no discretion to fix the price for the sale of the vessel did not relieve him from the responsibility of acting in good faith toward his principal. The rights of the principal will not be changed nor the capacity of the agent enlarged by the fact that the agent is not invested with a discretion, but simply acts under an authority to purchase a particular article at a specified price, or to sell a particular article at the market price (Porter v. Woodruff, 36 N. J. Eq. 180); nor does it matter whether or not his employment be called an agency.

"Everyone—whether designated agent, trustee, servant, or what not—who is under contract or other legal obligation to represent or act for another in any particular business or line of business, or for any valuable purpose, must be loyal and faithful to the interest of such other in respect to such business or purpose. He cannot lawfully serve or acquire any private interest of his own in opposition to it. This is a rule of common sense and honesty as well as of law. The agent is not entitled to avail himself of any advantage that his position may give him to profit beyond the agreed compensation for his services." R. C. L. vol. 21, p. 825.

[10] Appellant further complains that the instruction given by the court upon the question of fraud did not include all of the essential elements thereof, namely, that the misrepresentation must be upon a material point; that it was necessary to show that Lacombe knew that the representation was false when it was made; that there was an intent to deceive; that respondent had a right to rely on Lacombe's representations; and that the defendant suffered damage. It may be conceded that an instruction embodying those elements, except the last one, would have been proper; but the inclusion of those elements was not indispensable. The instructions given did not contain a misdirection to the jury, but rather an incomplete direction. In such case, an appellant is in no position to complain, when he has not asked for a more specific and explicit instruction. Rice v. Whitmore, 74 Cal. 619, 16 P. 501, 5 Am. St. Rep. 479; Nichol v. Laumeister, 102 Cal. 658, 36 P. 925; Peluso v. City Taxi Co., 41 Cal. App. 297, 182 P. 808.

[11, 12] We are also of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict in favor of respondent. The decision rendered upon the preceding appeal practically disposed of this question when it sustained the ruling of the trial court granting a new trial to respondent, upon the sole ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, after the jury had rendered its verdict in favor of the appellant. It appears from the opinion there rendered that there were but two debatable questions of fact left open for the jury's determination; the first of which was whether or not Lacombe represented over the telephone that "he was compelled to allow the purchaser 3 per cent. or the trade would not go through," and, secondly, as to whether the jury believed Keller's testimony that he relied upon such statement and that, but for that reliance, would not have agreed to pay the commission of 5 per cent. which Lacombe insisted upon. The jury by its verdict resolved those questions of fact in favor of respondent and, having done so, its verdict must be accepted as controlling. The materiality of the representation is shown by Keller's testimony to the effect that, had it not been for the representation, he would not have made the contract for the payment of 5 per cent. commission; such was the very basis of the contract, so far as these parties were concerned; the falsity of the representation was proved by the fact that Lacombe knew before he telephoned that the payment of the additional 3 per cent. commission to the buyers was not necessary in order to make the sale; and the question of whether Lacombe intended to deceive respondent was one for the jury to pass upon from all the evidence before it. The circumstances under which the contract was made, including the legal relationship of the parties, were ample to warrant respondent in relying upon the statements of Lacombe.

[13] Proof of actual loss to respondent was not necessary in view of the agency established between the parties. An agent will not be permitted to justify the violation of his trust and retain from his principal the fruits of his fraud upon the plea that the principal would not be damaged thereby. But, if such proof be necessary, it is supplied by the fact that respondent would, in the event of appellant's recovery, have been deprived of an amount of money equal to 3 per cent. of the purchase price of the vessel, which amount, not being paid to the purchaser, rightfully belonged to respondent.

Finding no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 18, 1924.)

1. Adverse possession ⚡13—Hostile occupancy is occupancy with hostile intent known to owner.

Hostile occupancy consists of hostile intent in mind of adverse claimant during occupancy and knowledge thereof by owner.

2. Adverse possession ⚡57, 85(1)—Burden on occupant to prove occupancy hostile and continued.

Presumption being that holder of legal title has been in possession within statutory period and that occupation by another was subordinate to it, claimant of title by adverse possession has burden of proving his occupancy hostile and for five-year period.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1011(1) — Finding on conflicting evidence that use of land was under claim of right not disturbed.

In suit to quiet title to easement for pole line, court's finding on conflicting evidence, in effect, that use was under claim of right, will not be disturbed on appeal; the question being one of fact.

4. Easements ⚡5—Claim of right must be actually or presumptively known to owner.

Right of way by prescription may be established by use under claim of right known to owner or use so notorious as to give rise to presumption of claim of right.

5. Easements ⚡36(1)—In event of presumption of grant, adverse user under communicated claim also presumed.

Where open and uninterrupted use of easement is sufficiently long to create presumption of grant, law will presume also that use was hostile and under communicated claim of right.

6. Easements ⚡36(3)—Evidence held to support finding of adverse occupancy under communicated claim.

Evidence of long-continued peaceful maintenance of electric pole line, and evidence also of actual lost grant, held sufficient to warrant finding that occupancy was adverse and under communicated claim of right either on theory of actual or presumed grant.

7. Easements ⚡36(1) — Claim of right to easement presumed from use for prescriptive period.

Presumption of use, adverse and under claim of right, arises from undisputed enjoyment of easement for period of prescription, which must be met by party alleging use by license.

8. Easements ⚡61(12) — Territorial description of easement for electric transmission line held sufficient.

Territorial description of easement for electric transmission line to which title was quieted held sufficient, where it was described by courses and distances and as being 15 feet in width equally on each side of line; pole line itself being established monument.

9. Easements ⚡61(12)—Description of easement for electric transmission line not indefinite for failure to state character of materials to be used; "secondary easement."

Description of easement for electric transmission line, in judgment quieting title thereto, is not indefinite for failure to designate character of materials to be used, since every easement includes "secondary easement," being right to do things necessary to full enjoyment of easement itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Secondary Easement.]

10. Easements ⚡41, 54—Prescriptive rights strictly construed; owner may make improvements or changes not affecting substance of easement.

Rights acquired by prescription are stricti juris, and extent of easement so acquired is determined by the user; but, so long as use of easement is confined to purposes under which it was acquired without increasing the burden on the servient estate, the owner of the easement may make improvements or changes that do not impair or affect its substance.

11. Easements ⚡36(3)—Evidence as to user held to warrant fixing width of easement.

In proceeding to quiet title to easement for electric transmission line, evidence as to user under which easement was gained held to warrant fixing width as 15 feet lying equally on each side of pole line.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Suit by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company against the Crockett Land & Cattle Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Thos. J. Straub, L. H. Sussman, and M. R. Jones, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to quiet title to an alleged easement consisting of a certain right of way for a pole line, and to restrain defendants from interfering with its use.

Plaintiff is a public utility corporation, and it claims that it and its predecessors in estate have owned and actually possessed and used the electric transmission line in question across the premises of defendant corporation since about the year 1901. The interests claimed in the amended complaint are the right to the easement of the pole line which is described by surveyor's angles and distances; the right to repair; a right of way of ingress and egress 30 feet wide along the line of the poles; and the right to an easement for the overhang along the boundary line.

The evidence discloses that the pole line so situated on the defendants' property consists of 26 poles, each pole being approximately 29 feet in height above the ground, with a vertical pipe extension affixed to the top thereof 5 feet in length. On each of these poles there are three cross-arms. The lower one carries telephone wires used by the plaintiff company for its own private purposes; the next supports three strands of wire through which 11,000 volts of electricity pass; and the upper cross-arms, together with the pipe extension, have attached thereto three strands of wire carrying 60,000 volts.

The transmission line was originally constructed during the years 1900 and 1903 by the Bay Counties Power Company, plaintiff's predecessor in interest. As originally constructed, the line carried 11,000 volts of electricity. In the year 1906 the line was reconstructed and the 60,000-volt circuit was installed. Title to the line in question passed by grant and delivery of possession in October, 1907, from the Bay Counties Power Company to the California Gas & Electric Company, which latter company subsequently and two years later executed a conveyance of all its property to the present plaintiff. The two transmission lines installed on the premises of defendant as above described have always been operated and used for supplying electricity for public use in the towns of Crockett, Selby, Richmond, and adjacent territory. From the time of its installation the line has been in continuous service and has been maintained by plaintiff and its predecessors, who have kept it in proper operation and repair, and in so doing they have maintained regular patrolmen in order that proper service over the same might be had. Necessary repairs were always made openly and in the daytime. No objection of any kind was ever made by any one to the maintenance of the transmission lines or to their repair and upkeep until along about the year 1914 or 1915, when one Thomas R. Hanna, president of the defendant company and the husband of one of the owners of the land, made certain inquiries through officers of plaintiff corporation concerning its rights or interest in the easement in question and the status of the pole line; and later along about the year 1915 or 1916 he ordered the poles removed. Plaintiff company refused to comply with this demand. The following year Hanna also objected to certain repairs being made. Before making the inquiry concerning plaintiff's rights in the premises or registering his objection to the presence of the pole lines, Hanna had examined the record of the county and had been unable to discover any record establishing plaintiff's rights. His testimony shows, however, that defendants' predecessors in interest knew of the original construction of the transmission line and its enlargement in 1906, for he testified that his mother-in-law, a Mrs. L. S. Muir, who was the owner of the land during those periods, maintained an agent upon the premises to whom the tenants regularly paid their rents. Other evidence shows that plaintiff and its predecessors in interest in the pole line and easements in question were the owners thereof, having been in actual, open, visible, continuous, and uninterrupted possession and use of the same since about the year 1901 and up to the very time of the commencement of the action. An attempt was made by plaintiff to show that its predecessor in interest, the Bay Counties Power Company, secured a grant from the owner of the land to the easements in question. Mr. P. M. Downing, in charge of the electrical construction of plaintiff company, and who formerly was associated with the Bay Counties Power Company, testified that it was the policy of that company to always secure the consent of the owner to go upon the land and that it never trespassed upon other people's property. He further testified that many of the written documents giving that company rights on lands were lost during the fire in San Francisco in 1906 before they were ever recorded; that during the early days of the company's existence it was not customary to record all deeds and documents, and that its policy was not changed until the year 1905 or 1906; and that a large number of grants of rights of way were in the office of the attorney of the company unrecorded at the time of the fire and were destroyed.

In accordance with this evidence, the trial court found plaintiff to be the owner and in the actual possession, use, and enjoyment of the claimed easements, and a judgment accordingly went in plaintiff's favor quieting its title to the easement in the pole line and the overhang, and it also allowed plaintiff an easement of ingress and egress of 15 feet in width along the line of the poles, and enjoined any interference with its proper use and possession.

In support of this appeal it is first claimed by appellants that there is no evidence to support the finding that respondent company ever claimed an easement or occupied the land of appellants with hostile intent; and, second, that there is no evidence which in any way sustains the implied finding that appellants at any time had any knowledge of any claimed hostile intent in the mind of the respondent company. In other words, it is appellants' contention that the judgment is premised upon the sole theory that adverse possession is established by proof of mere occupancy for a period in excess of five years unattended by any color of title or claim of right.

[1, 2] It is, of course, elementary that in cases of this character the asserted hostile claim must be manifested to the true owner. The owner must be informed in some way that the possession is hostile, or the statute does not operate against his right. The object of the statute in defining the acts essential to constitute an adverse possession is that the real owner may by unequivocal acts of the disseisor have notice of the adverse holding, and be thereby called upon to assert his legal title. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100. The owner will not be condemned to lose his land because he has failed to sue for its recovery where he has no notice that it is held or claimed adversely, but the statute cuts off his remedy only when he has neglected to commence his action within the period assigned for it. Thompson v. Pioche, 44 Cal. 508. Hostile occupancy consists of two elements: First, hostile intent in the mind of the adverse claimant, coupled with, second, knowledge on the part of the owner. These two elements must be present to support a claim of hostile occupancy. It is therefore not sufficient that the claim of right exist only in the mind of the person asserting it. It must be manifested in such manner that the owner has knowledge thereof. Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 456, 12 P. 491. Neither a hostile intent without occupation nor occupation without hostile intent is sufficient. The burden of proving the hostile claim is, of course, upon the party in possession claiming against the holder of the legal title. In an action for the recovery of real property or the possession thereof, the person establishing a legal title is presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law; and the occupation of the property by any other person is deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title unless it appears that the property has been held and possessed adversely to such legal owner for five years before the commencement of the action; and the burden of proof is upon the person in possession claiming against the holder of the legal title to show that his occupancy is hostile and not subordinate to the legal title. Janke v. McMahon, 21 Cal. App. 781, 133 P. 21.

[3] Here the court found in effect that plaintiff's possession and use were hostile and under a claim of right communicated to the owner of the land covered by the pole line and easement. The question as to whether the use was under claim of right is one for the court or jury to determine as a fact in the light of the relations between the parties and the surrounding circumstances, and where there is a conflict upon this subject the findings will, of course, not be disturbed here. Wells v. Dias, 57 Cal. App. 670, 207 P. 913.

[4] The contention of appellants that there is no evidence of hostile occupancy is predicated upon their claim that in no case is the hostile state of mind of the hostile claimant ever presumed, but independent evidence must always be offered competent to prove this state of mind, and that proof of mere occupancy alone has no probative relevancy to this issue. But a right of way by prescription may be established in either of two ways: First, by use with knowledge on the part of the owner whose land is used that the person using the same claims a right to so use it; second, by a use so open and notorious that knowledge of a claim of right will be presumed. Evidence in negation of either or both of these ways is competent. Evidence disproving an actual knowledge of any claim of right compels the claimant to rely on the use of the land so visible, open, and notorious that the law will presume a knowledge of the claim to use it as a matter of right.

[5] There are three ways in which occupancy may be initiated, namely, through a trespass, under a license, or by a grant. Where there is no evidence to enlighten a court or jury under which manner the original entry was made, the court may indulge the presumption of a grant. It is, of course, a rule of elementary application that in order to establish a prescriptive title the claimant must show every element to constitute a title. Thus he must prove that the possession was actual, open, and notorious, continuous for the full time required by the statute, exclusive, hostile, and under a claim of right. It is also an elementary rule, however, that in the absence of direct evidence as to the nature of the entry, long continued, peaceable possession of land accompanied by the usual acts of ownership justifies the presumption that the adverse holding is under a communicated claim of right based upon a lost grant to the claimant of the property. This presumption supplies the place of positive proof of an ancient grant. Presumptions of this character are adopted from the general infirmity of human nature, the difficulty of preserving muniments of title, and public policy in supporting long and uninterrupted possession. They are founded upon the consideration that the facts are such as could not, according to the ordinary course of human affairs, occur unless there was a presumptive title to or admission of an existing adverse title in the party in possession. Accordingly, it has been held in this state that where an open and uninterrupted use of an easement for a sufficient length of time to create the presumption of a grant is shown, the law will presume the elements of hostile intent and that the use is adverse and under a claim of right. Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 205, 63 P. 361; Fleming v. Howard, 150 Cal. 28, 87 P. 908; Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 P. 10. If the other party relies upon the fact that these acts were permissive or in the nature of a license, or merely given as a matter of accommodation, it is incumbent upon him to rebut the presumption of a non-appearing grant. Otherwise the presumption stands as sufficient proof and establishes the right. Yuba Cons. Goldfields v. Hilton, 16 Cal. App. 228, 116 P. 712, 715; Costello v. Sharp (Cal. App.) 223 P. 567; Ricoli v. Lynch (Cal. App.) 223 P. 88. If there is any evidence which throws any light upon the question as to whether the occupancy was under a license or a claim of right, it presents a question of fact, and a finding thereon is here conclusive. Wells v. Dias, supra; Ricoli v. Lynch, supra.

[6] Here the trial court expressly found that plaintiff's occupancy was adverse and under a communicated claim of right to the owner of the legal title. It is immaterial whether such finding is based upon the evidence of Downing relating to the lost grant, or is reached by indulging the presumption that one was executed, for in either case it constitutes evidence upon the subject; and not being repelled, is sufficient to support the finding and conclusion here. Alper v. Tormey, 7 Cal. App. 8, 93 P. 402.

[7] We are cited by appellants to California cases which they claim are in conflict with these views and which support their contention that direct proof upon the subject is requisite. We do not deem an analysis of these cases necessary. They are cases in the main presenting the situation where the facts and circumstances surrounding the entry disprove and dispel the theory of a grant. Whatever may be said of the language employed in some of them, there can be no question that the rule is firmly established in this state that the presumption that the use was under a claim of right and adverse arises from an undisputed enjoyment of an easement for the established period of prescription; and the burden is upon the party alleging that the use has been by virtue of a license or permission to prove that fact by affirmative evidence, and defendants have not met this burden.

In connection with this subject it is urged by respondents in support of the judgment that its title to the pole line and easements claimed is established under the evidence by the doctrine of occupancy for public use as laid down in the case of Gurney v. N. C. P. Co., 160 Cal. 669, 117 P. 906, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185. The conclusion we have reached upon the subject relative to plaintiff's rights in the claimed easement renders unnecessary a discussion of this question.

Appellants further contend that even conceding the evidence shows that respondent did acquire a prescriptive title, the judgment fails to contain an exact description of the adjudicated easements or the territorial locat on of the pole line. This seems to be its main contention, as the objection is described as the basic cause of this appeal and the principal reason why appellants are dissatisfied with the judgment.

The easement is described in the findings and judgment as follows:

"The right to repair, maintain, reconstruct, use, and operate for the transmission of electricity and for its own private telephone purposes in connection therewith, an electric transmission line consisting of one line of poles with wires, cross-arms, braces, guys, insulators, pins and fixtures installed thereon, constructed and erected upon, over and across the following described tract of land situated in the county of Contra Costa, state of California, to wit: The most westerly 1571.79 acres of the northerly portion of Rancho Canada del Hambre y las Bolsas, more particularly described in the deed of partition of Raye, Piper and Crockett, recorded in vol. 14 of Deeds, at page 171, in the office of the county recorder of Contra Costa, said land being bounded on the north by Carquinez strait and the town of Valona, on the east by the lands of the California Hawaiian Sugar Refining Company, on the south by the lands of B. Fernandez, and on the west by the lands of Tormey; together with a right of way along the same 15 feet in width lying equally on each side of the hereinafter described center line, for all purposes connected with the proper repair, maintenance, reconstruction, patrolling, use, and operation thereof for the purposes hereinbefore specified, and also the right of ingress thereto and egress therefrom along, on and within said fifteen feet right of way. Said electric transmission line has at all times herein mentioned been maintained and operated for the purposes aforesaid by plaintiff in the same location as that in which the same is now being maintained and operated."

"Said transmission line is located on and across said tract of land, and the center line thereof is more particularly described as follows, to wit: Commencing at pole bearing No. 1/6 of said transmission line which is north 73 degrees 25 minutes west 78 feet from the intersection of the center line of Flora street with the center line of Fifth avenue in the town of Valona, said county and state, and runs thence west 471.5 feet to pole bearing No. 1/9 of said transmission line; thence north 69 degrees 24 minutes west 1,850.9 feet; thence north 67 degrees 09 minutes west 380.7 feet; thence north 71 degrees 19 minutes west 211 feet; thence north 50 degrees 26 minutes west 1,577.9 feet; thence north 70 degrees 44 minutes west 177.8 feet; thence north 88 degrees 24 minutes west 86.5 feet to the fence marking the northwesterly boundary line of said tract of land. * * * Said plaintiff also owns the right to maintain, repair and use existing guys on poles 1/9, 1/18, 1/22, 1/31 and 1/32."

[8] The objection, in so far as it concerns the territorial description, is that there is nothing to show where the pole line enters the property line of defendant or where it leaves the same. There is no merit in this objection. There can be no question but that an easement consisting of a right of way must contain a description of the land which is to be subjected to the servitude with sufficient clearness to locate it. While here the land is described as the most westerly 1,571.79 acres of the northerly portion of the tract, the judgment further fixes the transmission line as being on and across said tract of land the center line thereof commencing at a pole, bearing the mark $\frac{1}{8}$, of said line, which is 73 degrees 25 minutes west 78 feet from the intersection of the center line of Flora street with the center line of Fifth avenue, two intersecting streets in the town of Valona adjoining appellants' land, and carries it by courses and distances across the entire tract. In addition thereto, as pointed out by respondent, the pole line itself is an established monument upon the ground which locates itself (Hamaker v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 59 Cal. App. 642, 211 P. 266); and the easement is 15 feet in width lying equally on each side thereof—which is equally definite; and its use is restricted to this territorial limit. It would be difficult indeed to imagine how the territorial description could be more certain and definite.

[9, 10] Equally untenable is the objection that the judgment is indefinite for failing to designate the character of the materials to be employed in the use and enjoyment of the easement or the extent of the servitude. It is true that rights acquired by prescription are stricti juris and cannot extend beyond the user; and the extent of an easement so acquired is fixed and determined by the user under which it is gained (North Fork Water Co. v. Edwards, 121 Cal. 662, 54 P. 69); but so long as the use of the easement is confined to the purposes under which it was acquired and created without increasing the burden upon the servient estate, it inflicts no injury upon the owner thereof, and within these limits the owner of the easement may make improvements or changes that do not impair or affect its substance. Burris v. People's Ditch Co., 104 Cal. 252, 37 P. 922; 9 R. C. L. 784; 19 C. J. 983. This is not only a right, but in many cases it becomes a positive duty, and public service corporations should be encouraged rather than embarrassed in the betterment of their property in order that they may carry out the purposes for which they were created. Every easement includes what are termed "secondary easements"; that is, the right to do such things as are necessary for the full enjoyment of the easement itself (North Fork Water Co. v. Edwards, 121 Cal. 662, 54 P. 69); and repairs and replacements which cause no greater burden are permitted to be made (City of Gilroy v. Kell [Cal. App.] 228 P. 400). The question really resolves itself into what may be considered a reasonable use of the right as acquired. Manifestly it would be impossible in a judgment to describe and limit the exact kind and character of the materials that might be used by the company when it is called upon to repair or reconstruct its lines. Any question which might arise by reason of such repairs or reconstruction as to whether such change was justified under the use, or whether it created an additional servitude beyond that originally imposed, is to be determined in an appropriate proceeding. This question, however, is not now before us.

[11] And, finally, it is urged that the court had no jurisdiction to set aside any definite right of way underneath the poles. The character and extent of the way claimed by prescription are fixed, and they were determined by the user under which the right was gained. There is ample evidence in the record to show that the easement acquired extended through the area delimited and set apart and to which plaintiff is confined in the use of the easement.

From what we have said it follows that the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

SMITH v. SHARP. (Civ. 2678.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 22, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 19, 1925.)

1. Pleading $\S$ 127(1)—In determining whether conveyance was as security, court could consider verified answer and defendant's testimony as to prior transactions.

In suit to have land adjudged held as security, and for accounting in connection with testimony as to whether quitclaim deed was given as security, court had right to consider verified answer of defendant and his testimony, conflicting therewith, as to why he took over mortgage and paid outstanding liens, following execution as security of prior bargain and sale deed.

2. Mortgages $\S$ 608 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Evidence held to support finding that grantor was advanced in years and illiterate.

In suit by grantor to have land adjudged held as security, and for accounting, evidence held sufficient to support finding in substance that plaintiff was advanced in years and illiterate.

3. Mortgages $\S$ 608 $\frac{1}{2}$ — Testimony held to warrant conclusion that grantee, in paying off liens, acted as trustee for grantor.

In suit to have it adjudged that land was held in trust, and as security and for accounting, testimony held sufficient to warrant conclusion that defendant, in paying off prior liens, acted in behalf of plaintiff, so as to be deemed a trustee under Civ. Code, $\S$ 2219.

4. Trusts $\S$ 102(1)—Grantee agreeing to reconvey to grantor and to attend to renting of his land, etc., held to be trustee.

Grantee of land as security, who agreed to reconvey to grantor and to attend to renting of land, etc., held to stand in such a relation of confidence to grantor that his attempt to acquire title by quitclaim deed made him an involuntary trustee for grantor, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2224, 2924.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1052(7)—Error, if any, in admitting evidence of value of mortgaged land held not to warrant reversal.

In suit by grantor to have land adjudged held in trust and as security and for accounting, where testimony sustained finding that deed was mortgage, error, if any, in admission of testimony as to value of land would not warrant reversal of judgment for plaintiff.

6. Mortgages ⇐38(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that quitclaim deed was mortgage in effect.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that quitclaim deed was mortgage in effect.

7. Trial ⇐400(1)—Refusal to allow items on accounting by mortgagee as settled by previous findings held error.

In suit to have land adjudged held in trust and as security and for accounting, refusal on accounting to permit defendant to prove payment of taxes and interest, on ground that such matters were settled by findings filed when accounting was ordered, held error, where no judgment had been entered.

8. Trial ⇐400(1)—Court may of own motion change findings any time before judgment.

Court may of own motion, without ordering new trial, change findings any time before judgment.

9. Appeal and error ⇐1140(1)—Error in refusal to allow items in accounting by mortgagee held not to call for reversal, except as to amount found due.

In suit to establish trust in land and for accounting, error in refusal of court to permit mortgagee on accounting to prove payment of taxes and interest does not call for reversal of judgment for plaintiff, except as to amount of money found due.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Suit by Ed. T. Smith, as administrator of the estate of James Gillespie, deceased, against Sidney J. W. Sharp. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed, as modified.

H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, R. Justin Miller, of Minneapolis, Minn., and Sidney J. W. Sharp, of Hanford, for appellants.

J. F. Pryor and H. P. Brown, both of Hanford, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for the purpose of having it adjudged that the estate and interest of the defendant in and to a certain section of land containing about 635 acres, situate in the county of Kings, state of California, was held by the defendant in trust for the plaintiff, and as security for the repayment of moneys owing by the plaintiff to the defendant, if any, and for an accounting of the rents, issues, and profits arising from said real property. The plaintiff acquired title to the lands in controversy from the state of California during the year 1911, and asserts that his ownership thereof continued down to and including the entire period involved in this action.

The defendant asserts in his answer that he is the owner in fee of said lands, claiming to have acquired title thereto by a constable's deed, made by a constable on September 14, 1916, under a sale of the land theretofore had under execution. The defendant also further claims to have acquired title to the lands involved by reason of a certain quitclaim deed made and delivered to him by the plaintiff on or about the 24th day of October, 1916. On the part of the plaintiff it is contended that whatever title was acquired to the lands and premises by the defendant, under and by virtue of the constable's deed, was acquired by him for the benefit of the plaintiff, and merely as security for the repayment of moneys advanced by the defendant for the uses and purposes of the plaintiff, and as security for the payment of a certain mortgage note made by plaintiff to defendant and the defendant's brother.

The court found in favor of the plaintiff, and directed that an accounting be had of the rents, issues, and profits arising from said real estate, and upon the conclusion of the accounting adjudged that the rents, issues, and profits received by the defendant exceeded the amount of the indebtedness of the plaintiff to the defendant in the sum of $204.89, and directed that the plaintiff have judgment for said amount, and also that the plaintiff was entitled to a reconveyance of the 635 acres.

A review of all the authorities and points discussed by the respective parties in their briefs would extend this opinion beyond all reasonable limits, and will therefore not be undertaken. Two points are set forth prominently, to wit, the existence of a confidential relation between the parties and the effect of the quitclaim deed, dated October 24, 1916, as an absolute conveyance, or, as found by the court, merely a mortgage. If a mortgage, the existence of the confidential relation, whether correctly or incorrectly determined by the court, becomes of no vital importance, we shall therefore treat it only as an incidental matter.

An understanding of the questions involved necessitates a rather full statement of the facts. In this particular the transcript shows the following:

The plaintiff began working for the defendant's father in 1908, and continued in such employment until some time during the year 1910, making his home in a store building owned by the defendant's father. In 1910, the plaintiff went to live at the home of the defendant and the defendant's parents, under an agreement by which the plaintiff agreed to pay the defendant's mother the sum of $20 per month for board and lodging. This relationship continued until about February, 1916. In March, 1914, it appears that the plaintiff had become indebted to the defendant's mother in a considerable sum for such board and lodging, and that on or about the 4th day of March, 1914, the plaintiff made and delivered to the defendant and his brother, Craigie S. Sharp, at the request of the defendant's mother, a certain promissory note for $1,500, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, payable on or before March 4, 1916, and at the same time to secure the payment of said note, the plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant and his brother a mortgage on the 635 acres hereinbefore mentioned, and also upon a certain 16-acre tract, referred to and known as the "16-acre tract," then owned by the plaintiff. As to the 16-acre tract, the mortgage just referred to created a second lien, said tract at that time being subject to a first mortgage given to one H. V. Brenton to secure the payment of the sum of $1,200 and interest, and as to the 635-acre tract, known as and called the "lake land," the mortgage given to the defendant and his brother by the plaintiff was subject to a mortgage theretofore given to one John A. Wilson to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $1,835. In July, 1914, the plaintiff conveyed the 16-acre tract to the defendant and his brother, Craigie S. Sharp, and the defendant and his brother gave back to the plaintiff an instrument of defeasance. This instrument purported to grant to the plaintiff the right to repurchase or redeem said 16-acre tract within 18 months from the date of the agreement by payment of $3,068.85, together with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. This sum was made up of the amount due H. V. Brenton, theretofore the owner of the prior lien upon said 16-acre tract and the $1,500 note and mortgage given by the plaintiff to the defendant and his brother, as hereinbefore stated.

It appears that Brenton, the holder of the first mortgage on the 16-acre tract, had made a proposition to the plaintiff to enter into a similar transaction, giving the plaintiff 18 months to redeem or repurchase said tract, and that, after a conference had been had between the defendant and the plaintiff, the defendant agreed to take up the Brenton note and mortgage, and enter into the agreement as herein stated. After the execution of the instruments relating to the 16-acre tract had been had, the buildings on said tract burned, and the defendant received as insurance thereon the sum of $250. The plaintiff was not given credit upon his indebtedness for said sum. The plaintiff did not succeed in paying the $3,068.85 necessary to effect redemption of the 16-acre tract, and thereafter sale was made of said tract by the defendant for the sum of about $2,600, and thereafter, other than as showing the transactions between the parties and their relationship, the 16-acre tract drops out of this case. In August, 1915, the "lake land" was sold by the O'Bryan reclamation district to one John A. Wilson, the holder of the first mortgage thereon, for the sum of $446.92, on account of an unpaid reclamation district assessment. The right to redeem from this sale would have expired on August 21, 1916. On or about the 9th day of September, 1915, the same land was sold by a constable to one Charles G. Lamberson, for the sum of $516.51, to satisfy a judgment theretofore rendered against the plaintiff. The certificate of sale was assigned by Lamberson to Wilson. The right to redeem from this sale would have expired on September 9, 1916. The "lake land" was also still subject to the Wilson mortgage, and the mortgage given to the defendant and his brother by the plaintiff. On June 8, 1916, in an action brought by the First National Bank of Hanford against the plaintiff, an attachment was levied on the "lake property" for an indebtedness in the sum of $560. On June 21, 1916, the plaintiff executed a mortgage on the "lake lands" to one George H. McKissick, to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $237, and interest thereon.

On the 19th day of August, 1916, the plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant a quitclaim deed for the 16-acre tract hereinbefore referred to, and, at the same time, the plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant a grant, bargain, and sale deed to the "lake land." This deed bears date of August 12, 1916, but was acknowledged on the 19th day of August. It is admitted by the defendant that this last-mentioned deed, to wit, the grant, bargain and sale deed covering the 635 acres involved in this action was taken merely as security for the advances about to be made by him. The defendant's testimony in this particular appears as follows:

"I also explained that the bargain and sale deed that he was giving me at that time was to protect me on my advances; we had arranged that I should take up the Johnny Wilson mortgage and the other liens that were existing at that time, and this deed was to protect me in taking those up and paying them off, and to protect me on my $1,500 mortgage; that was the substance as I remember it."

During the months of August and September the defendant, either by assignment to himself, or to his brother, Craigie S. Sharp, took over all the liens and mortgages to which we have referred, and the indebtedness then existing against said lands and premises amounting to the sum of about $6,500. The trial court found that the 635 acres of land at the time of the transactions herein referred to was not subject to any other liens or incumbrances, except state and county taxes for the year 1916.

After these transactions had been had the plaintiff, on the 24th day of October, 1916, executed and delivered to the defendant a quitclaim deed, which purported to quitclaim to the defendant the 635-acre tract. On the part of the plaintiff it is contended that this conveyance was made in pursuance of an oral agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant that it should be executed by the plaintiff and received by the defendant as security for the payment by the plaintiff to the defendant of such moneys as had theretofore been and were thereafter to be loaned to plaintiff by the defendant, or advanced by the defendant for the uses and purposes of the plaintiff, and that said conveyance was so understood by both plaintiff and defendant. On the part of the defendant it is alleged that this quitclaim deed was executed and delivered for the purpose of conveying from the plaintiff to the defendant all the right, title, and interest that the plaintiff might then have in and to said premises, and as an absolute and final conclusion, or, as the defendant testified, "a closing out of the whole transaction." The finding of the trial court as to the character of this instrument is, in substance, as follows: That on or about the 24th day of October, 1916, the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the defendant, executed said instrument, wherein it is recited that the plaintiff remises, releases, and forever quitclaims said real property unto said defendant; that said instrument was executed by plaintiff and was received by the defendant under and pursuant to said oral agreement between plaintiff and defendant, and not otherwise, and was executed by plaintiff and received by defendant as security for the repayment by plaintiff to defendant of such moneys as had then been and would thereafter be loaned to plaintiff by defendant and advanced by defendant for plaintiff, together with interest thereon under and pursuant to said oral agreement between plaintiff and defendant; * * * that said instrument was not intended by plaintiff and defendant or by either of them to be an absolute conveyance of said real property or of any part thereof or of plaintiff's estate in said property or in any part thereof; * * * that at the time of the conveyance in question no money or property was paid or transferred to plaintiff in consideration for the execution by plaintiff of said instrument; and that the only consideration for the execution of said instrument by plaintiff was the aforesaid oral agreement on the part of defendant to hold, manage, and preserve said real property and plaintiff's estate therein for plaintiff and the advancement by defendant of the aforesaid moneys then advanced and thereafter to be advanced by defendant * * * as security for repayment by the plaintiff to the defendant of the sums herein referred to.

It was also found by the court that during all of the periods herein referred to there existed between the plaintiff and the defendant a relation of faith and confidence, which the plaintiff placed in defendant, and by reason of the reliance of the plaintiff upon the defendant in his management and protection of the property herein referred to, he (plaintiff) did not read the quitclaim deed signed and executed by him, dated as aforesaid, October 24, 1916, but believed at the time that he was executing a trust deed. The finding of the court is also to the effect that the value of the property at the time of the execution of the quitclaim deed last herein mentioned was in excess of the indebtedness in the sum of about $4,000.

The finding of the court that the quitclaim deed bearing date of October 24, 1916, was, in legal effect, a mortgage is assailed by the appellant as not supported by the evidence. That the plaintiff, during the month of August, 1916, was making efforts to secure funds to protect his interest in the "lake lands" is clearly evident from the record. The testimony there set forth shows that the plaintiff went to see the defendant about paying the amount of the reclamation assessment; that during this conversation the plaintiff said to the defendant that he had interviewed one Mr. Pryor in regard to securing the money; that Mr. Pryor had made some offer to take up the land, pay the indebtedness, give the plaintiff a certain portion thereof, and that at the conclusion of such conversation, the defendant stated that he would take up the matter. "He said he would take up the Wilson mortgage, the reclamation assessment and the Lamberson certificate." The defendant's own testimony, which we have hereinbefore set forth, is exactly the same in effect, to wit, that he took the grant, bargain, and sale deed to protect him in the advances necessary to be made to pay off the prior liens. In relation to the execution of the quitclaim deed, the defendant further testified:

"Mr. Gillespie made me a deed on October 24, 1916. It was executed in Ed Smith's office, I think. I think probably I prepared the deed. Mr. Gillespie came to my office downstairs. I don't know whether it was at my request or his own suggestion. I don't know whether I read it to him or not; I know I explained to him what it was; he knew what it was. My answer doesn't say; but I say he understood it. I don't know as a matter of fact whether I read the deed over to him or not. I told him about it at this time; he knew what it was; he knew what he was going to sign. * * * I told Mr. Gillespie at that time that we would close this whole transaction up, and that I would take from him this quitclaim deed which I had there and cancel all our obligations that existed between himself, my mother and my brother and myself, and clean out the whole account, or words to that effect."

The testimony of Ed. T. Smith, the notary, is, in substance, as follows:

"I didn't pay any particular attention to his physical condition. I knew he was James Gillespie, and I asked Mr. Gillespie if that was his signature, and I put my signature on it and handed it to Mr. Sharp."

The plaintiff's testimony concerning said transaction was:

"Q. Well, now, later on you made a quitclaim deed that is marked in evidence here? A. Yes."

"Q. To Sidney Sharp: Do you recall the circumstances under which that was executed? Do you recall how you came to sign that? A. Yes; I recollect that he asked me to come up there and sign it, and I went up and signed it."

"Q. Just what did he say to you? A. He asked me to sign this paper."

"Q. He handed you this paper, did he? A. Yes."

"Q. And did you read the paper at the time? A. No; I did not."

"Q. And did he explain to you what the paper was? A. No."

"Q. And did you understand you were—what did you understand you were signing when you signed that paper? A. I understood I was signing a trust deed."

"Q. A trust deed to Sidney Sharp, securing the money which had put up for you in relation to this land? A. Yes, sir."

[1] The transcript further shows that at the time of the execution of this quitclaim deed there was no cancellation of the indebtedness from the plaintiff to the defendant, that nothing was turned over by the defendant to the plaintiff evidencing any cancellation of the previous indebtedness, or anything done in relation thereto, further or other than as we have hereinbefore stated. In connection with this testimony, given by the plaintiff and defendant, and as bearing upon the weight to be given to the defendant's version of the transaction, the trial court had a right to take into consideration the verified answer of the defendant and his testimony as to why he took over the Wilson mortgage and paid off the outstanding liens. As we have shown, the defendant testified that he took the grant, bargain and sale deed, as stated by him in his own language—"to protect me on my advances. We had arranged that I was to take up the Johnnie Wilson mortgage and the other liens that were existing at that time, and this deed was to protect me in taking those up and paying them off to protect me on my $1,500 mortgage."

R. Justin Miller, a friend of the defendant, before whom the grant, bargain and sale deed was executed, testified that:

He informed Mr. Gillespie "what the instrument was that he was asked to sign; that Mr. Gillespie by signing this quitclaim deed was turning over to Mr. Sharp all of his right including his equity of redemption in the 16 acres; and that he was giving this bargain and sale deed by way of further security to Mr. Sharp to recover the amount of the $1,500 mortgage, and such other advances as were then necessary to be made in order to protect the mortgage, and Mr. Gillespie signed them in my presence and I took the acknowledgment." (The witness Miller appears to have been the attorney for the defendant.)

The witness Miller further testified:

"There was nothing said in that conversation about anything other than the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee as between Sidney Sharp and James Gillespie."

Mr. Miller also testified that he was acting as attorney for Sidney Sharp, "I was advising with him all the way along."

It thus appears that the prior mortgage and liens were agreed to be taken up by the defendant, and, to secure the repayment thereof, the plaintiff executed a grant, bargain, and sale deed. Under such circumstances, any act performed by the defendant in relation thereto would be for the uses and purposes of the plaintiff, under and by virtue of the agreement had between the parties preceding the execution of the grant, bargain, and sale deed. It further appears from the testimony that the plaintiff and the defendant in Miller's office had further conversation and agreement as to the amount to be paid and satisfactory to both of them to be paid for taking up some of the liens held by John A. Wilson; the defendant wanting one of the claims cut down, because he thought Wilson was asking too much for the same, "and it was too much to sting the old man." In contradistinction to this agreement, which is made clearly to appear, the defendant in his verified answer denies that he took an assignment of the Lamberson certificate of sale under any agreement between plaintiff and defendant, but in this behalf alleges "that he took said assignment for the purpose of protecting the interest of Craigie Sharp and himself, and for the purpose of acquiring the title to said property for himself and said Craigie S. Sharp," and that, by the conveyance executed by the constable:

"The defendant became the owner of said real property jointly with Craigie S. Sharp; that he procured said deed for the purpose of protecting his interest and the interest of said Craigie S. Sharp, and was not acting at any time, or at all for or on behalf of the plaintiff in the procurement of said deed."

While admitting by his testimony that he was going to take up said liens for the plaintiff and took the grant, bargain, and sale deed from the plaintiff to secure him in so doing, the defendant, in his verified answer, claims that he took up said liens in order to acquire the title thereto for himself and his brother. Mr. Wilson, from whom the assignments were taken, thus gives his version of the affair:

"When I made that assignment of the certificate of sale I was in Mr. Miller's office, the district attorney's office. Mr. Sharp asked me to come up, but I was delayed some time; I told him I would be up one day; I think it was within a day or two of the time it would expire; I think it would expire the next day, and I told him I would attend to it that day, and I was out of town and delayed in getting there, and some time in the evening, why, I was telephoned to come up. I couldn't say whether it was Mr. Sharp or Mr. Gillespie who telephoned to me, but I think it was Mr. Gillespie. I went to Sharp's office. Mr. Gillespie and Mr. Sharp were present. A conversation thereafter took place in my presence between Mr. Gillespie and Mr. Sharp. It was in regard to this certificate. Mr. Sharp wanted to know how much I wanted for the assignment, and it occurs to me I told him $500 or $525, and he said that was too much, and he asked Mr. Gillespie if he didn't think that was too much, and Mr. Gillespie said, 'Yes.' Then I asked, 'What's the matter with $400? How will that suit you?' And Mr. Sharp says to Mr. Gillespie, 'Is that all right?' and he said, 'Yes.' I says, 'All right. I'll make the assignment for the $400.'"

It was at this time that Mr. Wilson testified:

"That Sharp said he didn't think I ought to hold up the old man on account of me only paying $250 to Lamberson for it [the certificate]."

Mr. Wilson further testified:

"We had a conversation; it was in regard to making the assignment of the mortgage that I held against Mr. Gillespie. I don't believe Mr. Gillespie was there then; I won't be sure of that. Mr. Sharp made a statement at that time as to why he wanted the mortgage; he said he wanted to get things so that he could collect his interest and he would take care of Gillespie."

[2] The court, as we have stated, found that there was a confidential relation between the plaintiff and the defendant during all the times of these transactions, and also further found in substance that the plaintiff was advanced in years and was illiterate, not conversant with legal procedure or legal instruments. This finding is also assailed by the appellant, but evidence in the transcript shows that the plaintiff was advanced in years, and that he was illiterate, the following letters written by him abundantly demonstrate:

"Hanford March 27 1916 S. J W Sharp Dear Friend yours received and contents noted I have two parteys that is figren on the place one is estren party and the other one I ben on hand for a time his brother wants him to thak the place So you better post pond your trip for a week after the first of the month I will no Some thing defent before that time I want it to gow as Soon as pasable and get it off my mind it maik me feale blue I hope I will have Somthing that will chear us up in my next letter I dewing the best I can at present time yours truly James Gillespie," and

[3] The testimony which we have hereinabove set forth, we think, warranted the conclusion of the trial court that the defendant, in paying off the prior liens and mortgages, paying reclamation assessments, etc., was acting for and in behalf of the plaintiff, and was advancing money for his uses and purposes, and thus created the relationship of principal and agent, and brought matters directly within the terms of section 2219 of the Civil Code, which reads:

"Every one who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee, within the meaning of this chapter, not only as to the person who reposes such confidence, but also as to all persons of whose affairs he thus acquires information which was given to such person in the like confidence, or over whose affairs he, by such confidence, obtains any control."

[4] There is no question but that the defendant, so obtaining a deed, obtained control over the affairs of the plaintiff and of all the real estate theretofore belonging to him, and of all matters pertaining thereto. Having assumed that relation, every transaction thereafter by which the defendant attempted to acquire title in himself in and to the premises would necessarily be viewed with suspicion. There appears nothing in the transcript tending to show any change in the relations between the plaintiff and the defendant prior to the execution of the quitclaim deed. We think the rule set forth in 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 4th edition, section 956, applicable:

"* * * That where a relation of confidence is once established, either some positive act or some complete case of abandonment must be shown in order to determine it. The mere fact that the relation is not called into action is not, I think, sufficient of itself to determine it, for this may well have arisen from there having been no occasion to resort to it."

The plaintiff further testified that prior to the making of the deeds in question the defendant agreed to reconvey to him, and also to attend to the renting of the land, etc. And the finding of the court being that this is true, the defendant, by his attempt to acquire title, brings himself within the terms of section 2224 of the Civil Code, which reads:

"One who gains a thing by fraud, accident, mistake, undue influence, the violation of a trust, or other wrongful act is, unless he has some other and better right thereto, an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, for the benefit of the person who would otherwise have had it."

In this particular, we do not need to refer to authorities other than that as they appear appended to said section in Kerr's Cyc. Codes. Section 2924 of the Civil Code further provides that every transfer of property made as security, other than a trust, is deemed to be a mortgage.

[5, 6] It is further contended on the part of the appellant that the court erred in the admission of testimony relative to the value of the 635 acres. At the time the transactions hereinbefore referred to were had the land was submerged, and no crops had been raised thereon for a considerable period of time. Reclamation works were being carried on, and, as the testimony shows, during the years 1918, 1919, and 1920, crops aggregating a net return of more than $10,000 in value were obtained therefrom. We do not need to set forth anything in relation to the alleged error as to the admission of testimony concerning the value of the land, because we think, irrespective of value, the testimony sustains the finding of the court that the quitclaim deed, dated October 24, 1916, was, in legal effect, nothing but a mortgage, and, if the court erred in relation to the admission of testimony as to the value of the land at that time, it would not warrant a reversal of the judgment herein.

[7] Upon the conclusion of the first hearing in this case, the court prepared and filed findings, as we have hereinbefore stated, and ordered the entry of an interlocutory judgment, and also directed that an accounting be had of the rents, issues and profits of said lands and premises. Thereafter, and without the entry of any interlocutory judgment, the court proceeded to take an accounting, and filed supplemental findings. In so doing, the court found that the defendant had paid out items, including interest thereon, up to the 23d day of August, 1920, $10,532.30, and that the defendant had received as net rents, issues, and profits of the lands, including the sum of $10,737.19, being an excess of the sum of $204.89, and for a reconveyance of the said 635 acres of land.

offered and attempted to prove that on June 24, 1916, he paid taxes in the sum of $68.02 on account of assessments levied during the year 1915, together with interest amounting to the sum of $102.13, and also that on October 17, 1916, he paid taxes in the sum of $52.39, which, together with interest, amounted to the sum of $76.24, aggregating the total sum paid as taxes and interest thereon of $178.37. These items the court refused to allow on the ground that those matters were settled by the findings already filed. In this the court was in error. It appears to be settled law in this state that the court may change its findings at any time before judgment, without ordering a new trial, and this of its own motion. Spaulding v. Howard, 121 Cal. 194, 53 P. 563; Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 533, 23 P. 217; and Hayes v. Wetherbee, 60 Cal. 396.

The payment of taxes is a matter of absolute proof, and it does not appear that any objection was made upon any ground other than that such items had not been considered when inquiring into expenditures made by the defendant preceding the ordering of an accounting as to defendant's profits derived from the lands in controversy after the execution of the quitclaim deed. As no judgment had been entered the court was still in a position to make findings in accordance with the facts, and to correct its findings to conform with the facts.

[9] This error, however, does not necessitate a reversal of the judgment in this case other than as to the amount of money found due from the defendant to the plaintiff. It is therefore ordered that the judgment in this case be affirmed as to all matters contained therein, save and except the amount of $204.89, awarded to the plaintiff, and as to this portion of the judgment a new trial is granted, and the trial court directed to proceed and ascertain the amount of taxes paid by the defendant from which he has not been given credit, and deduct the same from the money judgment awarded the plaintiff, unless the plaintiff herein, or his representative in interest, within 30 days after the going down of the remittitur herein, consents to the reduction of said money judgment in the sum of $178.37, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the entry of the judgment heretofore entered in this case in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, and, in the event that satisfaction of the money judgment in said amount is entered within said 30 days, then, and in that case, the judgment in this cause, and the whole thereof, stands affirmed, the appellant to recover his costs on appeal.

ROYAL INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
(Civ. 5052.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 30, 1924.)

1. Master and servant ⇨405(4)—Cause of infection need not be demonstrated beyond doubt.

Exact cause of infection following injury need not be demonstrated beyond possibility of doubt, where there is sufficient medical testimony to sustain award.

2. Master and servant ⇨417(7)—Appellate court not concerned with conflicting testimony, where award is sustained by medical testimony.

Where record contains medical testimony sufficient to sustain award, appellate court is not concerned with conflicting testimony before Commission as to exact cause of infection resulting in employee's illness.

Proceeding for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by G. W. Rollins, employee, opposed by the Royal Indemnity Company, insurance carrier. Compensation awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the insurance carrier applies for certiorari. Award affirmed, as modified.

F. N. Foley and R. P. Wisecarver, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. [1, 2] This matter comes to us upon a writ of review. It is contended first that the evidence before the Industrial Accident Commission did not warrant a finding that G. W. Rollins sustained an injury by bumping his knee against a gate upon the ranch on which he was working, which injury caused a slight wound, followed by a severe infection. We shall not review the evidence here. It is true that the nature of the injury, the facts and circumstances surrounding the same, and the symptoms which followed made it impossible to demonstrate, beyond the possibility of a doubt, the exact cause of the infection which resulted in most severe and lengthy illness for applicant, Rollins. But such demonstration was not required. There is medical testimony in the record sufficient to sustain the award, and, that being true, we are not concerned with the conflicting testimony introduced before the Commission. Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 378, 170 P. 822; General Accident, etc., v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 653, 200 P. 419.

The only other point raised is that the Industrial Accident Commission erred in allowing compensation after August 1, 1924, as it appears from the evidence that upon that date the applicant returned to his work at his regular wages. The respondent does not contest this claim, and has attempted to correct the error by securing a stipulation from the applicant that the award should be modified so as to terminate the compensation allowed to applicant as of August 1, 1924. A modification of the order was made, accordingly, by the Industrial Accident Commission. This modification was made while an application for a writ of review was pending in this court, and petitioner is not satisfied as to its efficiency to effect its purpose, contending that the Industrial Accident Commission was without jurisdiction to make any effective modification of its judgment at that time. In order to place the matter beyond question and effectively carry out the expressed desire of all parties hereto and to do justice under the facts appearing in evidence, we modify the award of the Industrial Accident Commission entered herein on September 10, 1924, so as to terminate, on August 1, 1924, the disability compensation allowed to applicant, subject, however, to the continuing jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission to make any further allowance under the powers given it by the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act that conditions in the future may warrant.

With such modification, the award of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

McDEVITT v. CHAS. CORRIEA & BROS.
et al. (Civ. 2770.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 15, 1924. Rehearing Denied Jan. 14, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨931(7)—Presumption that findings, not specific as to contractual relation between parties, support judgment and theory thereof.

Where findings following language of complaint, under which proof of contractual relation contended for by either party was competent, are not specific as to which existed, presumption must be indulged that they support judgment and theory thereof.

2. Principal and agent ⇨145(4)—Principal and agent not jointly liable.

As principal and agent are not jointly liable on contract made by latter for former, judgment against several defendants, on theory of joint or joint and several liability on contract made by some, must be supported by substantial evidence of joint adventure or partnership for limited or special purpose.

3. Principal and agent —145(4)—Judgment against codefendants on theory of joint liability on contract held not warranted.

Where plaintiff's sole claim was that defendant acted as agent of codefendant in purchasing turkeys, and there was no substantial evidence of agreement to jointly buy turkeys and share in profits of resale, findings and judgment on theory of joint liability were not warranted.

4. Principal and agent —145(4)—One suing both principal and agent on latter's contract for former must elect which he desires to hold liable.

One suing principal and agent on contract made by latter on former's behalf is not entitled to judgment against both, but, having ascertained or discovered such relation between them, must elect, before close of trial, which he desires to hold liable.

5. Appeal and error —934(3)—Presumption that defendants' default, with essential consequences, was entered on plaintiff's application.

Where judgment, in action on contract, recites that defendants defaulted, and that default was duly entered, presumption under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1, is that such default, with essential consequences, was entered on plaintiff's application.

6. Principal and agent —145(4)—Prosecution of action to judgment against known agent is election to hold him liable.

One prosecuting action to judgment against one party, after learning that latter was acting only as codefendant's agent in transaction on which action is based, elects, as matter of law, to hold agent liable, and must stand on such election, whether or not judgment is or may be satisfied by him.

On Petition for Rehearing.

7. Appeal and error —1122(2)—Appellate court cannot make finding, though evidence supports only findings opposed to those made.

While case will be reversed, where vital findings are without sufficient support in evidence, or appellate court, where justified or required by very character of findings, may order trial court to enter different judgment thereon, reviewing court cannot make finding, even if evidence would support only findings diametrically opposed to those made.

8. Appeal and error —1177(7)—Appellate court reversing judgment as not supported by evidence cannot assume that evidence will be precisely same on retrial.

Appellate court cannot assume, on reversing judgment as not supported by evidence, that evidence on retrial will be precisely same, and hence must remand case for retrial.

9. Appeal and error —1177(7)—Case remanded on reversal of judgment as not sustained by evidence and findings, though evidence on retrial would be same.

Though evidence on retrial, after reversal of judgment against appellant and codefendants on theory of joint liability on contract as not supported by evidence and findings, was precisely same as at first trial, case must be remanded for retrial for clear and specific findings as to relationship between defendants and judgment exonerating appellant from liability, if plaintiff still maintained and court accepted theory that relation of principal and agents existed between appellant and codefendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Mrs. A. McDevitt against Chas. Corriea & Bros. and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Reversed as to appellant, with directions.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for defendant and appellant.

W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for other defendants.

Ray Manwell, of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants the aggregate sum of $1,101.33, alleged to be balances due her and four other parties who assigned their claims to her prior to the commencement of this action, from the sale of turkeys to the defendants. The complaint, which was filed on the 13th day of January, 1923, is unverified, and, in five different causes of action, each in the form of a common count, sets up plaintiff's own and the claims of her several assignors for goods, wares, and merchandise sold to the defendants.

The answers of defendants Chas. Corriea & Bros. and Charles Corey (erroneously sued as Charles Correy), each denied the allegations of each of the causes of action set up in the complaint. The defendants A. C. and Rose Biggerstaff failed to answer the complaint, and judgment against them was taken by default.

The case as to the answering defendants was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and the findings and the judgment were against them and the Biggerstaffs in favor of the plaintiff in the total sum of $1,068.71. The defendant Chas. Corriea & Bros. made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and the appeal is by said defendant from the judgment.

According to his answer and testimony, the defendant Chas. Corriea, at the time that the transactions herein involved took place, was a commission merchant, buying and selling farm produce in the city of San Francisco under the firm name of "Chas. Corriea & Bros.," said Chas. Corriea being the sole owner of said business and hence the sole member of said firm. (We shall hereinafter refer to said defendant as Corriea.)

It appears that, either in the month of July or August, 1922, the defendant A. C. Biggerstaff, a resident and farmer and turkey raiser in Yuba county, entered into some sort of understanding or arrangement with Corriea, whereby the former was to purchase and ship turkeys to the latter at San Francisco for the Thanksgiving and succeeding holiday trade in said city. Said Biggerstaff subsequently employed the defendant Charles Corey to assist him in the purchase of turkeys for the purpose stated. Corey was also a resident of and a farmer in Yuba county. A few weeks prior to Thanksgiving Day in 1922, said Biggerstaff and Corey purchased the turkeys of a number of the turkey raisers in Yuba county and shipped them to Corriea in San Francisco. Among those from whom turkeys were thus purchased were the plaintiff and her assignors. Corey, in a majority of the instances of the purchases so made, personally conducted the negotiations and completed the bargains leading to such purchases. The Biggerstuffs turned over their check book to Corey, the understanding being that Corey, on purchasing turkeys, should give the vendor a check signed by the Biggerstuffs on the First National Bank of Marysville, at Marysville, an arrangement having been made with the cashier of said bank by said A. C. Biggerstaff that said checks were to be held by the bank until the money called for thereby was deposited in the bank by Corriea, upon drafts drawn upon him by said Biggerstaff. The plaintiff and her assignors were each given such a check for the amount for which the turkeys bought from them totaled. We do not understand from the record that the plaintiff or her assignors, at the time of the sale of their turkeys, knew of the arrangement spoken of between A. C. Biggerstaff and the bank with regard to the payment of the checks. But, at all events, the plaintiff and her assignors presented their checks to the bank for payment, but they were dishonored because of there being no funds in the bank from which they could be paid. Some time thereafter—a week or ten days or perhaps a longer period—the plaintiff and her assignors received or were paid one-half of the amount for which the checks so issued to them respectively called.

It appears that the day immediately preceding Thanksgiving Day of 1922 there was a "slump" in the turkey market in San Francisco, with the result that the prices at which turkeys could be sold in said market were below those which Biggerstaff and Corey agreed to pay the plaintiff and her assignors for their turkeys. This situation provoked a controversy between A. C. Biggerstaff and Corriea which culminated in the commencement of the present action.

The defendants A. C. Biggerstaff and Corey claimed at the trial that in purchasing the turkeys they acted under authority conferred upon them by Corriea as the agents of the latter. Corriea likewise claimed that said Biggerstaff acted independently of him, and bought the turkeys upon his own responsibility, with an understanding between him and said Biggerstaff that the latter would ship such turkeys as he might purchase to him at San Francisco on consignment, and there to be by Corriea sold for said Biggerstaff. The foregoing embraces a general statement of the facts and the issue upon which the case was tried below.

The defendant and appellant make these points: (1) That the findings do not derive support from the evidence; (2) that, assuming that the theory of the decision is that A. C. Biggerstaff, as the agent of Corriea, purchased the turkeys, and that upon that theory the findings derive sufficient support from the evidence, the judgment, nevertheless, cannot stand, for the reason that it fixed a joint and several liability against all the defendants, whereas, in such case, or where an action is based upon a transaction initiated and consummated for a party through an agent, and both the principal and agent are made parties defendant thereto, the plaintiff, while having the right to make both parties defendants to the action, must, either during the progress of the trial or before the close thereof, in case the relation of principal and agent between the defendants as to such transaction is disclosed, make an election as to which of the two, the principal or the agent, he desires and intends to fix liability upon for the claim sued on.

The findings are substantially in the language of the allegations of the several counts of the complaint. The conclusion of law from the findings is as follows:

"As a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts the court finds that the plaintiff is entitled to joint and several judgment against defendants A. C. Biggerstaff, Chas. Corey, and Chas. Corriea & Bros., in the sum of $1,068.71, and said plaintiff is also entitled to judgment joint and severally against defendants A. C. Biggerstaff and Chas. Corriea & Bros. in the further sum of thirty-two dollars and sixty-two cents ($32.62), and for the costs of suit."

The judgment follows the conclusions of law.

[1-3] The evidence justified a decision only upon either one or the other of two opposing theories, to wit: (1) That the relation between Corriea and Biggerstaff and Corey was that of principal on the part of Corriea and agents on the part of the other two; or (2) that the agreement between Corriea and A. C. Biggerstaff was that the latter was to purchase the turkeys on his own account and ship the same to Corriea and by the latter marketed or sold for the former. These were the positions taken at the trial by said Biggerstaff and Corey, on the one hand, and by Corriea on the other, and they constituted the single issue submitted for decision. Under the allegations of the complaint, it was competent to prove whatever might have been the contractual relation existing between the defendants as to the transactions involved herein. The findings, following as they do the language of the complaint, are not specific, and, taken alone or without reference to the judgment, it would be impossible to determine from them what the decision of the court is as to the legal relation existing between the defendants in the business of purchasing the turkeys. In that condition of the findings, however, the presumption must be indulged that they support the judgment and the theory upon which it proceeds. The theory of the judgment upon its face is that the defendants, in the carrying out of the transactions upon which the action is founded, were both jointly and severally liable. Whether that theory was founded in the belief that a principal and his agent, as to any contract the latter has made within the scope of his authority as such for the former, is jointly or both jointly and severally liable thereon, cannot be ascertained from the findings. As will later be pointed out, a principal and his agent are not jointly liable upon any contract made by the agent for the principal. Therefore, to support the theory that the liability of the defendants here was joint or joint and several, there must have been substantial evidence introduced showing that the defendants were either joint adventurers or copartners for a limited or a special purpose. But, save and except a detached statement here and there of A. C. Biggerstaff and Corriea in giving their testimony—a statement which might be interpreted to bear different meanings, but from which a supposition might be strained that the agreement between A. C. Biggerstaff and Corriea was that they were jointly to buy the turkeys and share in the profits of the enterprise—there is absolutely no evidence to support the findings, interpreted here as they must be. In other words, there is no substantial, if any, evidence affording support to the theory upon which the findings and the judgment seem to proceed, to wit: That the defendants were or are jointly liable to the plaintiff and her assignors for the turkeys purchased by Biggerstaff and Corey from them and shipped to Corriea.

The sole theory upon which the plaintiff's case was tried below was that, in purchasing the turkeys, A. C. Biggerstaff and Corey acted for and represented Corriea as his agents. There was not at the trial, nor is there here, any pretense by the plaintiff that Biggerstaff and Corey purchased the turkeys in any other capacity than as agents of and for Corriea. The evidence presented by the plaintiff was addressed solely to the proof of the proposition, contended for by her attorney at the trial and here, that Corriea had employed A. C. Biggerstaff as his agent to buy turkeys for him, and that Biggerstaff employed Corey as a subagent to assist him in the business and that Corriea ratified said Biggerstaff's act in so employing Corey for that purpose. The testimony relied upon by the plaintiff to establish, as between Corriea on the one side and said Biggerstaff and Corey on the other, the relation of principal and agent in conducting the transactions involved herein is that of said Biggerstaff. As briefly as it may be stated, that portion of his testimony directly bearing upon the question of his relationship, contractually, with Corriea in the purchase of the turkeys, is, in substance, as follows:

That during either the month of July or the month of August, 1922, A. C. Biggerstaff received from Corriea several letters in which the latter stated that he intended going to Yuba county and "fix me (the witness) up for buying turkeys for him for these holidays. Later on," proceeded Biggerstaff, "he came up and out to my ranch. I met him in town and he went out to my ranch with me and looked over the turkeys. * * * We talked the matter over. He told me he would give me an opportunity to buy turkeys—a chance to make four or five or six hundred dollars, and he says, 'You are not limited if it is $10,000.' * * * We then came back to town (meaning the city of Marysville) to see Mr. Smith (cashier of the First National Bank of Marysville). We went down to his (Smith's) house Saturday afternoon, parked the car in front of his house, but he was out. * * * He told me he would give me a percentage for doing his buying that way. * * * There was nothing said about profits at that time. He says, 'I will treat you right in all deals.' * * * Afterwards I called him up on the phone and asked him about buying turkeys, what I could pay for them, a number of times. Chas. Corriea (appellant) fixed the price which I should pay for turkeys."

The witness proceeded to explain that the arrangement was that, upon the purchase of turkeys, the check of his wife on the First National Bank of Marysville would be given the vendors for the amount when the turkeys were received by Corriea in San Francisco, he (said Biggerstaff) to draw on Corriea through said bank for the amount of the check issued by him or his wife or Corey, and that the money received on the draft was to be deposited in the bank, to be used in honoring such checks as he or Corey had given to the vendors. Said Biggerstaff further testified that he employed the defendant Corey as a "subagent" to assist him in buying turkeys for Corriea, agreeing to divide with Corey any money he (witness) received as compensation for his services as agent. "A day or two before Thanksgiving," continued Biggerstaff, "I told Corriea over the telephone that we (witness and Corey) were buying turkeys." Corriea inquired, "Who is Corey buying for?" Witness answered, "Helping me buy for Chas. Corriea." Corriea replied, "That is all right; fine and dandy." The witness then asked Corriea,

"What is the price?" to which Corriea replied, "48 cents, looking towards 53 and 55 cents, but don't pay over 45 cents."

On cross-examination, said Biggerstaff was asked if he had "rendered a bill" to Corriea for his services in buying the turkeys and he responded that, on account of the slump in the turkey market, he sent no bill to Corriea for his services, in buying the turkeys; that, after the "slump," he said to Corriea that, "we will waive all rights to what we have got coming if you will settle up everything on account," but that Corriea made no reply to that proposition. Further referring to the fact that Corriea had paid him nothing for his services, Biggerstaff said: "I was waiting for the court to settle it. The court would undoubtedly give me what was coming to me for my labor." The witness further stated, on cross-examination, that Corriea authorized him in the summer of 1922—either in July or August—to buy turkeys for him (Corriea). The witness produced a letter from Corriea to him, dated August 16, 1922, in reply to a letter previously addressed to Corriea by witness. The letter from Corriea to witness stated, among other things, that he (Corriea) had been too busy "to get away," but that he would endeavor "to get in your territory some time next week and we will make arrangements to buy the other turkeys you have in view, and we will talk the whole proposition at that time." There was some other testimony tending to show that A. C. Biggerstaff was employed by Corriea to act as the latter's agent in the transactions. It is not necessary to give a statement of the testimony referred to herein.

The plaintiff and her assignors testified that they did not know for whom Biggerstaff and Corey were buying turkeys at the time that they sold their turkeys to them. The plaintiff, though, it should be stated, did say that she "understood" that A. C. Biggerstaff and Corey were buying turkeys for Corriea, but that part of her testimony was stricken out.

It is not necessary to refer herein to the testimony presented by the appellant. It will suffice to say that the testimony so presented tended to show that the agreement between A. C. Biggerstaff and Corriea was that the former was to ship turkeys to the latter on consignment, and that Corriea was to sell the same for Biggerstaff for the usual commission for such services.

It will be noted, from the testimony of A. C. Biggerstaff, as hereinabove given, that the sole claim of the plaintiff at the trial, as it is her sole contention on this appeal, was that in purchasing and shipping the turkeys to Corriea, said Biggerstaff acted as the agent of the latter. This being so, and there being no evidence which supports the theory upon which the decision and the judgment appear to proceed, to wit, that the relation between the defendants in the transactions involved herein was either that of a partnership or a joint adventure, the findings and the judgment have nothing to support them and cannot, consequently, be upheld.

[4] There are, however, certain considerations which, in view of a retrial of the issue as to the character of the relation between defendants, pertinently call for notice herein. If a retrial develops the same situation, evidentially, as is presented by this record, then the findings and judgment must be in accord with the one or the other of two different and antagonistic theories, to wit: (1) That A. C. Biggerstaff and Corey represented Corriea as agents in the buying of the turkeys; or (2) that the agreement was that Biggerstaff and Corey, having purchased the turkeys for themselves or on their own account, delivered them to Corriea on consignment, to be by him sold for the former. If the evidence, in the opinion of the trial court, sufficiently shows, to justify a finding to that effect, that in the carrying on of the transactions concerned here, the relation of principal, on the part of Corriea, and agents, on the part of A. C. Biggerstaff and Corey, existed, then the appellant is entitled to have judgment entered in his favor, since the plaintiff now has an unimpeached, and, indeed, an unimpeachable judgment against the agents.

This proposition follows from the well-settled rule that in an action on a contract against a principal and his agent, through whom the contract was made on behalf of the former, the plaintiff is not entitled to judgment against both, but must, before the close of the trial, and after the relation of principal and agent between the defendants in the making of the contract has been ascertained or discovered, elect as to which of the two defendants, the principal or the agent, he desires and intends to hold liable by a judgment. The rule and the reasons supporting it are exhaustively considered in 2 Mechem on Agency, § 1750 et seq., but no more clearly than by Mr. Presiding Justice Finlayson in Ewing v. Hayward, 50 Cal. App. 708, 717, 195 P. 970, in a concurring opinion in which Mr. Justice Weller concurred, thus making it the decision of the court. We here quote from said opinion in extenso because it contains a singularly lucid exposition of the rule and the reasons upon which it is grounded:

"The agent is liable because credit was originally extended to him in the belief that he was acting for himself. The undisclosed principal is liable on the theory that, having received the benefit of the contract made by his agent, he should assume its burdens. There is but one contract upon which the plaintiff in such an action can bring suit. The person with whom such plaintiff has directly contracted, the agent of the undisclosed principal, may be held liable on the contract as the real obligor, for he contracted in that capacity. Or, if the plaintiff in such an action so choose, he may treat the contract as the obligation of the undisclosed principal for whose benefit it was made, notwithstanding that, on the face of the contract, his agent appears to be the true obligor. There is, as we have said, but one contract in such cases. And though the plaintiff may elect to hold either one of two persons liable on that contract, either the agent or his undisclosed principal, he cannot make two contracts out of the one contract by seeking to hold each of those two persons liable severally as an independent obligor. Nor can he hold them both liable as joint obligors on one contract. He contracted with but one obligor, not two; and though he may elect to hold either one of the two liable as the obligor under the contract, he may not hold them both jointly liable, for to do so would be to give him two obligors where he contracted with, and for the liability of, but one. The result is that the liability of the agent and his undisclosed principal is an alternative rather than a joint or joint and several liability, and either may be so held, but not both. So we find that, according to the weight of authority, it becomes the duty of the creditor, after disclosure of the agency and the identity of the principal, to elect which of the two he will look to to carry out the agreement of the agent. Note to Murphy v. Hutchinson, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 786. It seems that if, as in the instant case, the alleged undisclosed principal denies the existence of the relation of principal and agent, the party seeking to recover on the contract may commence the action against both the alleged undisclosed principal and his agent, in order to ascertain the facts. But, though the plaintiff may bring the action against both, the rule, as I understand it, is that the plaintiff in such an action cannot have judgment against both the undisclosed principal and his agent, but, before the close of the case, must elect whether he will take a judgment against one or the other. See Sessions v. Block, 40 Mo. App. 569; Pittsburg Plate Glass Co. v. Roquemore (Tex. Civ. App.) 88 S. W. 449; Weil v. Raymond, 142 Mass. 206 (7 N. E. 860); Tuthill v. Wilson, 90 N. Y. 423; Mattlage v. Poole, 15 Hun. (N. Y.) 556."

Counsel for the plaintiff cites certain California cases which he claims hold that both principal and agent are liable to third parties dealing with the agent within the scope of his authority as such, and that an action may be maintained and prosecuted to judgment against both. In one of the cases cited by counsel certain language, taken by itself, might be construed as supporting that view. See Montgomery v. Dorn, 25 Cal. App. 666, 670, 145 P. 148. There is no dispute as to the proposition that, as the case just named states, both the principal and agent are liable under a contract executed by the latter for the former when acting within the scope of his authority as such agent; nor can it be disputed that a party may proceed against the principal and agent upon any contract so made. These propositions are clearly stated in Ewing v. Hayward, supra. But, as pointed out in that case, when, in the course of the trial, it appears that one of the defendants was the agent of the other in the making of the contract sued on, the plaintiff must, before the close of the case, elect whether he will take judgment against the principal or against the agent. But, as to the case of Montgomery v. Dorn, supra, it will be noted that, although the plaintiff did not exercise such election as between the principal and his agent, the defendants therein, the findings and the judgment acquitted the agent of liability on the contract sued on, but held the principal as solely liable. The agent, having been exonerated, suffered no prejudice, and therefore had no occasion to appeal and did not appeal. The principal was by the judgment merely required to perform the terms of his own contract. It was not, under the circumstances, for him to complain that an election had not been made as between him and his agent. The discussion of the question in that case was, therefore, academic.

In the present case, while it is true, as we have said, that the contractual relation between the defendants, whatever may have been the nature thereof, may be shown under the complaint, still, as stated, that pleading appears to proceed upon the theory of the joint or joint and several liability of the defendants, and it may be assumed therefrom and also from the testimony of A. C. Biggerstaff, that the plaintiff did not definitely know the true relation between the defendants in the buying of the turkeys until said Biggerstaff gave his testimony at the trial—at any rate, not until after the complaint had been filed. But whether this was true or not true, or, even if the plaintiff assumed from the beginning that the relation between defendants was that of principal and agents, and proceeded in the presentation of her case according to that theory, it was still her duty, before the close of the case, to have made an election as to which of the defendants, Corriea, as principal, or A. C. Biggerstaff and Corey, as agents, she intended to fix liability upon.

[5] But, assuming that, on another trial, the evidence is as it appears in this record, and that the court should find that A. C. Biggerstaff and Corey bought the turkeys for Corriea as the latter's agent, the situation is that there is in existence now an unimpeachable judgment against the agents. The action being on contract, and the judgment reciting that the Biggerstaffs defaulted, and that their default was duly and regularly entered, the presumption is that said default, with its essential consequences, was entered upon the application of the plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1).

[6] The action, as we have seen, was prosecuted to judgment against Corey. Thus the question arises: Were the act of applying for and securing a default judgment against Biggerstaff and the fact of prosecuting the action to judgment against Corey the equivalent of an election as a matter of law? Mr. Mechem, in his work on Agency, vol. 2 (2d Ed.) § 1759, says:

"Prosecuting the action to judgment against the agent, after discovery of the principal, has been held in several cases to constitute an election as a matter of law. As a mere matter of ordinary election, this is undoubtedly sound; as a matter of a possible merger it may also be sound; but if election be treated in the manner which has been suggested it cannot well be said that changing the form of the agent's obligation, or putting it into a condition in which it can be more readily enforced, is inconsistent with an intention to proceed against the principal also. Nothing short of satisfaction of the judgment against the agent would then release the principal as a matter of law, and some cases have so held."

Authorities supporting both views of the proposition, as indicated in the text, are cited in the footnotes. It seems to our minds, however, that the stronger position is that taken by the cases holding that when a plaintiff prosecutes his action to judgment as against a party, after he learns that such party was acting as an agent only of another in the transactions upon which the action is based, the course thus pursued by him constitutes an election as a matter of law, and that he must stand upon such election regardless of whether the judgment is or may be satisfied by the judgment debtor.

It may incidentally be suggested that perhaps the above rule would not apply where a judgment had been taken by default before the plaintiff knew that the relation between the defendants was that of principal and agent. In such case, the default judgment might be set aside upon motion and a showing that the relation of principal and agent was not known to the plaintiff until after the default was taken.

In returning the case to the court below, however, it is well to suggest that if the question referred to be retried, a specific finding should be made as to the relationship of the defendants in the transactions. Obviously, if it be found that A. C. Biggerstaff and Corey were the agents of Corriea in the purchase of the turkeys, then the latter, as we have stated, is entitled to a judgment, since plaintiff already has a judgment against the former. If the finding is that of a joint adventure or copartnership between the defendants in such purchase, then, of course, Corriea would be jointly liable and may be so adjudged.

It may with no impropriety be suggested that if it be found that the relation between the defendants was that of principal and agent, then upon the satisfaction of the judgment by the agents, there would thereupon accrue to the latter a right of action for indemnity or recoupment against Corriea. But be that as it may, for the reasons hereinabove given, the judgment must be reversed, in so far as the appellant is concerned, and accordingly it is so ordered, with directions to the trial court to be governed in another trial of the case by the views herein expressed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. The appellant petitions for a rehearing, claiming as he claimed in his briefs, that the record supports no other course by this court than that of ordering the court below to enter judgment in his favor. We thought our position on the proposition was made sufficiently clear in the former opinion. However, the case presents rather an unique situation and that there may be no misapprehension as to our views regarding the points discussed in the original opinion and renewed by the appellant in his petition, we will take the pains to restate them here.

As pointed out in the opinion originally filed herein, the complaint is in the form of a common count as to all the several causes of action therein set forth as for "goods, wares, and merchandise" sold and delivered to defendants. The averments of the complaint are therefore general in their nature, or not specific as to the contractual relation existing between the defendants in the transactions involving the purchase and sale of "goods," etc. As also likewise shown, the findings are substantially in the language of the complaint, and are not therefore specific as to the nature of the business relation between the defendants in the business of purchasing the turkeys. It is hence impossible to determine from the findings themselves the theory upon which the case was decided as to such relation. The conclusions of law and the judgment, however, fix the liability of the defendants as joint and several, from which the conclusion would seem fully justified that it was not the theory of the trial court that the contractual relation between the defendants in the transactions involved in the controversy was that of principal and agent.

[7] The theory of the decision, as indicated by the conclusions of law and the judgment, is that the relation was of that nature which made the defendants jointly and severally liable; and the only legal relation between two or more persons combined together to carry on a business or some particular transaction is either that of a partnership or a joint adventure. Hence, the only permissible conclusion from the conclusions of law and the judgment is that the court proceeded upon the hypothesis that the business of buying the turkeys was conducted by the defendants either as partners or joint adventurers, albeit the law in this state is that the liability of partners is joint, and not joint and several (Civ. Code, § 2442; Iwanga v. Hagopian, 39 Cal. App. 584, 179 P. 523; Berringer v. Krueger [Cal. App.] 232 P. 467), which, however, is a matter of no consequence to this discussion, since the judgment does not hold the defendants to the liability arising from the relation of principal and agent. The findings not being specific as to the nature of the relation between the defendants, or, in other words, being entirely silent on that subject, the presumption must be indulged that they support the judgment even though it is true, as stated in the former opinion, that there is no evidence in the record which would support a specific finding that the contractual relation between the defendants was such as to make their liability either joint, or joint and several. This being the situation, it is beyond the province of this court to order the court below to enter or cause to be entered judgment for and in favor of appellant. While it is true that a case will be reversed where it appears that findings vital to the judgment are devoid of sufficient support from the evidence, or that an appeal court may, where justified or required from the very character of the findings, order the trial court to enter judgment upon the findings different from the one entered, it is equally true that a reviewing court is wholly without legal authority to make a finding, even where it is clear that the evidence would support such findings only as would in legal effect be diametrically opposed to those made. Sprague v. Walton, 145 Cal. 228, 234, 78 P. 645.

The case of Ewing v. Hayward, 50 Cal. App. 708, 195 P. 970 (referred to in our original opinion) is no authority, as counsel seem to intimate in their petition, for the course which it is insisted should be pursued in the present case, to wit, reversing the judgment as to appellant and directing the court below to enter judgment for and in his favor. In that case the finding was that the defendants were jointly liable. The evidence clearly showed, according to the opinion therein, that the defendants, in the transaction which was the subject of the action, sustained the relation of principal and agent. The opinion of Mr. Justice Thomas reversed the judgment as to one of the defendants, while the opinion of Mr. Presiding Justice Finlayson, concurred in by Mr. Justice Weller, merely stated:

"The lower court, instead of requiring plaintiff to make an election at the close of the case to take judgment against the agent or * * * the * * * undisclosed principal, * * * entered judgment against both. This, I think, is ground for reversal."

Thus it will be seen that the order of Mr. Justice Thomas reversing the judgment was concurred in by his associates, but for reasons different from those for which the former conceived that the judgment should thus be nullified. The judgment of reversal contained no specific directions to the trial court as to the course it should follow. In other words, the trial court was not ordered to enter judgment for the defendant victorious on the appeal upon the findings as made. Indeed, the effect of the judgment in that case was merely to reverse the judgment below on the ground that there was no evidence which supported the finding that the defendants were jointly liable. The judgment of this court in this case amounts to the same thing, no more and no less, adding the suggestion, however, that on a retrial, if there be one, a specific finding as to the nature of the contractual relation between the defendants in the transactions concerned here be made.

Counsel, in their petition, also complain that, in considering and disposing of the case originally, we overlooked certain evidence which they claim unquestionably sustained the position of their client at the trial and here, that the understanding was that A. C. Biggerstaff was to purchase the turkeys on his own account, and thereupon ship them to Corriea to be by him sold for the former in consideration of the commissions usual in such transactions. We did not, in the original examination of the case, overlook the evidence referred to or any other evidence disclosed by the record. There were, however, unimpeachable reasons for not making specific reference to said evidence in the original opinion. Although a matter of no legal significance here, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, it is to be observed that the effect of the evidence referred to by counsel was merely to create a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the nature of the contractual relation existing between appellant and his codefendants in the prosecution of the transactions involved herein. But the omission to consider specifically said evidence in the former opinion was clearly justified upon the reason first hereinabove explained, to wit, that even if the evidence had shown without conflict that the understanding between A. C. Biggerstaff and Corriea was that the former should purchase the turkeys on his own responsibility and ship them to the latter on consignment, it would still be in excess of the power or province, legally, of this court to order judgment for the appellant on the finding, as presumptively made, that he was jointly and severally liable with his codefendants.

[8, 9] Counsel further state that the expense of a retrial should not be had, since it is manifest that the evidence introduced at another trial of the case must necessarily be precisely the same evidence introduced at the trial with which we are here concerned. We cannot assume that such will be the case. Conceding, though, that the evidence received on a retrial of the action will be precisely the same as that received at the first trial, yet that consideration does not and cannot alter the situation. If the theory of principal and agents in the carrying out of the transactions is still maintained by plaintiff on a retrial, and the evidence is the same and the trial court so accepts it, then there would be left open to the court below no other course than to enter judgment for the appellant, exonerating him from liability to the plaintiff, upon the proposition, as fully gone into in the former opinion, that the plaintiff, having already a judgment against the agents, cannot also have one against the principal. But, whatever may be the decision of the court below upon the question of the contractual relationship between the parties in the transactions here concerned, the findings should clearly and specifically set forth such relationship so that there can be no question from the decision as to the legal nature thereof. Of course, the parties to the action could enter into a stipulation to the effect that such findings may be founded upon the evidence as already received. This manifestly would save the expense of a retrial. This, however, is obviously a mere suggestion which the parties themselves may or may not adopt.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

SANTA CLARA VALLEY LAND CO.
(Civ. 5051.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 26, 1924.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨230(1)—Complaint in action for rent held not demurrable for failure to specifically allege defendant had leased premises involved.

Petition, in action for rent due under lease, which alleged that defendant "as lessee" entered into lease, held not demurrable for failure to specifically allege that defendant leased premises involved from plaintiff.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨230(1)—In action for rent due under lease, it is not necessary that complaint allege defendant ever had possession.

In action for rent due under lease, it is not necessary that complaint allege defendant ever had possession of premises.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨230(1)—Complaint in action for rent held not demurrable for failure to allege defendant's promise to pay.

Complaint, in action for rent due under lease, reserving a specified rent, held not demurrable for failure to allege defendant had promised to pay rent reserved; such promise being implied from lease containing no provision obligating third person to make such payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by the Peninsula Rapid Transit Company against the Santa Clara Valley Land Company. Judgment on demurrer for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco (R. S. Laughlin, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

W. A. Johnston and F. L. Johnston, both of San Jose, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it in an action for rent due under a lease. The judgment followed the entry of defendant's default. A general demurrer was interposed to the complaint and overruled. The defendant failed to answer and contends, upon appeal, that the demurrer was improperly overruled. The only point presented is as to the sufficiency of plaintiff's pleading.

The points urged in support of the demurrer are that the complaint contains no allegations that the defendant leased the premises from plaintiff; that the defendant was ever in possession of the premises or ever promised or agreed to pay the rent reserved in the lease.

The complaint alleges:

"That on or about the 31st day of March, 1923, plaintiff * * * as lessor, and defendant * * * as lessee, entered into an indenture of lease wherein and whereby the plaintiff demised and let to defendant a certain store room known as No. 3 in the Union Stage Depot located on the west side of Market street, between Santa Clara street and Post street, in the city of San Jose, county of Santa Clara, state of California, being the second most northerly store room on the ground floor in said Union Stage Depot and known as No. 25 South Market street in the city of San Jose, for the term of three years after date of completion of the building in which said room is situated, at and for the monthly rental of $200 per month, payable monthly in advance; that said building was completed and the time of commencement of said term of said lease was May 1, 1923; that no rent has been paid under said lease since January 1, 1924, and there is now due plaintiff from the defendant rent from January 1, 1924, to May 1, 1924, in the sum of $800, which is unpaid."

[1] Certainly this complaint is not a model of good pleading, but we do not think its deficiencies are such as to compel a reversal of this judgment. While there is no allegation, in so many words, that the defendant leased the store from plaintiff, there is an allegation that defendant, as lessee, entered into the lease. This is admitted by the demurrer, and defendant could not be the lessee under a lease unless it leased the store from plaintiff.

[2] It is not necessary for the complaint to contain an allegation that the defendant ever had possession of the premises. If the premises were leased to it, it had the right to possession and the actual possession is immaterial in an action like the one before us. 15 Cal. Jur. 838; O'Meara v. Hables, 163 Cal. 240, 124 P. 1003.

[3] The only remaining objection is that there is no allegation that the defendant promised to pay the rent reserved in the lease. If defendant was the lessee under a lease in which the rental reserved was a specified sum, a promise by it, as lessee, to pay said sum would be implied even if not expressed in the lease, where the lease contained no provision obligating a third person to make such payment. It was alleged that the premises were leased to defendant for a monthly rental of $200, which is equivalent to saying that they were leased in consideration of the payment of such rental. The lease was pleaded in its legal effect. The demurrer admitted the truth of the allegations, so we must assume there was no other material provision in the lease which would change the legal effect of the same as pleaded, and therefore that there was no third person who had assumed the payment of the rental. It follows that the obligation of the lessee named in the lease to pay the rent would be implied.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte BRAIN. (Cr. 1225.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 22, 1924.)

1. Criminal law ☞273—Plea of guilty by defendant's counsel held insufficient.

In view of Pen. Code, § 1018, specifically providing that a plea of guilty can be put in by defendant himself only in open court, a plea of guilty by defendant's attorney, there being no showing of defendant's express consent, was not a proper plea.

2. Criminal law ☞1186(4)—Court cannot determine whether substantial justice done to defendant whose counsel pleaded guilty for him, where record contains no evidence.

Where record contains no evidence as to guilt of defendant, appellate court cannot determine whether substantial justice has been meted out to defendant, whose counsel pleaded guilty for him, and hence Const. art. 6, § 4½ cannot be applied.

3. Criminal law ☞980(1)—Where no plea entered, no valid judgment can be rendered against defendant.

Where counsel pleaded guilty for defendant, it is the same as no plea, and hence no valid judgment against defendant could be entered.

Application by Eugene A. Brain for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Warden of San Quentin Prison, to secure release of petitioner on the ground that no plea was entered. Writ granted.

H. E. Manning, of Vallejo, for petitioner.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner contends that his confinement in the state prison at San Quentin, Cal., is illegal, because the judgment of conviction of the crime of burglary, by reason of which he is being restrained of his liberty, was based upon a plea of guilty, and that no such plea was ever entered by said petitioner.

From the transcript of the proceedings in the trial court, it clearly appears that the petitioner did not plead guilty, but that his attorney stated to the court:

"I believe the information has been read, if not, we will waive the reading of the information and enter a plea of guilty and make application for probation."

[1] We think this was not a proper plea in the face of the statute, which specifically provides that a plea of guilty can be put in by the defendant himself only in open court. Section 1018, Pen. Code. In the case of People v. McCrory, 41 Cal. 461, it was said:

"A plea confessing himself to be guilty of crime should not be entered except with the express consent of the defendant, given by him personally, in direct terms, in open court. Nothing should be left to implication, and his confession of guilt should be explicitly made by himself in person in the presence of the court."

[2] Respondent takes the position that the foregoing decision is inapplicable here because of the subsequent enactment of section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution, which section respondent contends covers the omission in the instant case. We do not agree with this position. The record before us contains no evidence whatsoever upon the question of the guilt of petitioner, and it is impossible, therefore, to say that substantial justice has been meted out to the defendant. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution could not be applied in the instant case even though we considered the error a procedural one, because of the absence of any record upon which we might judge of the guilt or innocence of the petitioner. In this respect, the instant case differs from the cases of People v. McCalla, 63 Cal. App. 783, 220 P. 436, and People v. Tomskey, 20 Cal. App. 679, 130 P. 184, wherein the defendant were tried upon the theory that pleas of "not guilty" had been entered, when in reality no pleas had been entered. In those cases, naturally, the evidence was fully gone into, and was before the court upon appeal, so that section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution was able to function. But here there is no plea and no evidence upon which to base a judgment of conviction.

[3] There being no plea, no valid judgment against the defendant could be entered. People v. Corbett, 28 Cal. 331; People v. Gaines, 52 Cal. 479; People v. Monaghan, 102 Cal. 229, 36 P. 511. In the case last cited it was said:

"That the defendant has been afforded an opportunity to plead is one of the facts in the process of the conviction of a criminal which our law, in its regard for life and liberty, requires to be expressly shown. * * *"

The petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Ventura county for further proceedings.

McADOO v. MOORE. (Civ. 4990.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 29, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 26, 1925.)

1. Brokers ⇨54—Broker's commission generally earned when producing purchaser according to terms of contract.

Generally a broker earns his commission when he produces a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase according to terms on which he was employed to sell.

2. Brokers ⇨57(1)—Broker negotiating conditional contract of sale must show that condition converting conditional sale into actual sale has occurred.

Where broker is employed to negotiate a sale and he negotiates a contract of conditional sale, he must show that condition has occurred which converts conditional sale into an actual sale before he is entitled to recover his commission.

3. Brokers ⇨57(1)—Broker held not entitled to commission on sale subject to buyer's approval where not given.

Broker, who was employed to negotiate a sale of goods, and who negotiated a contract by which goods were sold subject to buyer's approval of a sample to arrive weeks later, and which on arrival was found not to be satisfactory, and was not approved, was not entitled to his commission.

4. Brokers ⇨85(1)—Exclusion of evidence that sale had not been completed held error.

Where broker, who was employed to negotiate sale between defendant and buyer, made sale "subject to approval of sample," exclusion of defendant's evidence in action for commissions that samples were unsatisfactory to purchaser, who thereon refused to purchase goods, was error.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by A. McAdoo against Harold Moore, doing business under the name of the Fenton Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. Plaintiff, as assignee of Lillenthal-Williams Company, brokers, brought this action to recover from the defendant certain commissions claimed to be due said brokers for services rendered by them in negotiating contracts of sale of merchandise, in which the defendant was the seller. The complaint contained two causes of action, but the plaintiff dismissed the first cause of action, and recovered judgment upon the second count.

There is no dispute about the facts, many of them being covered by stipulation of the parties. It was stipulated that Lillenthal-Williams Company was employed as broker to negotiate a sale between the defendant and L. H. Butcher Company. The brokers' memorandum of the transaction was introduced in evidence. It called for "35 long tons Australian Buttermilk Lactic Casein." The pertinent portion of the memorandum upon appeal is the statement that the sale was made: "Subject to approval sample shipped." The agreement between the buyer and seller (Butcher Company and the defendant) covering this transaction was dated April 2, 1923, and contained this statement: "Special conditions. Subject to approval of sample now in transit. Shipment guaranteed to be equal to said sample. Inspection allowed."

The plaintiff proved the execution of this contract for a conditional sale; that the merchandise called for was never delivered, and that the Butcher Company was ready, willing, and able to furnish a letter of credit as called for by the contract of sale, and the manager of this company stated that the company did not refuse to carry out its part of the contract, but he also stated that he did not know whether or not a sample of the merchandise was ever submitted to the company. The defendant offered testimony to the effect that samples of the merchandise were submitted by the defendant to the Butcher Company. Further testimony along this line was objected to and the objections sustained. The defendant then offered to prove that the samples to be submitted to the purchaser under the conditional contract arrived by boat about April 24, 1923, 20 days after the agreement was entered into; that the samples were submitted to the representative of Butcher Company, who had been dealing with the defendant, and were refused by him as being unsatisfactory, and he thereupon refused to purchase the goods.

The trial court refused to admit evidence upon these matters, taking the position that, as the broker had negotiated a contract between the parties, the commission was earned regardless of whether or not the contract was ever performed. It is this ruling which is assigned as error, and which is vital to the rights of the parties hereto.

[1-3] We think the appellant's position is well taken. While it is true, generally speaking, that a broker earns his commission when he produces a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase according to the terms upon which he was employed to sell, a different legal situation arises where a broker is employed to negotiate a sale, as in the instant case, and negotiates a contract of conditional sale. He then is bound to show that the condition has occurred which converts the conditional sale into an actual sale—a binding contract between the parties. The contract before us is, in effect, as characterized by appellant, nothing more than an offer. This is not a case where samples were presented to the purchaser which were acceptable to him, and the goods warranted to be equal to sample. In such a case, the purchaser would have no choice but to accept the goods if they conformed to the sample. But here we have a case where the goods were sold subject to approval of a sample to arrive weeks later. When the sample arrived it was not satisfactory and was not approved. The purchaser was not bound to take the goods, and there was no valid, enforceable contract of sale and purchase between the parties.

The case, in principle, is precisely like the recent case of Ball v. California Conserving Co., 189 Cal. 326, 207 P. 1011. That was an action to recover broker's commission for negotiating a sale of "tomato paste," the contract of sale containing the following provisions: "Subject this year's delivery meeting buyer's approval"; "2½ per cent. brokerage to Ball-Lockhart." The Supreme Court said:

"Appellant herein contends that as to the Russo & Co. sale the goods offered by the seller did not meet with the buyer's approval, and hence that the condition in the contract of sale in that respect not having been fulfilled, and the contract for that reason having been canceled, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any commissions upon such sale.

"We see no answer to this contention.

"The memorandum of sale upon which the plaintiff relies for a recovery contains the express provision that the goods must meet the buyer's approval. This provision renders it an executory contract of sale upon a condition subsequent, without the fulfillment of which there could have been no completed sale under said contract. The right of the broker to recover commissions must be held to have depended upon a completed sale; and this not having been consummated it follows that the right of the plaintiff to recover his commissions under the contract with Russo & Co. must fail."

Likewise, in the instant case, there was no completed sale until the sample to be submitted to the purchaser was approved and accepted. The employment of the broker being, according to plaintiff's stipulation, to negotiate a sale, the commission was not earned by negotiating a conditional sale, the condition of which was never fulfilled.

[4] It appearing that the rejected evidence was vital to the defendant's case and determinative of its rights, its exclusion compels a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

MOORE SHIPBUILDING CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.
(Civ. 5060.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 2, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 2, 1925.)

1. Master and servant ⇨416—Award apportioning compensation for disease held unauthorized for want of finding.

Finding that award for lead poisoning should be apportioned between insurance carrier for former employer and carriers for latter employer, in proportion to time employed under exposure to lead by each, held improper, where finding was that disease was contracted during latter employment, and where there was no finding that any stage of disease existed during prior employment.

2. Master and servant ⇨412 — Commission may apportion compensation only on finding disease was aggravated during each employment.

In view of requirement of Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 20, that Commission make findings upon all facts involved, Commission has jurisdiction to apportion compensation for occupational disease among several employers only upon finding that disease constituting the injury, as defined in section 3, subd. 4, as amended by St. 1919, p. 911, existed and was aggravated during each employment.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Charles Simmons, opposed by the Moore Shipbuilding Company, employer, and the Aetna Life Insurance Company, insurance carrier. From an order of the Industrial Commission granting an award, employer and insurance carrier bring certiorari. Award annulled.

Hearing denied in Supreme Court. All concur; LAWLOR, J., confining his concurrence to the first point discussed in the opinion, the failure to make a finding.

E. L. Stockwell and James M. Wallace, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. [1] This is an original proceeding in certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Charles Simmons. The facts of the case are that for about two months immediately prior to March 6 or 7, 1924, the applicant was employed as a burner of armor plate by the petitioner Moore Shipbuilding Company. From March 7 to March 10, 1924, he was not employed, and on the latter date he entered the employ of the General Metal Supply Company for which he worked as a burner until he was disabled by lead poisoning on March 21, 1924. The petitioner Aetna Life Insurance Company was the compensation carrier for its copetitioner during the entire period of the applicant's employment by that company, and two other insurance companies were successively carriers for the General Metal Supply Company during his employment by that concern. A hearing was had before the respondent Commission, on the application of the employee for compensation, and as a result of that hearing the respondent found that, while employed as a burner by the General Metal Supply Company, the applicant "contracted lead poisoning due to exposure of fumes containing lead in the course of his work." The further finding was made that the liability for the compensation awarded to the applicant should be apportioned in accordance with the time worked by the employee "under exposure to lead," and that, the employee having worked 46 days for the Moore Shipbuilding Company and 11 days for the General Metal Supply Company, it was determined that the petitioner, Aetna Life Insurance Company, as carrier of the Moore Shipbuilding Company, should be held liable for 46.57 per cent. of the total compensation awarded.

[2] The attack of the petitioner upon the award is that it is wholly unsupported by the findings on the part of the Commission.

The point is that the jurisdiction of the Commission to apportion compensation among several employers where an employee has contracted an occupational disease during the course of the several employments can be sustained only upon a finding that the disease which constituted the "injury" defined in subdivision 4 of section 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), as amended in Statutes 1919, page 911, existed at some stage of each prior employment. That is to say, that the power of the Commission to apportion the liability among several employers under the terms of the section cited is limited to a "case of aggravation of any disease existing prior to any such injury."

The petitioners set forth in their petition extracts of the evidence which was heard by the respondents covering the subject of the injury to the applicant, and the respondent concedes that this evidence is correctly stated. From the petition it appears that there was no evidence of any nature tending to show that the applicant had incurred or had shown any symptoms of the disease while employed by the petitioner Moore Shipbuilding Company, and the absence of such evidence was apparently in the minds of the members of the respondent Commission, when they failed to find on that fact. On the other hand, the findings are that the applicant sustained injury while employed by the General Metal Supply Company, and the apportionment of the award against the petitioner was based solely on the conjecture that, while employed by petitioner, the applicant might have contracted the disease to some extent. But the direct testimony of the applicant showed that he had no symptoms of the disease while in the employ of the petitioner.

The Commission is required to make findings upon all facts involved in the controversy (section 20, Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917), and a failure to find that an injury was sustained or that a disease was contracted during a particular employment will not support an award against the one who was the employer during that period. In this case the jurisdiction of the Commission to apportion the award rests upon a showing that the disease was contracted while in the employment of the Moore Shipbuilding Company. In this respect there is a failure in both proof and finding. It follows that the Commission exceeded its jurisdiction.

Award annulled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by A. Turgeon against F. E. Barney. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald & Johnson, of Gilroy, for appellant.

E. L. Nicholson, of San Jose, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for damages for the alleged failure on the part of the defendant to use due care in the repair of an automobile. He recovered judgment in the sum of $363, and from this judgment the defendant has appealed upon the judgment roll alone.

The points urged on the appeal are that the findings of fact are insufficient to justify the conclusions of law and judgment, and that the trial court omitted to find upon material issues. Paragraph 2 of the complaint alleged that the defendant undertook to use due care and skill in repairing the automobile. Paragraph 3 alleged that he did not use due care and skill, but, on the contrary, did his work in a careless and unworkmanlike manner and placed defective parts therein, to wit, worn gears which broke and were rendered useless within a period of two weeks thereafter. The remaining paragraphs of the complaint set out specific items of damage resulting from the alleged carelessness and the unworkmanlike manner in which the repairs were made. The answer denied all the allegations of the complaint, including the allegation that the defendant conducted a shop of any kind for the repair of automobiles at the time the alleged automobile was left with him for the purpose of repair, and that he then and there or at any other time undertook to use due care or skill or any care or skill in the repairing of said automobile.

The cause was tried before the court without a jury, and the trial court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint that the defendant did conduct a shop for the general repair of automobiles, and on the day alleged he received an automobile from plaintiff to be overhauled and repaired, and that at that time he undertook to repair said automobile and to use due care and skill on the same; that he did not use due care and skill and did his work in a careless manner so that plaintiff received no benefit for the work done by the defendant and was compelled to have the said work redone. The trial court further found that as a result of the negligent work done by the defendant, the plaintiff had been deprived of the use and benefit of said automobile and had sustained damage thereby. As a conclusion of law, it was then found that plaintiff was entitled to the sum of $363.

[1] If we understand appellant's point correctly, it seems to be that the findings are insufficient because there is no finding of fact on the money value of the damage suffered by the respondent, but that the finding on this issue is found in the conclusion of law.

"The mere fact that one finding was placed under the wrong heading would be a very feeble reason for the reversal of a judgment." Burton v. Burton, 79 Cal. 490, 495, 21 P. 847, 848.

[2] The other point raised by the appellant is that the trial court failed to find on the specific allegations relating to the placing of worn gears in the automobile, and that said gears broke or were rendered useless and upon the specific allegation of the money value of the alleged damage arising through the particular items which the respondent was required to pay out as the result of the appellant's alleged carelessness. The appellant has prosecuted this appeal upon the judgment roll alone. He has not, therefore, given us the benefit of any of the evidence which was before the trial court. We may therefore fairly assume that this evidence would be adverse to him upon the points urged because if it had been favorable he would have placed the facts before this court so that we would have been in a position to make an intelligent review of the issues involved. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, we must presume, therefore, that the trial court found in accordance with the evidence that was before it, and that if more complete findings had been made they would have been adverse to the contentions of the appellant.

[3, 4] When an appeal is prosecuted on the ground that the trial court has made some error, it is essential that the appellant point out to the appellate court that he was prejudiced to his injury by the claimed error. All that is said on this appeal is that the trial court failed to find this and that. It is not claimed that the judgment was excessive or unsupported by the finding of general damages. So far as appears from anything in the record before us, if findings were made upon the particular items stressed by the appellant, such findings would have been adverse to his contentions, and a failure to find thereon is not, therefore, a ground for reversal. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 217 P. 750, 754.

Where defendant contended that he found purse on street car, evidence in addition to proof of possession of stolen purse held sufficient to warrant conviction of larceny.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Charles W. Crotty was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Allendar, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. Appellant was convicted of grand larceny upon an information which charged that on or about the 14th day of May, 1924, in Los Angeles county, Cal., he did steal, take, and carry away from the person and immediate presence of one Carl Peterson a wallet containing $9 in money. The sole ground of this appeal is an alleged insufficiency of evidence to sustain the judgment.

It appears that on said date, at about 6 o'clock in the afternoon, Peterson visited a market on Main street, in Los Angeles, where he purchased about 60 cents' worth of meat, for which he paid with a $10 bill, and received change in silver which he placed in his pocket, and $9 in currency, which he inserted in a wallet; the wallet was then placed in his hip pocket, which he buttoned before leaving the market. Peterson then walked to Third street and over Third street to Spring street, where he boarded a north-bound "W" car for his home at Eagle Rock. He testified that the car was somewhat crowded, and that he was compelled to stand about half the way home, but that he finally obtained a seat which he occupied until he arrived at the end of the line, at Annandale boulevard and Oak Grove avenue, and then when he alighted he first learned that his wallet was gone. He did not remember having seen any one on the car whom he knew. He had never known the defendant, and did not know whether or not the latter was at any time on the same car. Peterson also testified that in the wallet with the bills were some postage stamps, a receipt from the Standard Woolen Mills to which was pinned a sample of cloth, and a post office registry receipt, all of which were produced upon trial, and identified by him as the property which he lost. On the following day an officer called at Peterson's place of business with the articles above mentioned, and informed him that he had found the man who had them; there was no showing that Peterson had notified the police department of his loss.

One O'Brien, a police officer, testified that he had known the defendant for some four or five years; that he was riding in an automobile with another officer, and noticed the defendant standing in a crowd at the southeast corner of Third and Main streets, whereupon the officer left the automobile and shadowed the defendant until the latter's arrest. He said that the defendant crossed Main street and walked in a southerly direction; the officer boarded a south-bound street car, and as it approached Fourth street the defendant got on and sat immediately back of the officer; at Fifth and Main streets both alighted, and the defendant walked westerly to Spring street, where he ran and boarded a north-bound street car; the officer followed him on the same car to First and Spring streets, where the defendant crowded through between the passengers and stepped down to the street, and crossed to the westerly side, where he took the first south-bound car. O'Brien boarded this latter car and followed the defendant through to the front open section, where he found the defendant seated with an open purse in his hands; he reached over the defendant's shoulder and took the purse from him, and as he did so the defendant had some papers and currency, which the latter threw over the rail to the street, in the middle of the block. O'Brien arrested him and took him off the car at the next corner, walked back with him, and picked up the papers, which proved to be the receipts heretofore mentioned, bearing Peterson's name. The officer testified that he did not know that the defendant had noticed him until he spoke to him on the car and arrested him.

Appellant claimed that he saw O'Brien at Third and Main streets and knew that the officer was following him from that time on until the arrest; Crotty denied that he was on Fifth street, but swore that he walked down Main street to Fourth, thence through to Spring street, boarded a north-bound car and rode to First and Spring streets, then walked to Second and Spring streets; that he had an appointment with one Joe Keating, but had forgotten at which corner he was to meet him, and that when he did not see him he boarded a south-bound car on Spring street, took a transfer, and was going home. He testified that he lived at 2037 East Seventy-Eighth street, with his mother and father; when asked upon cross-examination if he was not living at 3212 South Main street with a man named Kedion, he stated that it was not his residence, but that he went there frequently, and may have been registered at that address. He denied that he had ever seen Peterson before the preliminary examination, and claimed that as he took his seat on the car last mentioned he found the wallet in question lying on the floor near his seat, but that he had not opened it, and had not known what it contained until it was produced in the courtroom.

Crotty also testified that as he walked back after leaving the car with the officer he saw the latter stop, but did not know that he picked up anything, and he denied that he threw anything from the car except his transfer.

[1-4] The jury found the defendant guilty; hence they must be assumed to have believed the officer's testimony, and to have branded Crotty's story as untrue. In determining whether or not the evidence above recited is sufficient to sustain the verdict, the legal principles applicable are that the proof of possession of stolen goods is not in itself sufficient evidence upon which to sustain a conviction of one charged with having stolen them. People v. Gibson, 16 Cal. App. 347, 116 P. 987; People v. Luchetti, 119 Cal. 501, 51 P. 707; People v. Childs, 127 Cal. 363, 59 P. 768. Some evidence other than possession of the articles stolen must be produced to connect the accused with the theft; however, such additional connecting evidence may be slight, and, if it exists, the decision of the jury will not be disturbed. People v. Vidal, 121 Cal. 221, 53 P. 558; People v. Cataline, 54 Cal. App. 36, 200 P. 1060; People v. De Vaughn, 63 Cal. App. 513, 218 P. 1020. The giving by the defendant of false testimony may well have been regarded by the jury as in itself indicative of a consciousness of guilt. People v. Davenport, 17 Cal. App. 557, 120 P. 451. Appellant testified that he had seen Keating on the morning of the arrest; that the two had made an appointment to meet on Spring street just before the former was arrested; and that this man had since called upon him at the jail. However, Keating was not called as a witness to corroborate these statements. If his testimony be true that he saw O'Brien, the jury may have considered this as mitigating against him, and that his reason for boarding the different street cars was prompted by the fact that he had robbed Peterson at Third and Main streets and was attempting to elude the officers. The jury were justified in believing that the defendant threw away the papers and currency when accosted on the car, and this in itself would tend to indicate that he was guilty, and to prove that he had opened the purse and abstracted the contents, which he testified that he did not do.

We think these circumstances were sufficient to warrant the jury's conclusion that the defendant took the pocketbook from Peterson, and that he did not acquire it in the manner in which he claimed, by finding it on the street car.

The judgment is affirmed.

FABRICIUS v. VIEIRA et al. (Civ. 2886.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 17, 1924.)

Highways $\hookrightarrow$ 184(2, 3)—Evidence held to show driver of truck negligent in striking plaintiff, and not to show plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

Evidence held to show that driver of truck was guilty of negligence in striking plaintiff, who had parked his car approximately three feet from edge of pavement, and was adjusting carburetor, and not to show as matter of law that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Neils P. Fabricius against Antone Vieira and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John J. Allen and Allen C. Cunha, both of Oakland, for appellants.

Pierce & Carlson, of Richmond, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment against the defendants for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by being struck by a truck owned by the defendant corporation, and driven by its employee, defendant Vieira, in the course of his employment. The defendants have appealed.

On a Sunday afternoon at about 3 o'clock the plaintiff, who was driving in a northerly direction along San Pablo avenue in Contra Costa county, turned off the paved part of the highway to the right and stopped his automobile. The distance from the left side of the automobile, as it stood there, to the edge of the pavement was not less than 18 inches nor more than 4 feet, according to the estimates of the witnesses at the trial. The defendant Vieira estimated the distance to be "3 feet—from 2½ to 3 feet, not over that." The plaintiff stood in a stooping position at the left side of his automobile for a few minutes adjusting the carburetor thereof, and, while he was in that position, the defendants' truck, also traveling in a northerly direction, struck the plaintiff and caused the injuries of which complaint is made. The only grounds urged for a reversal of the judgment are that the evidence does not show that the defendants were guilty of actionable negligence, and that it conclusively appears that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

The pavement is 18 feet wide at the scene of the accident. It appears that there was nothing to have prevented the plaintiff from parking his automobile at a greater distance from the pavement, and that he made no effort to observe approaching vehicles while he was adjusting the carburetor. Had he attempted to watch for approaching machines, he probably could have done little else, because the evidence shows there were many automobiles traveling along the pavement in either direction. Some of the witnesses testified that the truck veered to the right as it neared the plaintiff, the right front wheel leaving the pavement, and one witness, the wife of plaintiff, testified that "the truck scraped our machine as it was driving along and went off the highway." The body of the truck did not extend to either side beyond the outer line of the fenders.

There is no doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to show that the driver of the truck was guilty of actionable negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury. It is equally clear that the evidence does not show, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. These conclusions so clearly appear from a mere statement of the evidence that further discussion is deemed unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Pleading $\hookrightarrow$ 214(1) — Allegations of complaint deemed true on demurrer.

Allegations of complaint must be deemed true on demurrer.

2. Specific performance $\hookrightarrow$ 21, 24—Maker of note held entitled to specific performance of third person's agreement to pay note and hold maker harmless from loss thereon.

Where maker executed bill of sale to third person in consideration of his agreement to pay note, and to hold maker harmless from loss thereon, and third person thereafter fraudulently conveyed his property to his wife to avoid performance of obligation so assumed, and where wife was a party to the fraud, maker was entitled to specific performance in action against the wife individually and as third person's executrix.

Maker, who executed bill of sale to third person in consideration of third person's agreement to pay note, and to hold maker harmless from loss thereon, could in view of Civ. Code, § 2846, sue for specific performance of agreement, though no judgment had been obtained against maker on note, and though maker had not paid note, under section 2778, subd. 1, notwithstanding subdivision 2, since third person became, as to maker, the principal debtor with maker the surety.

4. Specific performance Ⓒ3—Rule as to granting of specific performance when no actual injury has been sustained stated.

Equity will decree specific performance of express contracts when no actual injury has as yet been sustained, but is only apprehended from the peculiar relations of the parties.

5. Specific performance Ⓒ114(1)—Complaint held one for specific performance and not creditor's bill.

Complaint against surviving wife individually and as executrix, alleging husband's agreement to pay note executed by plaintiff, and to hold plaintiff harmless from loss thereon, and husband's fraudulent conveyance of all of his property to the wife to evade performance of such agreement, and wife's title in trust for estate of deceased husband, held a complaint for specific performance of such agreement, and not a creditor's bill stating separate causes of action.

6. Pleading Ⓒ251—Amended and supplemental complaint held not defective because amended and supplemental portions were not separately stated.

Amended and supplemental complaint filed against wife individually and as executrix of husband was not defective because amended and supplemental portions were not separately stated, particularly where it was evident therefrom that supplemental portion was confined to facts occurring after husband's death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Action by Edwin H. Williams against Frances E. Coleman, individually and as executrix of the last will of Robert L. Coleman, deceased. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Leandro, for appellant.

Waldo F. Postel, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Defendants' demurrers to plaintiff's second amended and supplemental complaint were sustained, with leave to amend. Plaintiff declined to amend, and thereafter judgment was entered in favor of defendants, from which judgment plaintiff has appealed.

The action was originally commenced against Robert L. Coleman and Frances E. Coleman, his wife. Subsequently Coleman died, and his wife, who was appointed executrix of his will, was, as such executrix, brought in as a party defendant.

The facts, as alleged in the second amended and supplemental complaint, are in substance as follows:

On January 1, 1916, appellant executed and delivered his promissory note to one Max Mamlock for the sum of $11,000, payable in monthly installments of $200, without interest. Thereafter, on January 25, 1916, Coleman executed and delivered to appellant the following instrument:

"San Francisco, January 25, 1916.

"For and in consideration of the execution to me of a bill of sale of even date herewith I hereby undertake and agree that I will pay to Max Mamlock that certain promissory note, dated January 1st, 1916, in the principal sum of eleven thousand dollars ($11,000.00) and signed by Edwin H. Williams, and that I will hold Edwin H. Williams harmless from any and all loss, damage or expense by reason of his having executed said promissory note in favor of Max Mamlock. A copy of said note is hereto annexed and made a part hereof.

"[Signed] Robert L. Coleman."

Coleman paid the monthly installments of the Mamlock note as they fell due for 18 months, paying in all the sum of $3,600, but thereafter failed to make payments. On September 13, 1917, Mamlock commenced suit against appellant and Coleman, to collect the balance due on the note, and both defendants were served with summons. Two days after the commencement of that suit, to wit, on September 15, 1917, appellant served Coleman with written notice, apprising him of the commencement of said suit and demanding that he (Coleman) "appear and defend the same on behalf of the undersigned." Said notice further stated:

"In the event of your failure so to do you will be held responsible for all damages resulting from your negligence."

It is then alleged in said complaint that Coleman refused and neglected to defend said action on behalf of appellant "but up to the time of his death * * * sought by demurrer to have said action dismissed as to said defendant, decedent, Robert L. Coleman, and continued as to this plaintiff (appellant) only," and that since Coleman's death his widow, as such executrix, has followed a like course. Allegations are then made relating to the death of Coleman, the admission of his will to probate, and the appointment of his wife, Frances E. Coleman, as the executrix thereof; also that in the petition for probate of the will "it was falsely and fraudulently alleged that said Robert L. Coleman left estate valued at less than $100"; that appellant in due course presented a claim against said estate, and upon information and belief it is alleged that the claim was rejected. Said complaint then charges that following the execution and delivery of the "indemnity agreement" of January 25, 1916, Coleman transferred the property standing in his name to his wife, "without any consideration," and "for the purpose of concealing and sequestering the same," so as to leave no assets with which to meet his obligations, and "so that it would be impossible to enforce any money judgment which might be rendered against him," and particularly for the purpose of defeating the Mamlock indebtedness; that after said transfers were made the said Coleman "became, and was and up to the time of his death remained, insolvent." Averments then follow:

"That said Frances E. Coleman at the time of the death of said Robert L. Coleman and at all times herein mentioned held in trust for said Robert E. Coleman, for said purposes, real property situate in the county of Santa Clara" which is particularly described in said complaint; that the interest of said Coleman, in said property, at the time of his death and prior thereto, amounted, in value, to upwards of $15,000, "and that said property was at the time of his death held for him by said Frances E. Coleman for the purpose of avoiding and defeating the claims of creditors and particularly the claim of plaintiff against him."

It is also further alleged that since January 25, 1916, Coleman transferred, to his wife, without consideration, "large amounts of personal property with intent and purpose to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said Robert L. Coleman, and especially plaintiff; that among other items of personal property so transferred" was the sum of $15,000, received as the proceeds of a sale of a taxicab business; that for like purpose Coleman from time to time deposited large sums of money in the bank, believed by plaintiff to be $15,000, to the credit of his wife's account, and that she received, accepted, converted, and used the same. Plaintiff then goes on to allege, upon information and belief, that, unless the said Frances E. Coleman is restrained by the order of court from doing so, she will "transfer and incur the property so held in trust for said Robert L. Coleman and put the same beyond reach of his creditors, and that plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law." Lastly, plaintiff alleges that he has incurred attorneys' fees in said matter which he alleges are of the reasonable value of $250.

The prayer of said complaint is that, the court decree, first, that said "Frances E. Coleman, executrix, * * * exonerate plaintiff from the said liability of the said Max Mamlock, and direct said Frances E. Coleman, executrix, to pay the said amount due on said instrument of indemnity, and to pay the installments" that shall thereafter become due. Second, that said Frances E. Coleman be directed "to promptly pay each and all the installments of said note as the same come due, and in that behalf to render the plaintiff herein good and ample security for the faithful performance" of said obligation. Third, "that said Frances E. Coleman, individually be declared trustee of said Frances E. Coleman, executrix * * * and she be restrained from transferring, incumbering, or taking out of the jurisdiction of the court, any of the property held by her in trust for said Robert L. Coleman." Fourth, for general relief, and costs.

The defendant Frances E. Coleman interposed two demurrers, substantially the same in form; one being filed as an individual defendant, and the other in her capacity as executrix. The demurrers are lengthy, embodying 12 separate general grounds besides 11 assignments of ambiguity. The record does not disclose the particular grounds upon which the demurrers were sustained, but we assume they were the ones now stressed by respondent on appeal, and to those grounds we have given our attention.

[1, 2] We believe the demurrers should have been overruled and the defendant required to answer. In a proceeding on demurrer, such as this, the allegations of the complaint must, of course, be deemed to be true. Considering the facts alleged from that viewpoint, it appears that plaintiff made a bill of sale to Coleman in consideration for which Coleman agreed in writing to relieve plaintiff from the payment of the Mamlock debt. Afterwards Coleman, for the very purpose of avoiding such written obligation, fraudulently disposed of and sequestered all his property by transferring the same to his wife, who was a party to the fraud, and who at the time of the commencement of this action still held title to the same. Coleman then ceased making further payment on the Mamlock debt, and Mamlock sued to collect the balance due. Although obligated in writing to hold plaintiff harmless from said debt, Coleman, so the complaint alleges, attempted to relieve himself from the effect of the Mamlock suit and fasten the responsibility thereof upon plaintiff. Surely, under such circumstances, plaintiff was entitled to relief, and, if unable to secure it through an action at law, was justified in resorting to equity to compel the specific performance of the Coleman contract.

[3, 4] Respondent contends that plaintiff was not legally authorized to commence proceedings against Coleman until Mamlock had obtained a judgment against plaintiff, or until plaintiff had paid the debt. The law does not uphold such contention. Coleman having assumed the payment of the Mamlock debt became, so far as plaintiff was concerned, the principal debtor, and plaintiff the surety (Roberts v. Fitzallen, 120 Cal. 482, 52 P. 818; Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 P. 868; Tulare Bank v. Madden, 109 Cal. 312, 41 P. 1092; 1 Jones on Mortgages, § 11), and plaintiff as surety was empowered to compel Coleman as principal to perform the obligation when due (section 2846, Civ. Code), and was not required to defer action until Mamlock had obtained judgment against plaintiff (5 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 2342; White v. Schader, 185 Cal. 606, 198 P. 19, 21 A. L. R. 499), or until plaintiff had paid the debt (Kreling v. Kreling, 118 Cal. 413, 50 P. 546; Abell v. Coons, 7 Cal. 105, 68 Am. Dec. 229). It is a well-established principle that equity will interpose to decree specific performance of express contracts when no actual injury has as yet been sustained, but is only apprehended from the peculiar relations of the parties. Story, Eq. Jur., vol. 2, § 1011 (14th Ed.). Furthermore, the Civil Code expressly provides (section 2778, subd. 1) that:

"Upon an indemnity against liability, expressly, or in other equivalent terms, the person indemnified is entitled to recover upon becoming liable."

Plaintiff in this action is not seeking a money judgment against defendants for the amount of the Mamlock debt, but asks only that the contract be performed by Coleman; consequently subdivision 2 of said section 2778 of the Civil Code, to which we have been cited by respondent, is not applicable.

[5] We are also of the opinion that the inclusion in the complaint of the charges of the fraud regarding transfer of the real and personal property, and the allegations that Frances E. Coleman held a trust title to the real property, and of the averments that said property constituted a part of the estate of her deceased husband, do not have the effect of converting the form of action into a creditor's bill nor set up new and separate causes of action. There is but the one cause of action stated—an equitable proceeding—having for its sole object the enforcement of the plain obligation of an express contract, and to subject the promisor's property, which it is claimed was fraudulently diverted from the promisor's estate, to the fulfillment of that obligation. The form of action here followed was upheld in Raisch v. Warren, 18 Cal. App. 655, 124 P. 95. While that case differs from the instant one in that the proceeding there was primarily for an accounting and in which there was no fraud charged concerning the transfer of the property, these differences are not material. Both proceedings are equitable ones, brought to cause the property belonging to deceased persons to be subjected to the payment of their debts. Indeed, the element of fraud in the instant case adds more support to plaintiff's cause of action. Quoting approvingly from Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice, and from Cyc., the court in Raisch v. Warren says:

"Where the claim of complaint is purely equitable, and such as the chancellor will take cognizance of in the first instance, he will go the entire extent and inquire into obstructions in the road of enforcing the demand, and the complainant therefore, when he goes into equity to assert and liquidate his claim, may, in addition to the assertion of his claim, ask relief against the fraudulent acts of the debtor in attempting to place his estate beyond the reach of creditors.' 5 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. p. 463. The rule 'is not so strict as to deny to a party the interposition of the equity power of the court when the situation is such as to render impossible the aid of a court of law in taking the preliminary steps ordinarily treated as a condition precedent to the application for equitable relief.' 20 Cyc. pp. 692, 701."

The principles stated in that case also dispose of respondents' contention that plaintiff's suit is not maintainable until his claim has been reduced to judgment.

The allegations of fraud and of the creation of a trust title in Mrs. Coleman we think are sufficient for the purposes for which they are made. Plaintiff does not seek as the ultimate object of this suit to set aside deeds and other transfers, nor to create a trust in the technical sense represented by respondents, but, as before stated, demands that the defendant, individually, as the present title holder of the property, and as party to the fraud, and as executrix of the will of her deceased husband, subject the property now held by her, which it is claimed legally and morally belongs to, but was fraudulently diverted from, the decedent's estate, to the fulfillment of the decedent's legal obligations. What disposition the court may require defendant to make of said property, in the event that plaintiff's suit prevails, is a question that need not be answered at this time. As was said in Raisch v. Warren, supra.

"When a court of equity has once obtained jurisdiction, it will do complete justice by deciding the whole case.' Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500, 528 (24 Pac. 172, 25 Pac. 64); Van Zile on Equity Pleading and Practice, § 11. Just what course the court may pursue, in its disposition of the said corporation shares, after having found that they belong to the estate, need not be anticipated. It may order their sale and the proceeds to be paid to the administrator to be applied to the payment of creditors of the estate (Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 668 [42 Pac. 303]; Shiels v. Nathan, 12 Cal. App. 604 [108 Pac. 34]); or it may direct the defendant, administrator of the estate, to take possession of them as property of the estate and dispose of them for the benefit of the creditors of the estate."

[6] Nor do we think the complaint is defective as respondent contends because the amended and supplemental portions thereof are not separately stated, particularly in view of the fact that it is evident from the complaint that the supplemental portion thereof is confined to those facts occurring after the death of Coleman. Of course the success of plaintiff's case ultimately depends upon the amount and value of proof he may offer upon trial, and upon the extent of relief the trial court in the exercise of its judgment, sitting as a court of equity, may grant. But, as the complaint now stands, we think it legally sufficient in substance and form to entitle plaintiff to a trial thereon.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrers, and to take such further proceedings as may be necessary to a final disposition of said action.

PEOPLE v. BUTTULIA. (Cr. 1195.)

1. Criminal law ⇨1186(4)—Information failing to negative uses excepted in Volstead Act held not to require reversal.

Information which charged illegal possession of intoxicating liquor, but failed to negative the excepted uses mentioned in Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.), held not to require reversal in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, where the sole defense was an absolute denial of the possession of the liquor; no claim being made of legal possession.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⇨224—Burden rests upon prosecution to prove illegality of possession.

Illegality of possession of intoxicating liquors is a material element of offense, and burden rests upon prosecution to prove that element, in view of fact that Wright Act adopted only penal provisions of Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.); provision making possession prima facie evidence of illegality being a procedural one.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⇨238(2)—Whether accused buried liquor on vacant lot adjoining his home held for jury.

Whether accused buried liquor on the vacant lot adjoining his home held for jury.

4. Criminal law ⇨371(10)—In prosecution for unlawful possession, evidence of sales held admissible to show constructive possession for illegal purpose.

In a prosecution for unlawful possession, where it appeared that the liquor was found buried in a vacant lot adjoining accused's home, evidence of sales of liquor by him to various persons on day mentioned in information and other dates not far removed held admissible to show accused's constructive possession for illegal purposes.

5. Criminal law ⇨1037(1)—Alleged misconduct of district attorney held not available as error, in absence of assignment below.

Alleged misconduct of district attorney in his closing argument to jury held not available as error on appeal, where accused did not assign such misconduct at the trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Sam Buttulia was convicted of illegally possessing intoxicating liquors, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William G. Hunt, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered upon a verdict of a jury finding him guilty of illegally possessing intoxicating liquor on the 11th day of April, 1924. Defendant admitted the charge of prior convictions of the same offense.

[1] The first point made upon appeal is that the information fails to charge a public offense because it fails to negative the excepted uses mentioned in the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.), in that it does not state that the liquor was not possessed by defendant in his private dwelling, occupied by him, and possessed merely for his personal use and consumption. No demurrer was interposed to the information upon this ground, and the objection is made for the first time upon appeal. We shall not attempt to differentiate this case from the federal cases relied upon by appellant any further than to point out that upon the present situation there operates the wholesome provision of section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution. It is clear that even though the contention of appellant be upheld, the defendant was not prejudiced by the defect in the information, because his sole defense was an absolute denial of the possession of the liquor and there was no contention made that the liquor was legally possessed by him. A case similar in principle is the case of People v. Bonfanti, 40 Cal. App. 614, 181 P. 80. There the court discussed an information charging an assault with intent to commit rape which omitted to allege that the woman assaulted was not the wife of the defendant. While such an information did not state a public offense, it was held that after trial and conviction, where the evidence showed that the victim was not the wife of defendant, the defect in the information would not warrant a reversal of the judgment. The court said:

"An examination of the record immediately discloses that the omission in question affected the trial not at all; in fact, the trial proceeded as if the allegation were there. * * * It could not be contended, even by the defendant, that if the information had contained the statement that the victim of the assault was not his wife, the trial would have proceeded with one iota's difference from the course it took, or that the verdict of the jury or the judgment of the court would have been other than it was."

Likewise, in the instant case, we have a situation where no prejudice resulted from the error, if any, in the information, and the entire record discloses that substantial justice has been done by the verdict and judgment.

[2-4] Other specifications of error arise in various ways from the contention of the appellant that error was committed in admitting evidence of numerous sales of liquor by the defendant to various persons, at various dates not far removed from the day mentioned in the information, and of several such sales upon said day. The circumstance-es of this case were somewhat unusual, in that the liquor was not found in the home of defendant, but a large quantity of it was found buried in a vacant lot adjoining his home, some of it buried a few feet outside the wall surrounding his premises. There was no other dwelling place close to the spot where the liquor was buried. Whether or not the liquor had been placed there by the defendant was a question for the jury, and in an attempt to prove constructive possession of defendant and illegality of such possession, if found by the jury, the prosecution introduced evidence of numerous sales, some of them on the day charged in the information, from which the jury was asked to infer that defendant possessed the liquor, exercised control over it, and did so for an illegal purpose. But it is the position of appellant that as the Volstead Act makes possession alone prima facie evidence of illegality and shifts the burden to the defendant to show legal possession, the state had no burden of showing more than possession, and therefore the evidence complained of had no legitimate purpose in the record. This position is destroyed, basically, by the decisions in People v. Mattos (Cal. App.) 227 P. 974, and People v. Silva (Cal. App.) 227 P. 976, wherein it is held that as the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) adopted only the penal provisions of the Volstead Act and as the provision making possession prima facie evidence of illegality is a procedural one, it is not the law of this state. In California, therefore, the burden rests upon the prosecution to prove the illegality of possession of intoxicating liquor and that is a material element of the offense. This case being peculiar, in that the liquor was not found in the home of the defendant, but adjoining the same, and there being no direct proof available on the question of possession, the prosecution relied upon circumstances to prove the possession and illegality thereof. It is clear that if the defendant was making a practice of selling liquor, that fact would tend to show that he was responsible for placing the liquor where it was found, adjoining his home, and would also tend to prove that his constructive possession of such liquor was for an illegal purpose.

The contention that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the verdict of the jury is without merit. It is true the verdict is based partly upon circumstantial evidence; but there are a great many circumstances, and they are convincing in effect, and there is nothing in the record which casts doubt upon the inference to be drawn from them.

[5] The contention that error was committed by the district attorney in making certain statements in his closing argument to the jury is not available to the appellant upon this appeal. No assignment of misconduct was made by defendant at the time of the trial so as to enable the trial judge to remedy the matter by appropriate instructions, and it has been repeatedly held that under such circumstances such errors will not warrant a reversal upon appeal. People v. Kiser, 24 Cal. App. 540, 141 P. 1078; People v. Stein, 23 Cal. App. 108, 137 P. 271; People v. Mancuso, 23 Cal. App. 146, 137 P. 278.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUNSET PUB. HOUSE v. COTTAGE GARDENS NURSERIES et al. (Civ. 5012.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 31, 1924.)

Dismissal and nonsuit $\Leftrightarrow$ 60(6)—Dismissal for want of prosecution held not warranted.

Delay in prosecuting action held reasonably accounted for by attorney's affidavit, showing that it was at request, and for benefit, of defendants, who admitted indebtedness and failed to answer complaint, so that court abused discretion in dismissing action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by the Sunset Publishing House against the Cottage Gardens Nurseries and G. Vanden Abeele, as receiver thereof. From an order dismissing the action for want of prosecution, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Nelson & Ricks, of Eureka, for appellant.
Puter & Quinn and Pierce H. Ryan, all of Eureka, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from an order dismissing the action on the ground of want of prosecution. The complaint was filed in the superior court of the county of Humboldt on November 22, 1918. The cause of action was a balance due the plaintiff for work and labor performed and materials furnished to the defendant, amounting to $1,224.45. A demurrer was filed to said complaint on December 13, 1918. About this time the defendant became financially involved, and upon proceedings duly had in the superior court of that county a receiver was appointed for the defendant.

On November 9, 1921, upon application to the superior court, permission was given to the plaintiff to prosecute an action against this defendant and said receiver. Thereafter, and on December 28, 1923, new attorneys were substituted for the plaintiff herein, and on December 28, 1923, they filed an amended complaint herein adding said receiver as a party defendant. To this amended complaint the defendants demurred on January 24, 1924, and at the same time filed a motion to dismiss this action on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prosecute it with due diligence. The affidavit of the attorney for the defendants in support of this motion sets forth facts substantially as just recited. In answer thereto the plaintiffs filed the affidavit of their original counsel who acted as such until December 28, 1923. From this affidavit it appeared that from the 4th day of April, 1919, when the receiver was appointed, counsel for the defendants herein acted as his attorney, while the affiant acted as the attorney for the plaintiff, and that numerous meetings of the creditors of said company were called at the request of its attorneys, and that at each of said meetings plaintiff's counsel appeared and was assured by the receiver and by defendants' counsel that the receiver would soon render his report and account; that payments would be made to the creditors on account of their various claims; and that the prosecution of legal proceedings, including this action, would be unnecessary. It also appeared from said affidavit that the delay in prosecuting this proceeding was caused by the actions, conduct, and representations of counsel for said receiver, and that the defendant had not been prejudiced by the delay, but, on the other hand, it had been benefited thereby; that at each of the meetings referred to the obligation involved in this action had been repeatedly admitted, and said receiver and his counsel had repeatedly assured the plaintiff that it would be paid and satisfied. All these facts stand in the record uncontradicted. No answer has been filed to the original or amended complaint, and the debt has not been denied at any time. Upon this showing alone the trial court made its order dismissing the action from which the appeal is prosecuted. The question involved on the appeal is whether the trial court abused its discretion in dismissing the action.

From the facts recited it is apparent that the delay in prosecuting the action was caused wholly by the respondents; that, in fact, it was upon respondents' request and for their benefit that the action was not prosecuted. This fact, taken with their admission of the indebtedness upon which the suit is based and their failure to answer the allegations of the complaint, brings the case under the rule of Ferris v. Wood, 144 Cal. 426, 429, 77 P. 1037, where the Supreme Court say:

"It seems to us that the delay was reasonably accounted for and excused, and that the order of the court did not tend to subserve, but rather to impede or defeat, the ends of substantial justice."

In that case, as here, the debt was admitted and the delay was caused by the effort to bring about a compromise. To the same effect is Herman v. Pacific Jute Manufacturing Co., 131 Cal. 210, 63 P. 344.

Order reversed.

EMPIRE SECURITIES CO. v. COUNTRYMAN et al. (Civ. 4967.)

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 533 — Personal demand for payment of assessment against "unknown" owners unnecessary.

Where assessment for street work is made against "unknown" owners under San Francisco street improvement ordinance 1913, $\S$ 20 (No. 2439, N. S.), personal demand is not essential to validity of judgment foreclosing lien.

2. Municipal corporations $\S$ 533—Affidavit of demand for payment of assessment need not show hour and other details of demand.

Under San Francisco street improvement ordinance 1913 (No. 2439, N. S.), affidavit of person making demand for payment of assessment on premises of unknown owners need not disclose hour when demand was made or portion of premises and other details.

3. Constitutional law $\S$ 55 — Municipal improvement ordinance, declaring assessment, prima facie evidence of regularity, not unconstitutional.

San Francisco street improvement ordinance 1913 (No. 2439 N. S.), declaring that warrant, assessment, diagram, etc., shall be prima facie evidence of regularity and correctness of assessment and prior proceedings, is not unconstitutional as legislation on matters of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Suit by the Empire Securities Company against Jennie A. Countryman and Robert H. Countryman to foreclose street assessment lien. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment foreclosing a lien for street work upon certain real property in the city and county of San Francisco belonging to said defendants. The action was brought by an assignee of the contractor who did the street work. One of the issues at the trial was whether the demand for payment made by the agent of the assignee on December 8, 1916, was made before or after the assignment of the claim to plaintiff. Appellants contend that the evidence indicates that the assignment of the claim was made on December 14, 1916, six days after the demand was made, and therefore the demand was ineffective. There is no necessity to review in detail the evidence upon this question. It is sufficient to state that there was a conflict in said evidence and that the trial court found the assignment was made and filed with the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco on December 8, 1916. There is abundant evidence in the record to support these findings, and therefore the arguments upon this point contained in the appellants' brief are useless upon an appeal.

[1] Appellants object to the judgment because no personal demand for payment was shown to have been made upon them. But the record discloses that the assessment in question was made to "unknown" owners, and section 20 of the San Francisco street improvement ordinance of 1913 (Ordinance No. 2439, N. S.) provides that, when the owner of the lot is stated as "unknown" upon the assessment, said contractor or his assignee, or some person on his or their behalf, shall publicly, in an audible tone of voice, demand payment on the premises assessed. Personal demand was therefore unnecessary. Whiting v. Townsend, 57 Cal. 515; Macadamizing Co. v. Williams, 70 Cal. 534, 12 P. 530.

[2] Appellants' contention that the affidavit of Stefani, who made the demand upon the premises, should have disclosed at what hour the demand was made and upon what portion of the premises and other details is without merit. We think these details were unnecessary. The ultimate fact is whether or not a demand was made as required by the ordinance. In Bienfeld v. Van Ness, 176 Cal. 585, 169 P. 225, it was said:

"The requirement as to the nature and character of the demand refers to the question whether the demand is personal, that is, upon the owner or his agent, or constructive, that is, by outcry upon the premises."

But, even though there had been defects in the affidavit of demand and nonpayment, such defects would not have invalidated the proceedings because of curative provisions of the ordinance, as pointed out in Bienfeld v. Van Ness, supra, wherein it is said:

"* * * The objection to the formal sufficiency of the assessment and return, or affidavit of demand and nonpayment, are all disposed of by the following provision of the ordinance: 'No assessment, warrant, diagram or affidavit of demand and nonpayment after the issue of the same, and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the board of public works to recommend to the supervisors the ordering of the improvement has been actually published and posted and the notices of improvement posted as in this ordinance provided.' * * * The effect of the above curative clause of the ordinance is to make the other provisions of the ordinance respecting the form of the affidavit of demand and nonpayment of the assessment or warrant, directory only, and to prevent a failure to observe the same from having the effect of invalidating the lien upon the property."

[3] It is also contended that the ordinance involved here is unconstitutional in so far as it provides that the warrant, assessment, diagram, etc., shall be prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment and of the prior proceedings and acts of the board of public works and of the supervisors upon which said warrant, assessment, and diagram are based. It is urged that the charter of the city and county of San Francisco does not grant to the supervisors the power to legislate upon matters of evidence. This contention is disposed of by the cases of Mardis v. McCarthy, 162 Cal. 94, 100, 121 P. 389; Federal Construction Co. v. Wolfson, 186 Cal. 267, 276, 199 P. 512, 29 A. L. R. 1098.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is affirmed.

HUMBOLDT OIL CO. et al. v. HOAGLAND et al. (Civ. 5049.)

1. Corporations —Presentation to secretary of separate signed slips containing printed call for stockholders' meeting held to comply with statute; "addressed."

Where majority of stockholders of corporation having determined necessity of meeting to remove directors, upon refusal of officers to call meeting proceeded to make a call by signing slips containing printed call and mailing them to chairman of committee elected for purpose, who presented them to secretary with demand that he call meeting, call held to comply with requirements of Civ. Code, § 310, that call be in writing and addressed to secretary; word "addressed" not requiring that secretary be formally named as addressee.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Address.]

2. Corporations —Publication of notice of stockholders' meeting need not be preceded by order of acting president.

Civ. Code, § 310, when read with section 301, does not require publication of notice of stockholders' meeting to be preceded by order of acting president; therefore meeting held legal where, on refusal of officers to call it, notice of meeting was caused to be published by stockholders without being preceded by such order.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Proceeding for writ of mandate by the Humboldt Oil Company and others against W. W. Hoagland and others. From a judgment granting the writ, respondents appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. Kehoe and A. P. Black, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco (John H. Riordan, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

NOURSE, J. The petitioners commenced this proceeding in the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents to deliver the corporation seal, the corporation books, the office furniture, money on hand, and all other property of the corporation into the possession of the petitioners. The petition was resisted by the respondents on the ground that the petitioners were not entitled to bring the action because they were not legally elected to the office of directors of the company. All the issues of fact involved were found in favor of the petitioners, and a peremptory writ of mandate was issued. From this judgment the respondents have appealed under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The only ground urged on the appeal is that the meeting of the stockholders held on November 30, 1923, was not a legal meeting because it had not been called in the manner provided by law. The facts pertinent to this appeal are that a majority of the stockholders of the corporation, having determined the necessity of holding a meeting for the purpose of removing the directors of the corporation, and the officers of the company having refused to call such a meeting, proceeded to make a call by attaching their signatures to separate pieces of paper containing a printed call for such a meeting and mailing these to the chairman of the committee of the stockholders elected for that purpose, who in turn presented them to the secretary with a demand that he call a meeting as requested by the stockholders. The secretary refused to give notice of the meeting, basing his refusal upon the ground that the call did not comply with the terms of section 310 of the Civil Code. The stockholders thereupon published due notice of the meeting to be held on November 30th, and at the meeting held in accordance with this notice more than 80 per cent. of the stockholders holding about 80 per cent. of the capital stock of the corporation were present. By a vote of 77,507 to 695, they removed the former board of directors and elected in their places other directors who represent the petitioners in this action. The point of respondents on this appeal is that the call, or calls, for that meeting were not addressed directly to the secretary of the corporation as required by section 310, and that the publication of the notice of the meeting was not given by order of the acting president as required by section 301 of the Civil Code. These are the same grounds upon which the writ was resisted by the respondents before the trial court, and that court, after a full and impartial hearing, supported its judgment by a written opinion. Having read that opinion, we are unable to find anything in appellant's brief or oral argument which would cause us to disagree with the reasoning or conclusions of the learned trial judge. The reasons which he gave for the judgment are sufficient reasons for the affirmance of the judgment by this court.

[1, 2] We therefore approve and adopt as the opinion of this court the following portion of the opinion prepared by Judge Johnson:

"I have given further consideration in the above-mentioned action to the provisions of section 310, C. C., requiring a call for a meeting of stockholders to remove directors to be in writing and addressed to the secretary.

"The word 'addressed' is etymologically connected with the Latin word 'directus,' meaning straight or right; and primarily a thing is addressed when it is aimed straight or right.

"Among the definitions given in the Century Dictionary for the verb 'address' we find the following: 'To give direction to, as to aim a missile at an object; to direct to the ear or attention, to direct speech or writing to, to aim at the hearing or attention of.'

"And in the Standard Dictionary the word is defined as meaning: 'To direct spoken words to; to deliver or direct as an observation or communication.'

"The word 'addressed' thus signifies 'directed' or 'aimed'; and words addressed to a person are aimed at or spoken straight to him, indicating that they are meant expressly for him.

"So a written communication is addressed to, or aimed at, a person in order that it may reach him and be read by him.

"The purpose of section 310, C. C., in requiring a call to be addressed to the secretary is to bring the call to his attention so that he may read it and act upon it. I do not think that the term as used in the section should be so strictly interpreted as to require the secretary to be formally named in writing as the addressee on the face of the call itself. If a call were to be inclosed in an envelope, and the envelope inscribed with the name and office address of the secretary, and then mailed, or personally delivered to the secretary, it could hardly be said that such a call was not addressed to the secretary.

"In the case before us, the call, instead of being put into an addressed envelope, was delivered to the secretary in person and he was asked to publish it. This certainly aimed that call at him and brought it in the most direct way to his notice. It passed into his hands, and he read it and knew what was demanded of him.

"This procedure fully accomplished the purposes of the statute; and I am of the opinion that the call so presented and received was sufficiently 'addressed' to the secretary. The secretary having received and retained the paper under the circumstances shown in evidence, neither he nor the other officers should be permitted on such hypertechnical grounds to disregard the function which the document was designed to perform.

"As to the publication itself, I do not think that section 310, when read with section 301, requires the publication to be preceded by the order of the acting president.

"The law contemplates that stockholders shall have the right to control their company; and a means is provided for their own publication of their call, when the secretary does not act upon their request. The reference in section 301 relating to the manner of the publication should be held to be limited to the period of publication and the paper."

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NELSON. (Cr. 1133.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 31, 1924. Rehearing Denied Jan. 30, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 26, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⇨196—Test in determining whether second information charges same offense, stated.

One test applicable to determine whether second information charges same offense as first one, is to ascertain if the evidence which is necessary to support second information, was admissible under former, and was sufficient to warrant conviction of that crime.

2. Criminal law ⇨196—Second information charging embezzlement of jewelry held not to charge same offense as first charging embezzlement of money.

Where defendant was first charged with embezzlement of money, but verdict of acquittal was directed on showing that jewelry was embezzled, a second information charging embezzlement of jewelry did not charge same offense, since evidence on second trial would not have sustained charge in first information.

3. Criminal law ⇨195(1)—Verdict of not guilty, though not stating it was because of variance, not bar to second prosecution for different offense.

Though directed verdict of not guilty did not state it was based on variance, as required by Pen. Code, § 1151, and was an acquittal on merits, where second information charged a separate and distinct offense, such verdict did not bar second prosecution.

4. Criminal law ⇨195(1)—Failure to direct verdict because of variance, or direct that defendant be held pending new information, held not to affect legality of second prosecution for different offense.

Failure to instruct jury to acquit on ground of variance, or direct that defendant be held pending filing of new information, did not affect legality of second information and conviction thereunder, for a different and distinct offense.

5. Criminal law ⇨1172(7)—Permitting jury to determine whether variance on first trial material, if error, held favorable to defendant.

Error, if any, in permitting jury to determine whether variance on trial under former information was material, was favorable to defendant, where it was conclusively shown that information on first trial charged different offense from that shown by evidence and charged in second information.

6. Embezzlement ⇨44(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of embezzlement of jewelry given to defendant to sell.

In prosecution for embezzlement of jewelry given to defendant to sell, and of which he alleged he was robbed, evidence as to defendant's contradictory statements as to identity of alleged robbers and place where he was robbed, his offer of money to let him go, together with other evidence, held to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Sam Nelson was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. Appeal is here taken from verdicts rendered on April 11, 1924, convicting appellant of embezzlement, and finding for the people upon plea of former jeopardy.

Two informations were formerly filed in the superior court. One charged appellant with having embezzled and appropriated to his own use certain jewelry intrusted to him by one E. A. Miller. The other charged that, on or about the 28th day of June, 1923, appellant came into possession of $1,500 lawful money of the United States of the value of $1,500 in gold coin of the United States, of the personal property of one D. S. Maiman, which appellant, on the last-mentioned date, embezzled and converted to his own use. The two cases were consolidated and tried together, and a jury found him guilty upon the first charge of embezzlement under $50; with that case we are not concerned on this appeal. This opinion deals with the Maiman Case only.

In the trial upon the information containing the charge of embezzlement of money, the people offered in evidence a receipt, reading as follows:

"Los Angeles, Calif., June 26, 1923.

"Received of D. S. Maiman on memorandum, one brilliant, 2.05 karat at $450 per karat, one brill. 1.83 at $350 per karat, and will report same not later than June 27, 1923. Sam Nelson, 433 Centennial.

"July 2, 1923, also, in addition to above received on memorandum, 3 platinum and diamond rings karat No. 11173-443500, 11643, at $235; No. 3564-16093, 443425-11163 at $250; No. 419-439350-11633 at $225. One scarf pin No. 1900-4155500 at $100. Sam Nelson, 74544."

It appeared that Nelson obtained from Maiman the two diamonds first mentioned in the memorandum for the purpose of selling them; that he returned them, but that later, on July 2d, he represented to Maiman that he had customers at Long Beach and Los Angeles, who would buy all of the jewelry described above; that Maiman thereupon delivered to Nelson the two diamonds and the other jewelry, which was then added to the memorandum. It is admitted that appellant received the jewelry, and that he agreed to sell it and pay the proceeds to Maiman or return the property. On July 4th appellant telephoned Maiman that he had been held up and robbed on the night before, and that the jewelry had been taken from him.

When the foregoing facts were presented, the trial court stated that if there had been any embezzlement, it was of property, rather than of money, and remarked that at the conclusion of the case it would direct the jury to return a verdict of acquittal on account of the variance. He then instructed the district attorney to prepare a new information conforming to the facts. It does not appear that the court instructed the jury as promised, but a general verdict was returned, in the following language: "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find the defendant not guilty of embezzlement." Following that trial the appellant apparently remained in custody, a new complaint was sworn to and filed in the justice's court, and, following a preliminary examination thereon, he was again held to answer to the superior court, this time charged with having embezzled the jewelry of Maiman. A new information charging embezzlement of the jewelry was later filed, and the defendant was tried thereunder, upon the same evidence, and convicted.

On this appeal the principal grounds relied upon are alleged former jeopardy, that the verdict of not guilty returned in the former trial was not rendered specifically upon the ground of variance as required by section 1151 of the Penal Code, and that the trial court erred in its instructions to the jury in this connection.

[1] In support of the plea of once in jeopardy, appellant contends that there was an identity of time, facts, evidence, and of criminal act or omission in the two Maiman Cases. He does not, nor could he, successfully contend that the second information charged the same offense as that alleged in the first one. It has repeatedly been held that one test applicable to determine the identity of the offense is to ascertain if the evidence which is necessary to support the second information was admissible under the former, and was sufficient if believed by the jury, to have warranted a conviction of that crime. 16 Corp. Jur. p. 265, § 445; People v. Cummings, 123 Cal. 269, 55 P. 898; People v. Bentley, 77 Cal. 7, 18 P. 799, 11 Am. St. Rep. 225. It is obvious that the evidence offered in the case in which this defendant was convicted would not have stood this test as applied to the prosecution of the case in which the jury found the defendant not guilty. Indeed, it was objected by appellant's own counsel upon the first trial that all of the testimony offered by the prosecution was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and that it did not tend in any manner to prove any issue in that case. Whether or not this objection was well taken, it is certain that the evidence which the people presented did not sustain the charge of an embezzlement of money, for it showed that if the defendant was guilty of any offense, it was of having embezzled jewelry.

[2] It was held in People v. Oreileus, 79 Cal. 178, 21 P. 724, that an allegation of assault with a deadly weapon upon a person who had never been known by the name alleged was not the same offense as that charged in a subsequent information containing the correct name and the same facts; and in People v. Meseros, 16 Cal. App. 277, 116 P. 679, it was said that "proof of the embezzlement or larceny of a check will not support a charge of embezzlement * * * of money." It has been established in other jurisdictions that an indictment charging embezzlement of money will not sustain a conviction upon proof of the embezzlement of horses, potatoes, or stocks, and that each is a separate and distinct offense. State v. Dodson, 72 Mo. 283; State v. Crosswhite, 130 Mo. 359, 32 S. W. 991, 51 Am. St. Rep. 571; State v. Peck, 299 Mo. 454, 253 S. W. 1019. It follows, therefore, that appellant was not tried in the first instance for the same offense with which he was charged in this case, and, since the offenses were not the same, his plea of having formerly been in jeopardy is without merit.

[3] The contention that this judgment should be reversed because the verdict in the first trial did not read "Not guilty by reason of variance between indictment and proof," as required by section 1151 of the Penal Code, is clearly untenable. It may be granted that the verdict which was rendered is an acquittal, not merely upon the ground of variance between the information and the facts proved, but upon the merits of the charge. The charge itself was embezzlement of $1,500, and the evidence did not sustain it. As pointed out in the discussion of the contention that the plea of former jeopardy should have been sustained, the charge contained in the second information, and of which the defendant was convicted, is entirely different from that of which he was acquitted. Section 1151 reads, in part: "A general verdict upon a plea of not guilty is either 'Guilty,' or 'Not Guilty,' which imports a conviction or acquittal of the offense charged in the indictment." From this language it follows that the verdict of "Not Guilty" which was rendered merely imports an acquittal of the identical offense charged in the first information, which was a different and distinct offense from that charged in the information upon which the defendant was convicted.

[4] It is also argued that since the trial court did not instruct the jury to acquit on the ground of variance in the first case, or direct that the defendant be held upon the other charge, pending the filing of a new information, it committed error, and that he was then entitled to his discharge. Appellant cites section 1165 of the Penal Code as authority for this point. Conceding for the purposes of argument that the defendant should have been discharged upon the rendition of the verdict of acquittal, the fact remains that he was detained in custody. It might be that he would have been entitled to his discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus at any time prior to the 18th day of December, when the justice's court bound him over a second time to the superior court. However, if this second prosecution was legal, the fact that for a brief period of time between the termination of the first trial, and the filing of the complaint which instituted the second prosecution, he might have been at liberty, can have no bearing upon the legality of the filing of the second information, and the conviction of the defendant thereunder.

[5] The jury were instructed in this case that if they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was acquitted in the former case upon the ground of variance between the information and the proof, and that such variance was material, and that the court ordered a new information to be filed because thereof, they must find the defendant not once in jeopardy. Appellant insists that this instruction was erroneous, in that it stated that the former verdict was founded upon a variance, and that they must find whether or not the variance was material; that the determination of the nature of the verdict was a question of law for the court, and that the jury should find only whether appellant had or had not been once in jeopardy and acquitted of the same offense. In People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 P. 15, it was said:

"It is true, also, as a general proposition, that questions of fact are exclusively with the jury, and that jeopardy is a question of fact; but where, as here, the information failed to charge any offense, it was not error to charge the jury 'that the plea of once in jeopardy is not sustained by the evidence, and your verdict on that issue will be "for the people,"' and so as to the issue of former acquittal. People v. Varnum, 53 Cal. 630; People v. Helbing, 61 Cal. 620; People v. Clark, 67 Cal. 99."

It is apparent that the trial court would have been authorized in directing a verdict against appellant upon the question of former jeopardy; but having submitted the question to the jury, exception is taken to its action in permitting them to determine whether or not such variance was material. We do not perceive how appellant could have been prejudiced by the instruction given. The entire record in the former trial was introduced in evidence, and became a part of the proof in this case, from which the only conclusion possible was that the embezzlement consisted, if at all, of jewelry, and that the information alleged an embezzlement of coin. This being true, if the trial court committed any error, it was favorable to appellant in so instructing the jury as to permit it to find that such variance was immaterial, and that jeopardy had attached. Appellant is not in position to raise this objection. People v. Wilkison, 30 Cal. App. 473, 158 P. 1067.

[6] It is further contended that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment; that appellant had formerly borne a good reputation, and that his testimony was direct and credible; whereas that of the witnesses for the people was circumstantial, conjectural, and unworthy of preference to his positive statements. It was admitted that he received the jewelry, and that he did not return it, or any proceeds of a sale; it appears that he became confused, or attempted to confuse the officers, in locating the corner of the street where he claimed to have been robbed; he told Maiman that he had not had time to go to Long Beach, or to see the other customer in Los Angeles, but he told the officers that he had been to Long Beach; at one time he stated that the men who held him up were white, and at another time he stated that they were negroes; he did not know the name, address, or telephone number of the Long Beach customer, and finally stated that he was to meet him at Second and Spring streets in Los Angeles, at a barber shop, at 1 o'clock in the morning. A police officer testified that appellant offered him $50 to let him go. There are other discrepancies in his testimony, and from all the evidence adduced the jury may well have concluded that it was unworthy of belief, and that he had utterly failed to plausibly account for the missing diamonds. If his own testimony be rejected, which the jury were authorized to do, there is ample evidence to support the verdict and judgment.

No other points are attempted to be raised which require attention.

The judgment is affirmed.

H. D. HALEY & CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. McVAY, County Auditor. (Civ. 2818.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 30, 1924.)

1. Corporations ⚡672(7)—Compliance by foreign corporation with statute need not be alleged and proved.

Compliance by a foreign corporation with Corporation License Act 1917, § 1, as amended by St. 1921, p. 638, need not be alleged and proved in proceeding to enforce contract made with it, in view of disputable presumption raised by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 33, that the law has been obeyed.

2. Counties ⚡47—Authority of boards of supervisors rests on statute.

Since boards of supervisors are creatures of statute, their authority for doing any act must be sought in the statute.

3. Counties ⚡47—Statutory power of board of supervisors includes implied powers necessary to exercise powers expressly granted and not prohibited.

The statutory powers of board of supervisors include implied powers necessary to exercise the powers expressly granted and not expressly or impliedly prohibited.

4. Taxation ⚡319(2)—Presumed assessor will be guided by adjustments made by board of equalization, rather than by data upon which adjustments are based.

It will be presumed that the assessor in assessing property will be guided by the adjustments made by the board of supervisors sitting as a board of equalization, rather than by the data upon which such adjustments are based.

5. Counties ⚡113(6)—Officers ⚡100(1)—Contract of board of supervisors for timber cruise and survey to be used in equalizing property held not in excess of board's powers, and not to violate Constitution as to increasing assessor's compensation.

Contract of board of supervisors for a cruise and estimate of timber on certain patented lands and for topographical survey and report of such patented lands to enable board intelligently to perform duties as a board of equalization, held not to exceed board's powers conferred by Pol. Code, §§ 3672, 3673, 4041, subd. 15; and not to violate Const. art. 11, §§ 5, 9, by increasing assessor's compensation.

6. Counties ⚡126—Court may not question wisdom of authorized contract of board of supervisors.

When a board of supervisors enters into an authorized contract for services, the court may not question the wisdom of the contract with respect to compensation, in the absence of fraud or mistake.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Application for mandamus by H. D. Haley & Co. of California, a corporation, against N. G. McVay, as Auditor of the County of Del Norte. From a judgment denying a peremptory writ, petitioner appeals. Reversed, with directions.

R. L. Shinn, of Sacramento, and George W. Howe, of Crescent City, for appellant.

James Davis, of Crescent City, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The board of supervisors of Del Norte county, by unanimous vote of the members thereof, adopted the following resolution:

"It being deemed by this board of supervisors that a classification of the patented timber and other lands subject to assessment and taxation in Del Norte county is necessary in order to enable this board of supervisors to promptly perform its duties when sitting as a board of equalization, it is therefore ordered that the county of Del Norte this day enter into written agreements with H. D. Haley & Co. of Portland, Oregon, for the classification of such lands on the terms and conditions as set forth in said written agreements on file with this board which written agreements are hereby referred to, and considered a part of this order and motion; the chairman is authorized to sign for the board of supervisors of Del Norte county, Cal."

On the same day two contracts were duly executed, one providing for a "cruise and estimate of all timber on such patented lands * * * as shall be hereafter designated" by the board, and the other for the "classification, topographical survey, and report of such patented lands * * * as shall be hereafter designated" by the board.

The company performed services in accordance with the terms of both contracts, and its reports thereof "were used by such board as data for the equalization of taxes in said county, during the session of said board as a board of equalization in the month of July, 1923." The company filed claims for such services, which claims were duly allowed by the board. The contracting corpuration thereafter assigned such claims to the petitioner herein, a corporation organized under the laws of this state. The county auditor refused to issue his warrants for the claims so allowed, and this proceeding was then instituted to compel such issuance. The court granted an alternative writ of mandate, which was duly served upon the auditor. The auditor did not file an answer, but the district attorney appeared for him at the hearing and resisted the application. Evidence was introduced in support of the application, and, after argument by counsel for the respective parties, the court rendered judgment denying a peremptory writ. This appeal is from the judgment.

[1] The petition alleges that H. D. Haley & Co., the contracting corporation, is "a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Oregon." It is not alleged, nor was any proof offered to show, that such corporation had taken the required steps to authorize it to do business in this state. Section 1 of the Corporation License Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 371), as amended in 1921 (Stats. 1921, pp. 638, 640), after prescribing a fine to be imposed upon a foreign corporation for doing business in the state without complying with the statute, provides:

"In addition to the penalty herein provided every contract made by or on behalf of any such foreign corporation affecting the personal liability thereof or relating to property within the state shall be held void on its behalf and on behalf of its assigns, but shall be enforceable against it or them."

Respondent contends that the judgment must be affirmed because of the failure to allege and prove that the contracting corporation had complied with the statute. "An allegation of compliance with the statutory conditions for doing business is not necessary in a complaint by a foreign corporation. If it does not appear on the face of the complaint that plaintiff has not complied with the statute, such want of capacity to sue cannot be raised by demurrer." 7 Cal. Jur. 212; Redding, etc., Min. Co. v. Nat. Surety Co., 18 Cal. App. 488, 123 P. 544; Bernheim Distilling Co. v. Elmore, 12 Cal. App. 85, 106 P. 720; Lincoln County Bank v. Fetterman, 170 Cal. 357, 359, 149 P. 811; South Yuba Water, etc., Co. v. Rosa, 80 Cal. 333, 336, 22 P. 222. The statutory provisions under consideration in the foregoing cases did not declare a contract, executed by a foreign corporation without compliance with the statute, to be void as does the statute under discussion, but the underlying principle is the same. It is a disputable presumption "that the law has been obeyed." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 33. "Under some statutes prohibiting foreign corporations from doing business until they have complied with the requirements imposed by such statute, any contracts made without having complied with the statutory provisions are held to be absolutely void, and the statute is enforced no matter how harsh its provisions may be." Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) § 6707. "In actions by a foreign corporation that has complied with the statutory provisions for doing business it is not ordinarily necessary for it to allege in its complaint such compliance nor is it necessary to prove the same as a condition precedent to its right to sue. In an action by a foreign corporation to enforce a contract made with a domestic citizen, the presumption is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that it complied with the local laws giving it authority to enter into the contract." Id. § 6728. The foregoing rule is in accordance with the weight of authority. 14a C. J. 1358. Where a contrary rule is followed it has been held that unless the fact of the compliance of a foreign corporation with our state law is put in issue by a demurrer to the complaint, or by answer, it is waived. Valley Lumber, etc., Co. v. Driessel, 13 Idaho, 662, 93 P. 765, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 299, 13 Ann. Cas. 63, 68; Gem State Lumber Co. v. Sheldon, 38 Idaho, 651, 224 P. 79.

[2, 3] It is contended that the contracts are unauthorized by law and therefore void. One of the duties of boards of supervisors is "to equalize assessments." Pol. Code, § 4041, subd. 15.

"The board of supervisors of each county must meet on the first Monday of July in each year, to examine the assessment book and equalize the assessment of property in the county. It must continue in session for that purpose, from time to time, until the business of equalization is disposed of, but not later than the third Monday in July." Pol. Code, § 3672.

"The board has power, after giving notice in such manner as it may by rule prescribe, to increase or lower the entire assessment roll, or any assessment contained therein, so as to equalize the assessment of the property contained in said roll, and make the assessment conform to the true value of such property in money." Pol. Code, § 3673.

"Boards of supervisors are creatures of the statute, and the authority for any act on their part must be sought in the statute. But while their jurisdiction is confined within the statutory limits, still it includes not only the powers expressly enumerated, but also those implied powers which are necessary to the exercise of the powers expressly granted, except in the instances where such implied power is expressly or impliedly prohibited. In the exercise of their powers, supervisors are necessarily endowed with a large discretion." 7 Cal. Jur. 449.

"The board must be held to be invested with considerable discretionary power in determining what information is essential to its intelligent action, and in such matters the courts may not properly interfere unless it is apparent that the service contracted for has no possible relation whatever to a proper discharge of its functions." Skidmore v. West, 186 Cal. 212, 219, 199 P. 497, 500.

"The board of supervisors has a right to employ persons to assist in the performance of the duties that devolve upon the supervisors; for instance, to employ a superintendent of the county hospital and of the poor farm, and other persons, to enable them to discharge their many duties as supervisors, which it is not intended they should perform personally." Forward v. County of San Diego, 189 Cal. 704, 709, 209 P. 993, 995.

In Skidmore v. West, supra, it was held that the supervisors had power to employ persons to make "an examination of certain records in certain county offices, the state surveyor general's office, and the United States land office, with relation to the parcels of real estate sold to the state for taxes delinquent prior to the year 1912, which covered a period of many years, and a report thereon to the supervisors with their recommendations as to further disposition, accompanied by lists for authorization from the state controller for sale by the tax collector, * * * for the information of the board of supervisors, with a view to further proceedings by them."

In Maurer v. Weatherby, 1 Cal. App. 243, 81 P. 1083, the contract under consideration was the employment of the plaintiff by the city council of Eureka to furnish "an abstract of the assessment roll of the city of Eureka, with various comparisons with the county assessment roll of Humboldt county, Cal., and with maps, and other data and information, showing a gradual rise in such properties as may be deemed undervalued in their present assessed valuations. * * * These maps, data, and information are to be of such character as will aid the council, as such, and as sitting as a board of equalization, in equalizing the assessment roll and the taxation of the properties in the city of Eureka." The court, in holding the contract valid, said:

"Boards of equalization cannot increase an assessment unless they have evidence before them justifying such increase. Oakland v. Southern Pac. Co., 131 Cal. 230, 63 P. 371. When an assessment is too high the taxpayer may be depended upon to furnish the evidence upon which they may act in reducing it. But if there is an undervaluation, the assessor having recorded his best judgment on the face of the assessment roll, we have no doubt that the board may call to its aid such maps, abstracts, data, and information as will enable the members to act fairly, intelligently, and legally in equalizing assessments. They are not limited to information and data the assessor may be able or willing to furnish."

[4] Respondent relies upon the case of Forward v. County of San Diego, supra, which held invalid the provision of section 4041b of the Political Code, providing for the appointment by boards of supervisors of advisory boards to co-operate with county assessors in making annual appraisements of real property for taxation purposes. It was held that the effect of such appointment would be to increase the compensation of the county assessor after his election and during his term of office, contrary to section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution. It was also held that the statutory provision is violative of section 5 of the same article, in that it delegates to the supervisors the power to increase the compensation of the assessor at their discretion. The decision is inapplicable to the facts of the instant case. The data contracted to be furnished was for the purpose of enabling the supervisors intelligently to perform their duties as a board of equalization. It is true that the assessor may make use of such data in assessing property during succeeding years, but he may likewise make a similar use of any adjustment made by the board in the equalization of assessments, whatever the data may be upon which such adjustment may be made. It may be presumed that the assessor will be guided by the adjustments made by the board rather than by the data upon which such adjustments are based.

[5, 6] It must be held that the supervisors did not exceed their powers in entering into the contracts in question. As said in Skidmore v. West, supra, page 220 (199 P. 501):

"With the question of the wisdom of this contract in so far as the county was concerned, and especially with regard to the method and amount of compensation provided, the courts have nothing to do, in the absence of a claim of fraud or mistake. There is no pretense of any such claim in this matter. The question in this proceeding is simply one as to the power of the board."

All of the facts alleged in the petition were expressly admitted to be true by the respondent at the hearing, and his counsel stated: "The only question I am interested in is the question of law."

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of petitioner as prayed for in the petition.

CAFFARO et ux. v. ROMANI. (Civ. 4962.)

1. Limitation of actions ☞50(1)—Action on note held not barred by statute in view of automatic renewal clause.

Where note provided that "if not paid at maturity, it is hereby renewed from year to year at option of holders until paid," action thereon brought within eight years of original maturity held not barred by four-year statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 337).

2. Mortgages ☞315(2)—Marginal release on record of one county held not to release property in another.

Where note was secured by mortgage on property situated in two counties and recorded in both, release upon margin of record in one county reciting that mortgage was fully paid, held in view of Civ. Code, § 2938, not to effect release of property in other county.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Suit to foreclose mortgage by Louis Caffaro and wife against Albert Romani and another. From a deficiency judgment against him, named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Zagoren, of Sacramento, for appellant.

M. Martino and John L. McVey, both of Oakland, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant Albert Romani from a deficiency judgment against him in a suit to foreclose a mortgage upon certain real property in Alameda county. Romani borrowed money from the plaintiffs and as security executed his promissory note, dated April 16, 1913, and due in two years from date for $1,650, payable to plaintiffs. This note contained the following clause:

"If this note is not paid at maturity it is hereby renewed from year to year at the option of the holders until paid, and during such year the maker shall not have the right to pay the same."

This note was secured by a mortgage upon real property, some of which was situated in the county of Sacramento and some of which was situated in the county of Alameda, Cal. The mortgage was duly recorded in both these counties. On May 17, 1913, the plaintiffs signed the following release upon the margin of the records of Sacramento county:

"This mortgage is fully paid, satisfied, and discharged.
Louis Caffaro.

"Francesca Caffaro.

"Signed and acknowledged before me this 17th day of May, 1913.

"C. A. Root, County Recorder."

No release was recorded in the county of Alameda, and the property situated therein was transferred to W. D. McKoy in March, 1917. McKoy was made a defendant herein, but has not appealed from the judgment of foreclosure, and so there is no question before us as to the right of plaintiffs to subject the property in Alameda county to the payment of the debt. The appeal concerns itself merely with the deficiency judgment against Romani, who claims that as to him the debt is discharged and satisfied by the written release.

[1] The appeal presents two questions. The first contention of appellant is that the action is barred by section 337, Code of Civil Procedure. This is true, unquestionably, unless the clause above quoted, automatically renewing the note from year to year, prevents the statute from running. The only case which the parties have been able to present to the court which involves a similar provision in a note is the case of Kleinsorge v. Kleinsorge, 133 Cal. 412, 65 P. 876. In that case the validity and effect of the provision in question was not directly in issue, for the opinion states that it was conceded by appellant that it was competent for the parties to provide for a renewal of the note by its own terms. The court proceeds upon the assumption that a provision such as we have in the instant case automatically renewed the note from year to year, and, apparently, saw no objection to such provision or such effect, for the opinion states:

"The note was dated August 1, 1896, and was drawn payable one year after date. It was by its terms renewed for 1897, 1898, and from August 1, 1899."

By analogy, the note in the instant case became due April 16, 1915, and was, by its terms, renewed for 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919 and suit was brought upon it within four years from April 16, 1919.

Appellant contends that even though the note be construed as self-renewing, there should be some limit to the number of automatic renewals, and he cites the case of Wells Fargo v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669, 60 P. 439, 49 L. R. A. 647. We do not think this case supports the contention. It holds that no question of public policy is involved in the statute of limitations and the protection of said statute may be waived; that when such waiver occurs, it becomes an estoppel to plead the statute. The opinion mentions that some of the cases from other jurisdictions place a limit upon the time in which the waiver is effective, accepting the statutory period as a reasonable limitation. But in Wells Fargo v. Enright, supra, decision of that question is expressly withheld and the conclusion reached is based upon the fact that the action involved there was brought in time. So, in the instant case, it is unnecessary for us to announce any definite limitation upon the period for which the statute may be waived, for even though such period be measured by the period mentioned in the statute itself, this action is brought in time.

[2] The other question before us is as to the effect of the release upon the margin of the record in Sacramento county. Section 2938, Civil Code, provides:

"A recorded mortgage may be discharged by an entry in the margin of the record thereof, signed by the mortgagee, or his personal representative or assignee. * * *

The mortgage sought to be foreclosed in this case was a mortgage upon property in Alameda county and the only effective record thereof was the record in Alameda county, and no release appears upon that record in conformity with the code section above quoted, and we think such mortgage was not released by the marginal entry in Sacramento county. This conclusion also reaches the equity of the situation, for, by the testimony of the appellant himself, it appears that, by the marginal release in Sacramento county, the parties only intended to release the Sacramento property from the mortgage, because only $750 had been paid by the mortgagor, and the parties all understood that the balance was to remain a lien upon the property in Alameda county.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Carlo Colombo was convicted of unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquors, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Reversed, with directions.

J. B. Curtin, of Sonora, and A. S. Ormsby, of Martinez, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information filed in this case charged the defendant with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor on the 13th day of January, 1924. In a separate count it charged:

"That prior to the 13th day of January, 1924, to wit the 5th day of November, 1923, defendant above named was convicted in the justice's court of Fourth township, Tuolumne county, Cal., on a charge of unlawfully having and possessing intoxicating liquors, containing in excess of one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol, which was fit for use for beverage purposes, contrary to the provisions of the act commonly referred to as the Wright Act."

The information then concluded in the stereotyped language, "contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

The defendant entered a plea of not guilty and denied the prior conviction. The jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged, and found that the defendant had suffered a prior conviction of violation of the Wright Act. Stats. 1921, p. 79. This appeal is from the judgment entered on the verdict and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The sheriff of the county testified that on the 13th day of January, 1924, he went to defendant's hotel, armed with a search warrant, for the purpose of searching the premises for intoxicating liquors; that when he drove up in his automobile the defendant's wife "hollered Charley three times very loud, or Carlo; it sounded like Charley to me"; that the witness immediately ran to the kitchen and that about the time he arrived there the defendant "dumped some liquor into the sink from a coffee pot; that the witness saw the discoloration in the sink made by the liquor and stooped over the sink and smelled the liquor; that the defendant was very pale and washed the coffee pot with a dish rag; that when the witness turned away from the sink the defendant "turned to the stove and got a pitcher of hot water and flushed it into the sink, and he flushed this stuff out"; that the witness "had considerable experience in the smelling of alcoholic liquors" and "can determine from the smell of alcoholic liquors whether it is whisky, wine, or brandy"; that the liquor turned into the sink was "corn whisky"; that there was "just a small odor of liquor" in the coffee pot after it had been washed; that he made a thorough search of the premises, but found no other intoxicating liquor except a bottle in a guest's room. It is not claimed that this bottle of liquor was in defendant's possession. The defendant denied that he heard his wife call to him, or that he had any liquor in his possession or turned any into the sink. He also denied other parts of the sheriff's testimony which it is not material here to discuss.

The last witness produced by the people was the justice of the peace of Fourth township, who identified the record of the alleged prior conviction. The complaint in that action charged that the defendant, on the 1st day of November, 1923, "did then and there willfully and unlawfully have, possess, and have in his possession equipment, ingredients, and property designed and used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors for use for beverage purposes, said equipment consisting of a still with grain, mash, and container for the same." To this charge the defendant entered a plea of guilty on the 5th day of November, 1923. On the same day he was sentenced to pay a fine of $500, which he immediately paid.

[1-3] The defendant objected to the introduction of the record in evidence, on the ground that it showed a conviction of a different offense than that charged in the information. On motion of the district attorney, and over defendant's objection, the court then ordered the information amended by striking out the words thereof which are herein italicized. The record of the prior conviction was then admitted in evidence over defendant's objection.

Penal Code, section 1008 provides:

"An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney, without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court, where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant."

It is clear that the amendment here allowed prejudiced the substantial rights of the defendant. He had properly denied the prior conviction alleged in the information, because the allegation thereof in the original information was not true. When a defendant is arraigned on a charge containing an allegation of a prior conviction, he certainly is not called upon to state that he has suffered a prior conviction of an offense other than the one charged. At the beginning of the trial, the information was read to the jury, including the part relating to the prior conviction, and the record of the prior conviction actually suffered had been identified by the justice of the peace as an action "charging the defendant with a violation of the provisions of what we call the Wright Act" and offered in evidence prior to the amendment to the information. It must be presumed that the defendant would have admitted the prior conviction at his arraignment if it had been correctly charged. Section 1025 of the Penal Code provides that when a prior conviction is charged "in case the defendant pleads not guilty, and answers that he has suffered the previous conviction, the charge of the previous conviction must not be read to the jury, nor alluded to on the trial." Section 1093, subdivision 1, provides that in cases where the indictment or information "charges a previous conviction, and the defendant has confessed the same, the clerk in reading it shall omit therefrom all that relates to such previous conviction." In People v. Thomas, 110 Cal. 41, 44, 42 P. 456, it is said that the violation of the provisions of the foregoing sections of the Penal Code "was not only erroneous, but highly prejudicial to the defendant." The prejudice to the defendant's rights in this case is in no sense less than in the case cited.

[4] Had the amendment been made before trial, with the opportunity for defendant to admit the previous conviction, his rights would not have been prejudiced thereby, and it will be sufficient to give him such opportunity before the retrial of the case. While the charge of the prior conviction is not well expressed, as the information now reads, there is no doubt as to what is intended. "It is not necessary to allege previous convictions with the same particularity as if the party was charged originally with the commission of such offense." 31 C. J. 735. In State v. Gilfilen, 124 Wash. 434, 214 P. 831, the defendant was charged with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and with "having heretofore been twice convicted of a violation of the liquor laws of the state of Washington," giving the dates of such convictions and the court in which they were had. This was held a sufficient charge of the prior convictions. Section 969 of the Penal Code provides that a previous conviction of a felony may be charged by stating:

"That the defendant, before the commission of the offense charged in this indictment or information, was in [giving the title of the court in which the conviction was had] convicted of a felony."

In Alzheimer v. State, 165 Wis. 646, 163 N. W. 255, it is said that the prior conviction "must be alleged in the information, and if not so alleged when it is filed it may be amended on leave of court."

[5] Appellant contends that the admission of testimony to the effect that the defendant's wife warned him of the approach of the sheriff was violative of the statutory provision prohibiting a husband or wife from being examined for or against the other without the other's consent. Code Civ. Proc., § 1881, subd. 1; Pen. Code, § 1322. It is clear that the sections cited have no application. Her warning, if given, was not in the nature of an admission of anything that her husband had done, and the testimony relative thereto was not introduced as an admission by her. Such evidence was admissible only because the defendant acted upon the warning in endeavoring to dispose of the liquor alleged to have been in his possession.

[6, 7] Appellant urges that there is no evidence of the character of the alleged liquor except the smell thereof and that hence it is insufficient. The Attorney General well says:

"Smell is one of the senses by which a human being receives and records facts, the same as sight, touch, hearing and taste. It is as accurate as any of the senses. * * * It is within the common knowledge of all that the sense of taste depends to a great extent upon the sense of smell. This fact is established by the well known fact that if the nose is held, there are many materials which the sense of taste cannot distinguish."

It is not necessary, however, to decide whether the sense of smell is sufficient to determine the character of liquors. In addition to such evidence, the jury had the right to consider the defendant's actions with relation to the warning given him, including his pale face and his act of flushing out the sink. The sheriff also testified that he observed the color of the liquor. All of this evidence, considered together, was sufficient to justify the verdict. The question for the jury to determine was one of fact upon which their verdict is conclusive on appeal. While no case has been discovered which holds that the smell of a liquor is or is not sufficient evidence of its character to justify a conviction, it has been held that a witness may testify as to the character of a liquor from its color, taste or smell. United States v. Borkowski (D. C.) 268 F. 408; Finch v. State, 120 Ga. 174, 47 S. E. 504; Rush v. State, 47 S. W. 585, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 673; Nixon v. State, 92 Neb. 115, 138 N. W. 136; Munn v. State, 5 Okl. Cr. 245, 114 P. 272; Whitten v. State, 95 Tex. Cr. R. 42, 252 S. W. 526; Berry v. State, 83 Tex. Cr. R. 210, 203 S. W. 901; Glasscock v. State, (Tex. Cr. App.) 43 S. W. 989.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to permit the defendant to answer whether or not he suffered the alleged previous conviction.

MORTON v. KOHLER & CHASE.
(Civ. 5001.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 31, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 26, 1925.)

1. Sales — § 359(1) — Evidence held to sustain recovery for purchase price of piano.

In action by plaintiff to recover purchase price of piano, alleged to have been purchased by defendant to whom it had been sent for repairs, evidence held to sustain finding for plaintiff.

2. Frauds, statute of — § 90(2) — Purchase of piano by defendant to whom it was sent for repairs constituted delivery, taking sale out of operation of statute.

Where defendant to whom plaintiff's piano was sent for repairs, after completing repair work, purchased such piano from plaintiff, defendant's possession changed to that of owner, and such change constituted a delivery of the piano, taking sale out of operation of statute.

3. Principal and agent — § 103(2) — Salesman held to have ostensible authority to purchase piano.

A piano salesman, placed in defendant's store for purpose of dealing with customers in regard to pianos, had ostensible authority to purchase from plaintiff piano sent there for repairs, on which authority plaintiff was entitled to rely.

4. Principal and agent ⇨171(5)—One retaining benefits of transaction by agent bound, regardless of authority.

Where defendant's salesman purchased from plaintiff a piano sent there for repairs, and defendant retained piano and refused to return it or proceeds thereof, it is bound by such purchase, regardless of authority of salesman making sale.

5. Appeal and error ⇨931(1), 1024(4)—Where affidavits conflicting, trial court's determination conclusive, and presumed that conflict resolved in favor of prevailing party.

Where affidavits on motion to vacate judgment were conflicting, and they contained the only evidence upon the subject in record, appellate court is bound by determination of trial court, and must assume that conflict was resolved in favor of prevailing party.

6. Trial ⇨6(1)—Where plaintiff not given notice of substitution of defendant's attorneys, service of notice of trial on attorneys previously acting for defendant was sufficient.

Where substitution of attorneys for defendant was made without giving written notice thereof to plaintiff or her attorneys, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 285, plaintiff's attorneys, in giving notice of time of trial to attorneys who were acting for defendant until substitution, fulfilled their legal obligation in view of their lack of notice of substitution.

7. Costs ⇨260(4)—Penalty attached where appeal frivolous and for purpose of delay.

Where defendant had no defense whatever, and appeal is extremely frivolous and was taken for delay, a penalty will be taxed against defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Cora Wallace Morton against Kohler & Chase. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. C. Ringole, of San Francisco (Samuel Hamburg, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the defendant from a judgment against it for $900, the alleged purchase price of a piano.

It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment, and the findings are contrary to the evidence. This point is clearly without merit. The trial court found that on April 13, 1921, the defendant purchased from the plaintiff a Steinway Grand piano for $900, which was on said day delivered to defendant, and defendant agreed to pay the purchase price thereof, but refused to do so notwithstanding plaintiff's demand for said sum. The record contains the testimony of the plaintiff that prior to April 13, 1921, the piano in question had been delivered to the defendant for the purpose of having it polished and repaired; that on April 13, 1921, plaintiff called at the place of business of defendant. There she talked with Mr. Zeidler, Mr. Ostler, and Mr. Fleischman, persons employed by defendant. Mr. Zeidler was an agent for defendant in the piano department. Plaintiff was also introduced to Mr. Chase by Mr. Fleischman, and this is what occurred:

"They wanted to know if I would like to sell it (the piano). I had always felt as though I would like a smaller Grand, but they said, 'If you will give it to us, we will sell it, and we think we can get a good price for it.' After thinking it over, and it being in good order, I said I would take $900 for it, and then after they had that, young Mr. Zeidler came and asked me to sign a paper."

A copy of the writing which plaintiff signed at that time was introduced in evidence, and read as follows:

"Kohler & Chase. Established 1850. April 13, 1921. For value received, I hereby sell, set over and assign all my right, title and interest in one Steinway grand piano No. —, to Kohler & Chase. I hereby certify that the above instrument is my property and free of all encumbrances. Title guaranteed. [Signed] Cora Wallace Morton. Witness: J. Crimen Zeidler."

Plaintiff testified that she never received any money for the piano, and that defendant never offered to return the instrument.

[1, 2] The foregoing, standing in the record uncontradicted, is sufficient evidence upon which to base the findings and judgment of the court. There is no occasion to discuss at length appellant's position that a memorandum of the essential terms of the contract should have been in writing, and that the sale was not taken out of the operation of the statute of frauds by delivery of the property, because the property was delivered to defendant for the purpose of repair, and not in fulfillment of a contract of sale. The piano was originally delivered to defendant for the purpose of repair, but the repair work had been completed when the contract was made on April 13, 1921, and the bill of sale was signed. At that time defendant's possession changed to the possession of an owner. The situation does not differ in principle from a case where the person engaged to do the repairing was a third person, and after the repairs were completed, the piano had been delivered by the repair man to the vendee of the plaintiff.

[3, 4] The argument that plaintiff was required to prove the actual authority of the piano salesman to make the contract for the defendant is also without merit. The persons with whom plaintiff dealt were placed in the store of defendant for the purpose of dealing with customers in regard to pianos. They certainly had ostensible authority, upon which the plaintiff was entitled to rely. Defendant is contending for a rule which would seriously embarrass it in the conduct of its business, for if each person who deals with the Kohler & Chase Company must pause and ascertain the exact scope of the authority of the salesman negotiating the transaction, we apprehend that the trouble and uncertainty involved will cause a material decrease in the number of such transactions. But quite apart from the question of the authority of its agents, the defendant has received and retained the piano and refused to return the same or the proceeds thereof to the plaintiff, and it is bound, therefore, by the contract regardless of the authority of the agent making the same.

[5] The last argument made upon appeal is that no notice of the time of trial was served upon the attorney for the defendant five days before the time of trial, and that, therefore, the court was without jurisdiction to proceed with the trial. This point was raised by defendant upon a motion for an order vacating the judgment. Upon that motion, there was some conflict in the affidavits filed, and they contain the only evidence upon this subject in the record. We are bound by the determination of the trial court upon this question, which was against the defendant, so we must assume that all conflicts in the affidavits were resolved in favor of the plaintiff. In the light of this assumption we state the facts with reference to the matter to be: That on May 10, 1922, the defendant answered the complaint herein by and through its attorneys, Messrs. Roche and Ibos. That on September 1, 1922, the plaintiff, after giving due notice to said attorneys for defendant, moved to set the cause for trial. The cause was placed upon the reserve calendar of department 14 of the superior court, and, thereafter, on September 30, 1922, the court of its own motion fixed February 20, 1923, as the day for the trial of the action. That thereafter, on October 3, 1922, the plaintiff, through her attorneys, duly served upon the said attorneys for defendant written notice that the trial of said action was set for February 20, 1923, and the said attorneys for defendant made a written admission of service of said notice, which was duly filed on October 5, 1923. That on February 20, 1923, when said cause came on for trial, said defendant requested a continuance, and, in response to said request, and over the objection of plaintiff, the court placed the cause upon the reserve calendar, to be reset later. That on said 20th day of February, 1923, G. C. Ringole appeared in the superior court when the action was called for trial, and stated to the court that he had been called into the case, and that he desired more time to prepare for the trial, and that a continuance was had upon this statement. That the said Roche and Ibos continued to be and were the attorneys of record for the said defendant in said action, and that the attorneys for the plaintiff had no notice or knowledge of any substitution of attorneys, but were led to believe from the statements of said G. C. Ringole that he would either be associated with the said Roche and Ibos or would be substituted thereafter as an attorney for the defendant. That no notice of substitution of attorneys was ever at any time served upon the plaintiff or her attorneys in said action, and that neither the plaintiff nor her attorneys had any notice of the filing of any such substitution, or of the fact that said G. C. Ringole had been substituted as attorney for defendant until September 5, 1923. That on March 17, 1923, the court of its own motion set the case for trial on June 11, 1923, but on that day it was again placed upon the reserve calendar, because there were many cases ahead of it on the calendar. That thereafter the clerk of the superior court notified the attorneys for the respective parties, by mail, to appear in the court on June 21, 1923, and on said 21st day of June the court set the case for trial on September 5, 1923. That on August 28, 1923, the attorneys for the plaintiff duly served upon Messrs. Roche and Ibos, as attorneys for defendant, written notice that the trial of said action was set for September 5, 1923, and said Roche and Ibos admitted service of said notice in writing, as attorneys for defendant, and said attorneys did not then nor at any time inform plaintiff or her attorneys that any one had been substituted in their place and stead as attorneys for defendant. That said last-mentioned notice was filed in the office of the clerk of said court on the 29th day of August, 1923, and on said last-named day the clerk in the office of the attorneys for plaintiff met G. C. Ringole in the city hall in San Francisco, Cal., and stated to him that said action would come on for trial on September 5, and that notice of said trial had been served on Roche and Ibos, and that said G. C. Ringole actually knew, at least as early as August 29, 1923, that the trial of said action had been set for September 5, 1923. That at the time of trial plaintiff appeared in court by her attorneys, and defendant appeared by Frederick Dubovsky, an attorney at law, who stated that he was associated with Mr. G. C. Ringole, and further stated that the defendant was not ready to proceed with the trial, and asked the court to continue the trial. That no showing was at that time made as to why the defendant was not ready to proceed with the trial, and the court informed the said Frederick Dubovsky that it would allow him time to communicate with Mr. G. C. Ringole and with the defendant, in order to bring them into court if they desired to come, and instructed the said Frederick Dubovsky to retire and so communicate with them, and to report to the court. That thereupon said Dubovsky retired from the courtroom, and shortly afterwards returned and stated that he had communicated with Mr. G. C. Ringole, but that Mr. Ringole was not ready to proceed with the trial. That thereupon the court stated that the trial of said action would have to go on, and that thereupon said action was duly and fully tried in open court.

It seems almost idle to recite all the foregoing details with reference to the setting of the cause for trial, for the reason that the attorneys for the plaintiff were bound by law to recognize Messrs. Roche and Ibos until they received written notice of a substitution of attorneys. Section 285, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

"When an attorney is changed, as provided in the last section, written notice of the change and of the substitution of a new attorney, or of the appearance of the party in person, must be given to the adverse party. Until then he must recognize the former attorney."

[6] It is admitted by appellant that no written notice of substitution of attorneys was ever served upon the plaintiff or her attorneys. It appears, therefore, that the attorneys for the plaintiff, in giving the notice of time of trial to Messrs. Roche and Ibos, fulfilled their legal obligation, and the error is Mr. Ringole's in omitting to serve a notice of substitution upon the adverse party.

Our statement of facts has been unduly extended to demonstrate, not only the fallacy of Mr. Ringole's position as a matter of law, but that, as a matter of fact, he was not even prejudiced by his own omission to serve the notice of substitution, for he had actual notice of the time of trial and appeared by his associate. This additional fact has some bearing upon the question of the good faith of this appeal.

[7] This matter has been in the courts now for almost three years, during which time the plaintiff has been kept out of the purchase price of her property by a defendant who, apparently, had no defense whatever to offer to her action. The appeal is extremely frivolous, and can only have been taken for delay.

The judgment is affirmed with the addition of $100 penalty to be taxed as costs against the appellant.

4. Criminal law §37—One willingly complying with request of others to purchase liquor and carrying out criminal purpose of his own cannot set up defense of entrapment.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by Frank Moore. Denied.

Fred Forgy, of Berkeley, for petitioner.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioner from detention, after a preliminary examination in the justice's court upon a complaint charging him with the crime of selling intoxicating liquor, in violation of what is generally known as the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79). Petitioner was bound over to the superior court for Orange county, and he now seeks his discharge upon the ground that the order holding him to answer was made without reasonable or probable cause.

The testimony, as set out in the transcript, shows substantially the following: On November 13, 1924, the date of the alleged offense, the prosecuting witnesses, two men employed as "investigators" by an organization styling itself the Anti-Saloon League, met petitioner at a pool hall in Huntington Beach. Two days previously these self-constituted "investigators," endeavoring to ascertain what places there were in Orange county where intoxicating liquors were being sold, sought an introduction to petitioner through an employee of the pool hall. Upon that occasion the prosecuting witnesses asked petitioner if he could get them some liquor. Though he replied that he could get it for them, no attempt seems to have been made by petitioner at that time to procure any intoxicants for his newly made acquaintances. Two days later, November 13, 1924, the date laid in the complaint filed against petitioner, he and the two "investigators" again met at the poolroom. Upon that occasion the Anti-Saloon League representatives asked petitioner if he could get them two bottles of whisky. In reply petitioner said that he did not know whether he could or not, but that he would try and see if he could get it. He told the "investigators" that the cost was $3 a pint. Thereupon one of the men gave petitioner the sum of $6. Petitioner then left the pool room, ostensibly for the purpose of getting the whisky. Returning in about 10 minutes without any liquor, he asked one of

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 31, 1924.)

1. Habeas corpus §85(1)—Evidence held sufficient to show probable cause for believing petitioner guilty of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor.

Evidence, if insufficient to show probable cause for believing petitioner guilty of selling liquor, for which offense he was bound over to superior court, held sufficient to show probable cause for believing him guilty of possessing it unlawfully.

2. Habeas corpus §111(1)—Where evidence shows probable cause to believe accused guilty of any offense he will not be discharged.

Where evidence before committing magistrate shows probable cause to believe accused guilty of any offense, though it be an offense other than one for which he was held to answer, he will not be discharged upon habeas corpus until opportunity is afforded to cause correct charge to be preferred against him.

3. Habeas corpus §111(1)—Where evidence sufficient to show guilt of possessing liquor accused will not be released on habeas corpus.

Where evidence fails to establish probable cause for believing accused guilty of selling liquor unlawfully, for which crime he was held to answer, but was sufficient to show probable cause for believing him guilty of possessing liquor, he will not be discharged on habeas corpus, but held in custody until authorities have the prosecuting witnesses if the latter had a "car." Upon receiving an answer in the affirmative, petitioner said that they would drive to a certain place. Guided by petitioner, he and one of the "investigators" drove to a hotel in Huntington Beach. There petitioner left the automobile, climbed a stairway leading to the hotel and was gone about 5 minutes, when he returned to the vehicle and said, "They haven't any either. This is the first time I ever went in there that I never got any liquor." Under petitioner's direction he and his companion then drove to a place in Huntington Beach known as "Brownings," but found no one there. They then parked the car at a place near by. Petitioner left the vehicle and was gone about 15 minutes, when he returned and said, "No, they have got none." The two men then drove to an appointed place where they picked up the other "investigator." Still guided by petitioner, the three men then drove to a Mr. Bickmore's place in Westminster. Petitioner told his two companions that he was quite sure that he could get some liquor at Bickmore's—that "he had never failed there." When they arrived at Bickmore's place petitioner left the car, went into Bickmore's home and in about 15 minutes returned with two bottles of whisky, which he delivered to one of the prosecuting witnesses—the one from whom he had received the $6 at the beginning of their quest.

Petitioner's contentions are: (1) That there is no evidence that he "sold" any whisky; that the testimony shows merely that he acted as the agent for the two "investigators" in the purchase of the liquor, and that under the Volstead Act (Comp. St. Ann. Supp. U. S. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.) the "penal provisions" of which are adopted by the Wright Act, the purchase of liquor is not a crime—citing Singer v. United States (C. C. A.) 278 F. 415, where the court says: "It is a crime to sell, but not a crime to purchase." (2) That if he committed any offense he was inveigled into it by the "investigators," who paid him the money with which to make the purchase.

If petitioner were entitled to a discharge merely upon a showing that the evidence is insufficient to make out a case of probable cause for believing him guilty of the specific crime for which he was held to answer—the crime of "selling" intoxicating liquor—we should entertain grave doubt as to the legality of his imprisonment. Many cases are to be found in the books, to the effect that if a defendant is in no way interested on behalf of the seller, but simply acts as agent of the prosecutor, he is not guilty of making a sale. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, having under consideration a state of facts somewhat similar to that presented here, held that the evidence disclosed a case of agency in the purchase of the liquor and not a "sale" by the accused. Givens v. State, 49 Tex. Cr. R. 267, 91 S. W. 1090. On the other hand, the Supreme Court of Georgia and the Court of Appeals of that state have held that if it be shown that the accused received money from another person, accompanied with a request to procure intoxicating liquor for the latter, and that shortly thereafter the accused delivered the liquor to the person by whom he was given the money, a prima facie case of a sale by the accused is made out, the onus is put upon him to explain where, how, and from whom he received the liquor, and to escape criminal responsibility for making a sale he must satisfy the jury that he did not induce the transaction, that he had no profits in it, that he was not an agent of the seller, and that he acted solely as agent for the purchaser. Mack v. State, 116 Ga. 546, 42 S. E. 776; Highsmith v. City of Waycross, 7 Ga. App. 611, 67 S. E. 677; Plummer v. State, 8 Ga. App. 379, 69 S. E. 28.

[1-3] However, we do not find it necessary in this case to determine whether the evidence is sufficient to show probable cause for believing petitioner guilty of selling the liquor, for it unquestionably suffices to show probable cause for believing him guilty of possessing it unlawfully. "Possession," says the court in Beyer v. United States (C. C. A.) 282 F. 226, "is a crime separate and distinct from the crime of the sale of liquor." In title 2, § 3 (section 10138½aa) of the National Prohibition Law, it is expressly declared that "no person shall * * * possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act." Possession, therefore, except as authorized by the Volstead Act, is one of the acts which the Wright Act, by its adoption of the "penal provisions" of the federal statute, denounces as a criminal offense. It is the established rule in this state that where the evidence before the committing magistrate shows probable cause to believe the accused guilty of any criminal offense, though it be an offense other than the one for which he was held to answer, it is not proper to discharge him upon habeas corpus until the proper authorities have had an opportunity to cause the correct charge to be preferred against him. Ex parte Keil, 85 Cal. 309; Ex parte Nicholas, 91 Cal. 640; In re Severin, 188 Cal. 348. Therefore, if it be assumed that the evidence fails to establish probable cause for believing petitioner guilty of the crime of selling liquor unlawfully, he nevertheless should be held in custody until such time as the authorities may have an opportunity to proceed against him for unlawfully having the whisky in his possession.

[4] We do not find any merit in petitioner's second point. It may be conceded that it would be violative of sound public policy and repugnant to good morals to uphold the conviction of a person who, being entirely innocent of any intention to commit a crime, was inveigled into its commission by an officer of the law or by a private detective hired for that purpose by some self-constituted guardian of the public morals. People v. Barkdoll, 36 Cal. App. 25. The rule that private detectives, as well as officers of the law, are not permitted to generate in the mind of a person, who is wholly innocent of any criminal purpose, the original intent to commit criminal acts which that person would not have committed or even have contemplated, but for such inducement, and that convictions based upon such conduct will not be permitted to stand, is a wholesome and salutary rule and should be enforced. But it has no application to the facts of this case. Here the facts and circumstances surrounding the transactions testified to by the witnesses before the committing magistrate are abundantly sufficient to warrant the inference that petitioner not only was willing to comply with the request that he procure the whisky, but that he had a strong personal predilection to obtain the liquor for his new-found friends. His whole course of conduct, and particularly his statements to the "investigators," such, for example, as his statement that never before had he failed to secure liquor at one of the places visited by them, fully justifies the inference that his criminal purpose to procure the whisky from some one known to him to be a vendor of intoxicating liquors took ready root in his mind, not as one passively yielding to the inducements of another, but as a willing, active, and enthusiastic co-operator in the proposed plan to secure liquor, thinking, possibly, that thereby he might attain to "an airy scene of transitory joys." It may well be inferred, therefore, that petitioner, when complying with the request that he procure the drink, was but voluntarily and intentionally carrying out a criminal purpose of his own. The law of "entrapment" is stated in a recent Idaho case as follows:

"Entrapment into the commission of a crime is not a defense in the sense of a justification or excuse for an act which otherwise would be criminal, but it resolves itself into a question of whether the accused committed any crime. If the criminal design originated with him, or if he intentionally committed or carried out his own criminal purpose, whether it originated with him or not, at the suggestion of another person, the fact that some one other than the accused facilitated the execution of the scheme, or that an officer appeared to co-operate with him, will not be a defense." State v. Mantis, 32 Idaho, 724, 187 P. 268.

It was held in State v. Lucas, 94 Mo. App. 117, 67 S. W. 971, that the fact that the prosecuting witnesses were furnished the money by citizens for the purpose of buying whisky at a particular drug store with a view to prosecuting the seller, and that each bought the whisky with the money so furnished, is no defense. See, also, State v. O'Brien, 35 Mont. 482, 90 P. 514, 10 Ann. Cas. 1006.

The writ is denied.

Where suspension of subordinate officer or employee for certain causes is authorized, but notice to him is not required, it is sufficient if legal cause exists in fact, and such cause need not be specified in order of suspension; hence suspension of police officer under Charter of City of Oakland, § 81, was not invalid, though notice of suspension stated no grounds therefor.

4. Evidence ☞83(2) —Suspension of police officer presumed legal.

Where suspended police officer of city of Oakland did not avail himself of right, under sections 81, 82, of Charter, to full hearing, it must be presumed that chief of police and commissioner performed their duties and that suspension was regularly made.

5. Municipal corporations ☞186(4)—Police-man not entitled to compensation while lawfully suspended.

Police officer lawfully suspended is not entitled on reinstatement to compensation during period of suspension.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action for mandamus by Charles F. Nightingale against Harry G. Williams, as Auditor of the City of Oakland. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Crosby, Naus & Crosby, of Oakland, for appellant.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Bestor Robinson, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff commenced this action in mandamus in the superior court of Alameda county to compel the defendant, as auditor of the city of Oakland, to draw and sign his warrant upon the treasury of that city for the amount of his salary as a member of the municipal police department during the period of his suspension from that office. The facts of the case briefly are that on July 11, 1921, the plaintiff, while a member of such police department, shot and killed one Joseph Suppro. He was immediately accused of murder and was arrested upon that charge. The chief of the police department, in pursuance to the authority given him by the municipal charter, suspended the plaintiff pending further investigation. The chief gave plaintiff due notice of this suspension and within due time reported the facts in writing to the commissioner of public health and safety, as required by the charter, and said commissioner in due time certified the fact of petitioner's suspension to the civil service board. The action of the chief of police was followed by a suspension of the plaintiff by the commissioner. From the date of his suspension until January 4, 1922, the plaintiff did not report for duty nor perform any services of the office of patrolman; did not protest to any of his superiors that his suspension was illegal and did not demand his salary for the period for which he was suspended. On January 3, 1922, the appellant was acquitted by a jury of the charge of murder and was immediately thereafter reinstated to his position in the police department. He thereafter demanded his salary for the period of his suspension, and this demand was refused by the auditor. The demand was thereafter presented to the city council, which, without a hearing of any kind, approved the claim by a four-fifths vote and ordered the auditor to draw his warrant therefor. The auditor again refused the claim, and this action results from such refusal. After a trial upon the merits, the trial court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. From this judgment and from the order denying plaintiff's motion for judgment on the findings, the plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll and on a bill of exceptions.

It is unnecessary to consider the various motions which the appellant made during the course of the proceedings or to give particular consideration to the second appeal, because the allegations of the answer relating to the suspension of the appellant and his acquiescence therein raised an issue of both law and fact which the trial court was required to determine, and this was sufficient to support the order of the trial court denying appellant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, as well as the order on demurrer to the answer and the motion made after judgment.

The point upon which appellant bases main reliance is that the approval of the claim by the city council forecloses all inquiry by the auditor, as well as by the courts, concerning the validity of the claim. In this connection appellant insists that the rule of Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139 Cal. 432, 73 P. 189, compels us to hold with him on this point. The rule to which counsel refers is not the real rule of the case cited. The language which he quotes is from the minority opinion which rests on the doctrine of estoppel found in Argenti v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 255, 265. This doctrine—that a public corporation may not refuse payment of a claim for service received on the ground that the claim was not incurred in a legal manner—was expressly rejected by the Supreme Court in Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96, and, in the Contra Costa Case, four of the members of the court refused to follow the doctrine and refused to concur in the opinion from which counsel quotes. The majority of the court in the latter case issued the mandamus on the ground that the claim was legally incurred and that the resistance of the auditor had no legal support. The only rule which can be taken from the opinions of the majority of the court in the Contra Costa Case applicable to this appeal is that the court will in mandamus determine the legality of the claim when resisted by the auditor and that the approval of the council after rejection by the auditor does not preclude the latter from raising the question of its invalidity.

All our authorities following the Contra Costa Case are in harmony with this view. See Biggart v. Lewis, 183 Cal. 660, 672, 192 P. 437; Hammel v. Neylan, 31 Cal. App. 21, 25, 159 P. 618; Dufton v. Daniels, 190 Cal. 577, 581, 213 P. 949; Clinton Construction Co. of California v. Clay, 34 Cal. App. 625, 628, 168 P. 588.

[1] The rule which we draw from the authorities is that when a claim against a public corporation is approved by the duly constituted approving body, the courts may examine into the legality of the claim to see whether it is one which such body had authority to approve; but when the action of the approving body depends upon its determination of a question of fact, such determination is conclusive. To illustrate the rule: If a claim based upon a contract for the performance of some service for a municipality is resisted on the grounds that the contract was invalid and that the work was not properly performed, the council has the authority (sometimes called jurisdiction) to pass upon both grounds when the claim is presented for final approval. The determination of the council on the question of the performance of the work is a determination of an issue of fact, which, if the legal mode of procedure has been followed, will be taken as conclusive by the courts. But its determination of the question of the validity of the contract is but a conclusion of law which is open to review in any proper proceeding.

We have not found anything to the contrary in Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, but if that case is authority for the proposition to which it is cited by appellant, that the approval by the council is conclusive on questions of both law and fact, then the case must be held to have been overruled to that extent by the later rulings of our Supreme Court. The last expression of that court is found in Dufton v. Daniels, 190 Cal. 577, 580, 213 P. 949, 950, where it is said:

"The fact that the board of control in auditing claims against the state acts in a sense judicially does not preclude the issuance of a writ of mandate to control its action, where, as here, the facts are all admitted and are susceptible to but one construction. (Citing cases.) * * * It may be conceded for the purposes hereof that if there had been a disputed question of fact determined by the board upon conflicting evidence its finding thereon would be conclusive, but such is clearly not the case here." (Emphasis ours.)

[2] In view of these authorities, it necessarily follows that the trial court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the issue whether as a matter of law the claim was a legal obligation against the city. In this determination two questions of law are involved—whether the appellant was legally suspended from his office, and whether a suspended officer is entitled to the salary attached to the office during the period of suspension.

[3] On the first point the fact of suspension is conceded. The only attack on the legality of the suspension is that the appellant was not given legal notice thereof and that legal grounds therefor were not stated in the report of the chief to his superior. The appellant argues that as the notice of suspension stated that he was suspended pending further investigation, this must be deemed to be the sole ground or cause of the suspension. But this language refers to the period rather than the ground of the suspension and merely indicates that the action was temporary or for an indefinite time. Section 81 of the Oakland Charter authorizes any chief official to suspend a subordinate for incompetency, neglect of duty, or disobedience of orders, and requires such official to "report the facts" in writing to the commissioner of his department and furnish a copy "of the report" to the suspended official upon his request therefor. If the one suspended demands it, the commissioner must hold a hearing and affirm or revoke the suspension.

The appellant was suspended by the chief of police, the officer authorized by this section. The facts were reported to the commissioner as required, but the appellant did not request a copy of the report and did not demand a hearing before the commissioner. The trial court found that the appellant was legally suspended and that, in addition thereto, he acquiesced in said suspension from the day it was made until January 4, 1922, and during that time never reported for duty, performed any service pertaining to his office, protested to his superiors, or demanded payment of his salary. The evidence fully supports these findings, but the appellant insists that the finding of legal suspension is wrong because the notice of suspension did not state the grounds therefor. The answer is that the charter does not require it to do so. As the mode prescribed in the charter is the measure of the power of the city authorities respecting the suspension of a subordinate, so is it the measure of the right of the subordinate to demand action on the part of his superior. The general and universal rule is that a subordinate officer or employee who has no fixed term of office may be suspended or removed at the pleasure of his superior or appointing officer. This power has been generally limited in respect to municipal and state officers or employees under various civil service laws. Where such laws place restrictions upon the power of suspension or removal, the authority of the superior is to that extent curtailed; but it is not necessary that he should do more than the law limiting his authority requires. Thus, where a suspension may be made for certain causes but notice thereof is not required to be given to the subordinate, it is sufficient if the legal causes exist in fact and it is not necessary to specify such causes in the order of suspension.

Two cases are discussed in the briefs as bearing upon this question, Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 316, 74 P. 997, and Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 197, 116 P. 732. The first involved an interpretation of the charter of the city of San Diego which authorized the mayor to remove certain officers and required him "in case of such removal" to give "written notice thereof stating the cause to the person removed." The Supreme Court held that as the charter required the notice to be given to the "person removed," the act of removal was not judicial and the court could not inquire into the sufficiency of the cause assigned. The Bannerman Case involved an interpretation of the San Francisco charter which provided that certain officers might be "removed by the mayor for cause." The Supreme Court held that the words "for cause," without qualification, meant legal cause, and that the power to remove was thus limited to a showing of good cause proved upon a hearing after reasonable notice.

The provisions of the Oakland charter providing for the suspension of a subordinate and a subsequent hearing by the commissioner are similar to those of the San Diego charter considered in the Carter Case, in that the suspended official is not entitled to a notice and hearing before suspension, and therefore the court in this proceeding is not concerned with the sufficiency of the cause of the suspension.

[4] In passing, it should be pointed out that the suspended official is not deprived of his remedy by this interpretation of the charter. Section 81 of the charter authorizes the person suspended to demand and receive a full hearing before the commissioner if he is dissatisfied with the order of suspension, and section 82 provides for an appeal and hearing before the civil service board after decision by the commissioner. In both instances the person suspended would be entitled to question the sufficiency of the grounds for his suspension and could demand a full hearing. In the absence of any proceedings of this nature, we must presume that the chief of police, as well as the commissioner, duly performed their respective duties and that the suspension was regularly made.

In addition to this, the trial court found that the appellant had acquiesced in his suspension. The evidence in support of this finding is that he made no protest to any officer that his suspension was illegal; he did not follow any of the remedies provided in the charter for relief; he did not report for duty or offer to perform any official service; he did not demand any salary for the period of his suspension until he was restored to duty, but accepted without protest the voucher of his July salary up to the day of his suspension.

[5] The next question which presents itself is whether a suspended official, who does not directly attack, but who acquiesces in, the order of suspension, is entitled to the compensation attached to his office during the period of suspension. The weight of authority supports the conclusion of the trial court that the appellant was not entitled to his salary during such period. 19 R. C. L., 941; Hagan v. City of Brooklyn, 126 N. Y. 643, 27 N. E. 265; Byrnes v. City of St. Paul, 78 Minn. 205, 80 N. W. 959, 79 Am. St. Rep. 384; Cote v. Biddeford, 96 Me. 484, 52 A. 1019, 1020, 90 Am. St. Rep. 417. The appellant has not questioned this rule of law and has not raised any point on the ruling of the trial court that he was not entitled to his salary if lawfully suspended. His point is that he was unlawfully suspended and that for that reason he was entitled to his compensation. If the suspension had been unlawful, his right to the salary would not be open to question. O'Neill v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 1, 3, 199 P. 870. As the suspension was lawful and the appellant for that reason was not entitled to his salary, it follows that his claim for such salary was not a lawful claim against the city and the council was without authority to order it paid.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by Peter A. Farley against R. A. Stirling, J. B. Hickman, Horticultural Commissioner of Monterey County, and others.

Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Hall, of Hemet, for appellant.
Albert Warth and Chas. B. Rosendale, both of Salinas, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. An appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendants, in an action brought by plaintiff, as a taxpayer of Monterey county, to enjoin said county, its supervisors, and horticultural commissioner, from manufacturing and selling therein poisoned barley to be used in the extermination of ground squirrels. Before trial the action was dismissed as to the members of the board of supervisors.

Appellant contends upon this appeal that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and that the findings do not sustain the judgment; also, that the enterprise engaged in by the county was illegal and that taxation of property for that purpose constituted a taking of the property without due process of law in violation of section 13 of article 1 of the state Constitution and of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution.

The trial court found that the practice here complained of was undertaken and carried on by respondents with the sole design of speedily and effectively destroying ground squirrels, and "as a sanitary and salutary measure conducive to and in promotion of the general health and economic well-being of the people of said Monterey county"; that it was impracticable for the landowners of that county to obtain enough suitable, effective, and reliable squirrel poison in the open market for the purposes stated and that the prices at which those poisons were obtainable "were so great that the farmers, ranchers and landholders of said Monterey county could not be induced to undertake the extermination of ground squirrels," thereby making it necessary for the county to provide such poisons; that the county purchased the necessary ingredients, including the poison and the grain, separately, and that the same were afterwards mixed and distributed by the county horticultural commissioner and his deputies directly to the farmers, ranchers, and landholders of said county at the actual cost of said ingredients to the county, no charge being made for mixing and distribution; that occasional sales were made through local merchants upon which a 10 per cent. commission was allowed, but that the quantity sold through said merchants was insignificant, amounting to practically nothing; that no profit was made or loss sustained by the county in the manufacture and distribution of said poisoned barley. The court further found that said undertaking by the county was not carried on as a business, nor was said poisoned barley sold at wholesale or retail quantities to the "general public" nor in the "open market." It further found that the practice complained of did not violate any of appellant's constitutional rights. From these findings the trial court concluded, as a matter of law, that appellant was not entitled to the relief prayed for and judgment was accordingly entered in favor of respondents.

The evidence, we think, is amply sufficient to support the findings. Aside from the ultimate facts set forth in the findings the evidence shows that ground squirrels, as carriers of human disease and destroyers of crops, were considered a menace to health and property by the health and agricultural departments of both federal and state governments, and that their extermination was not only requested and encouraged by those departments of government, but under state legislation their destruction was made compulsory; that at the time the county engaged in and carried on this enterprise there was a scarcity of poisons offered for sale in the open market, many of them were ineffective, and the high prices for which they were being sold made it impossible for the local authorities and the landholders in that county to cope with the squirrel evil; that consequently Monterey county, together with many of the other counties in the state, found it necessary to manufacture and supply directly to the farmers and landowners of their respective counties sufficient quantities of suitably poisoned barley, at reasonable prices, in order that the law requiring squirrel extermination be complied with and to protect the health and property of the community. The evidence further shows that there was no compulsion about the purchase of the county product, and that sales were made only to land occupants in Monterey county, there being but one sale made to an outside resident so far as the evidence shows, and in that case the purchaser was the owner of a ranch situate in Monterey county and at least a portion of the poisoned barley purchased was used on said ranch; whether or not the rest of the purchase was used elsewhere does not appear. The volume of gross sales made by the county, according to the testimony given by the horticultural commissioner, averaged about $3,700 a year for the five years preceding the commencement of this action, which amount, considering the vast area of farming and ranching lands embraced within the boundaries of Monterey county, serves to corroborate the statement made by said commissioner that the use of the county product was confined to that county.

[1-3] Regarding the legal contentions urged by appellant, it may be conceded that taxes may not be imposed by a county for the purpose of establishing or operating a private competitive commercial business; for illustration, a cement plant wherein a county seeks to manufacture and sell its product in the open market in competition with others, preference being given only to public corporations; and wherein also in doing so it may possibly suffer tremendous loss. City of Los Angeles v. Lewis, 175 Cal. 777, 167 P. 390. Nor may a county exercise any powers beyond those expressly granted by the law or fairly implied therefrom, or which are not essential to its declared objects and purposes. City of Madera v. Black, 181 Cal. 312, 184 P. 397. We think it obvious, however, that the instant case does not fall within either of those inhibited classes. The practice here engaged in cannot be regarded as a private commercial business in view of the fact that financial profit to the county was not, in fact, its object or result. It was a measure adopted for the purpose of protecting the health of the people of the county and to prevent injury and destruction to their property from an existing evil, and as such the enterprise engaged in finds abundant express legal sanction. Section 11 of article 11 of the state Constitution and subdivision 31 of section 4041 of the Political Code provide that any county may make, within the limits of said county, all such police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. Regarding such constitutional power it has been held that when a county, asserting its recognized authority, undertakes to suppress what it is free to regard as a public evil, it may adopt such measures, having reasonable relation to that end, as it may deem necessary in order to make that action effective. People v. Velarde, 45 Cal. App. 520, 188 P. 59. And subdivision 26 of said section 4041 of the Political Code grants full authority to boards of supervisors "to provide for the destruction of gophers, squirrels, other wild animals, noxious weeds," etc. In Ex parte Hodges, 87 Cal. 162, 25 P. 277, in discussing the authority granted the county under that provision to proceed in the matter of squirrel extermination, it was said that—

"This is a power that should be upheld on all occasions, where the means employed are reasonable, and not otherwise objectionable."

It cannot be said to be an unreasonable exercise of police power for the county to aid its landholders in combating a common nuisance; and, as already pointed out, the plan here adopted is not obnoxious to the law. The exercise of county police powers has its limitations, of course, which depend largely upon the circumstances of each case, and beyond which a county may not go; but we are of the opinion that in the instant case, in view of the conditions set forth by the findings and shown by the evidence under which the enterprise was instituted and carried on, those powers were not transcended, and that the practice complained of, when carried on under those conditions, does not reach the proportions of a private business venture in which a county is forbidden to engage.

[4, 5] There was no error committed by the trial court in allowing respondent Monterey county to amend its answer to conform to the proofs. Moreover, after a party amends to conform to the proofs and the opposite party makes no request that the submission of the cause be set aside or that he be permitted to offer further pleadings or proof, he is in no position to complain. Gartlan v. C. A. Hooper & Co., 177 Cal. 422, 170 P. 1115; Wardrobe v. Muller, 53 Cal. App. 370, 200 P. 77. So far as the record discloses there was no such request made in the instant case.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Margaret B. Willis was convicted of first degree murder, and she appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. Hahn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Gen. Atty., and John W. Maltman and H. H. Linney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged by indictment with having murdered one Dr. Beecher B. Baldwin on or about the 11th day of April, 1924. She admitted having killed him, but her defense was that he attacked her in her apartment while he was intoxicated, and that she shot him in defense of her person and her honor. A verdict was returned by the jury finding her guilty of murder in the first degree, with a recommendation of imprisonment for life, and she appeals from the judgment and order denying her motion for new trial.

Many grounds for reversal are assigned in appellant's briefs, which consist of the assertion of errors in rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, in instructing the jury, and alleged misconduct of the jury.

[1] A considerable portion of appellant's argument is devoted to alleged errors in the admission of contradictory statements testified by various witnesses to have been made by the defendant, and to the plausibility or weight of conflicting testimony, all of which were clearly admissible, and merely presented questions of fact for the final consideration of the jury. Its determination of these questions is conclusive. The defendant did not testify, and the testimony as to her admissions was not denied; it was submitted, under full instructions, with all the other evidence in the case, and, if the different versions of various witnesses did not completely harmonize, it was solely within the province of the jury to believe or disbelieve the portions which they might upon consideration of the whole case decide to accept or to reject. People v. Truitt, 49 Cal. App. 727, 194 P. 295;

People v. Jurado, 56 Cal. App. 481, 205 P. 696.

[2, 3] Exceptions to the testimony of witnesses as to admissions of the defendant are urged upon the theory that confessions obtained from a person while under arrest are liable to have been exacted by unfair methods. But there is no showing that any of her statements were other than voluntary admissions, and when they were offered no objection was interposed. Appellant's counsel subsequently objected to the reading of a portion of one such statement, but the objection was withdrawn with the remark, "Let everything go before the jury. It is all right. Go ahead." It is not contended that any such statements were not freely made and voluntary, and it appears from the record that appellant made them without solicitation except for questions that were asked of her as a result of her voluntary surrender. Even had she been asked to relate the facts, without promises or coercion, her statements would have been admissible. People v. O'Brien, 53 Cal. App. 754, 755, 200 P. 766.

[4-6] It is further argued that the trial court erred in admitting over appellant's objection the testimony of one Webster as to money which he had loaned her at various times, evidence oral and documentary of her indebtedness upon certain furniture, and as to an automobile transaction which she admittedly had with the decedent. Evidence relevant to show motive for the commission of the crime charged is always admissible, and often valuable. People v. Rongo, 169 Cal. 71, 75, 145 P. 1017; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 P. 75; People v. Owens, 132 Cal. 469, 64 P. 770. It was the theory of the prosecution that appellant was in financial straits, and that she killed Dr. Baldwin in order to avoid paying him for an automobile which she had agreed to purchase from him, and that she pledged the automobile as security for $150 which she owed one Edward Othman for said furniture. Motions to strike out this evidence were also made upon the grounds that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and not part of the res gestæ. From appellant's own statements on different occasions, it appeared that she had said that she would obtain the money with which to pay Dr. Baldwin from commissions due her in real estate transactions, that she would get it from her sister, and again that it consisted of small amounts which she had saved, and she later declared that she had paid Baldwin $750, but the money was never found among his effects. Since she did not testify, it was incumbent upon the jury to weigh and compare her extrajudicial statements with the other evidence in the case, and conclude whether she committed the homicide in self-defense or in furtherance of selfish designs. Having done so, if there be enough evidence for the prosecution to warrant a verdict of guilty, it cannot be disturbed upon appeal, unless there is such a disparity in the testimony of witnesses for the people as to render their evidence inherently improbable or necessarily unworthy of belief. People v. Brittan, 118 Cal. 409, 50 P. 664; People v. Billings, 34 Cal. App. 549, 168 P. 396. Such is not the status of the evidence before us.

[7] Another exception is taken to the admission in evidence of testimony which purported to quote a conversation between Mrs. Baldwin, the decedent's widow, and others, had in the presence of the defendant, at the city jail. In this conversation the deceased was said by Mrs. Baldwin to have stated to Mrs. Willis over the telephone, among other things:

"Well, if you are sure you will have the money to-morrow morning, I will make it a point to drop around there, but, unless you could have the money, I would not have time to come over until the first of the week, * * * and we will fix up the transfer to-morrow morning."

There was considerable more conversation of a similar import, indicating that Dr. Baldwin was making arrangements to sell an automobile to Mrs. Willis and to receive the money therefor. This witness testified to having related this to defendant in the presence of the latter's counsel, a stenographer, and a police officer. Mrs. Baldwin was permitted to testify to this conversation which she said took place over the telephone, against the objection that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and hearsay. Appellant's contention is that the conversation took place between Mrs. Baldwin and a police officer; that the admission of such testimony was error, because it was introduced for the purpose of entrapping the defendant into making a denial; but that there was no cause for response. It is argued that mere silence when such a statement is made in the presence of one accused of crime is not evidence of guilt. The witness testified further:

"This is the conversation that I related in front of Mrs. Willis at the detective bureau; and I related it as the conversation that took place the night before." "When I got through with this statement, everyone got up and left the room and left me there with Mrs. Willis; and I didn't say anything; and Mrs. Willis said—she sort of drew a long breath, and said, 'Well, Mrs. Baldwin, there isn't a thing I can say.'"

If Mrs. Baldwin stated to the defendant or in her immediate presence that this telephonic conversation had occurred, it was clearly admissible (People v. Piggott, 126 Cal. 509, 513, 59 P. 31), and, if the statement in that regard was untrue, the failure of the defendant to reply by way of a denial was evidence tending to show a tacit admission by her of the truth of the statement, whose relevancy is apparent, and the weight of which was a question of fact for the jury.

[8] It is contended that, in permitting a certain witness to testify concerning experiments which were made with the gun with which the deceased was killed, the court committed seriously prejudicial error. The testimony to which exception is especially taken is that of the witness Sellers. Several questions were asked of this witness which would have called for answers of an objectionable character, but which the court excluded. The substance of his testimony is that he assumed a position alleged to have been occupied by the defendant at the time of the shooting, facing another person in the position in which it is claimed the deceased was at that time. The head of the latter person was approximately 18 inches above the floor. An explanation was made of the operation of the gun which was used by the defendant and of difficulties which he encountered in attempting to fire it from the position which other witnesses had testified the defendant claimed to have occupied. In testifying concerning these difficulties, it appears from the transcript that the witness was demonstrating the use of the gun before the jury. Questions and answers involved in this objection are as follows:

"Q. Will you just explain to me, or demonstrate it, why it is difficult to discharge the gun with the wrist twisted? A. Of course, if the gun is held in this manner, it can be easily fired by pulling the trigger, and pressing this back safety. As the arm begins to turn in this manner (illustrating) there is, naturally, a lengthening of certain muscles in the arm here (indicating), and there is a limit to the degree that you can turn the gun, and the further you turn it—

"Q. Just a minute. Can you discharge that gun now? A. I can, with a great deal of effort. The further back I pull it this way toward me this way, the more difficult it would be."

Counsel for appellant contends that in allowing the witness to testify in this manner the trial court violated the principle laid down in the case of People v. Salaz (Cal. App.) 225 P. 777, in which it is said:

"Dr. Wagner, over defendant's strenuous objections, was permitted to testify that in his opinion, based entirely upon the result of his examination of the body and the course taken by the bullets, the man who did the shooting was in front and towards the left of the decedent. Asked by the district attorney if, from his examination of the body and the course of the bullets, he could tell in what position the decedent was when he was shot, the witness replied: 'In a general way I could. I can positively state that the man [who did the shooting] was in front and towards the left. He was not immediately in front, but what we might call diagonal towards the left and in front of the deceased.' * * *

"That grievous error was committed when Dr. Wagner was permitted to testify that he could 'positively state' that the man who did the shooting was in front 'and towards the left,' that 'he was not immediately in front, but what we might call diagonal towards the left and in front of deceased,' is clearly demonstrable. The question whether the direction of a gunshot wound in the body of a deceased indicates the relative positions of the person firing the shot and the person receiving it is not a matter of expert or opinion evidence, and it has been held by our Supreme Court that it is error to allow a physician to testify to his opinion upon that question." (Italics quoted.)

In the instant case the witness did not express any opinion concerning the positions of the deceased and defendant. He drew no conclusions at all, except in connection with the gun and its operation. As to this it is not questioned that he qualified as an expert, nor can there be any doubt that this was a proper subject for expert testimony. The witness' statement that, holding the gun in a certain position, it was difficult to pull the trigger is merely a statement of fact, and, at the same time, an explanation of the mechanical operation of the firearm.

It does not appear that the witness gave any conclusions concerning his experiments when he and the other man assumed the positions on the floor to which he testified. His only answers bearing upon experiments with a gun, aside from explaining its mechanical operation, are those which we have quoted.

[9, 10] A nonexpert witness may not express an opinion as to whether a person could have done any act within the range of common knowledge and experience, as the jury are as competent as the witness to draw the inference from the facts. People v. Helm, 152 Cal. 532, 93 P. 99; People v. Lowrie, 4 Cal. App. 137, 87 P. 253. And for the same reason an expert witness will not be permitted to express his opinion as to conclusions from matters of common observation and experience. People v. Heacock, 10 Cal. App. 450, 102 P. 543. But one skilled in some art, trade, or science, having knowledge and experience in relation to matters which are not within the knowledge of men of average intelligence, education, and experience, may express an opinion on a state of facts within his specialty and which is involved in the inquiry. 16 Corp. Jur. p. 748, § 1532, citing People v. Heacock, supra. Experiments with firearms have frequently been made in homicide cases, and the results proven at the trials as tending to show the guilt or innocence of the accused. Such results are not conclusive, but are competent and admissible, and their weight is for the jury to determine. People v. Levine, 85 Cal. 39, 43, 22 P. 969, 24 P. 631.

[11, 12] The court was asked to instruct the jury that, "when determining her guilt or innocence, if there is any doubt in the minds of the jury as to the actions and statements of the defendant, it is the duty of the jury to give her the benefit of the doubt," but such is not the law, and, the point having been fully correctly covered by the general charge and by other instructions requested by the appellant, further discussion of the subject is here unnecessary. Other instructions requested by appellant which the trial court declined to give were covered by those which were given, and which correctly stated the law of the case. They were therefore properly refused. People v. Cox, 29 Cal. App. 419, 155 P. 1010; People v. Wilson, 29 Cal. App. 563, 156 P. 377.

[13] It is contended that the jury received evidence outside of court, and after the case had been finally submitted to them, after the defendant and her counsel had departed. This matter was subsequently called to the attention of the trial court, and from the statement made by the judge it appears that as the jury left the courtroom it requested the exhibits and instructions. The court assembled them on the desk and ordered them delivered to the jury. The request by the jury, and the order of the court, were made in the presence of the defendant, and there is no showing that the jury received other evidence from the bailiff or otherwise. No authority is called to our attention, nor are we aware of any, which requires that the physical delivery of exhibits or instructions to the jury must be made in the courtroom before they retire.

[14] Counsel for appellant moved for a new trial, based in part upon an affidavit wherein he alleged that one of the jurors at first voted for a verdict of not guilty, and insisted upon reading the testimony of Webster and the widow of deceased; that a request for said testimony was conveyed to the court, but was denied; and that two other jurors then "by coercion, abuse, undue influence, misinformation, and insults" caused her to change her vote and agree upon a verdict for conviction. Counsel's affidavit is the only evidence that was offered as to these alleged facts; it furnishes no light as to the source of his information, but it could not have been otherwise obtained than from hearsay. It was expressly held in People v. Clark, 183 Cal. 677, 192 P. 521, that such an affidavit is entitled to no weight, and is not competent or proper evidence upon a motion for new trial. The same authority disposes of another contention, also based upon an affidavit of defendant's counsel, wherein it is made to appear that, after the jury had been instructed and had retired, it sent word to the court by the bailiff that it desired to receive the testimony of two of the witnesses. At all events, a request of that character falls within the inhibition of section 1137 of the Penal Code.

[15] As to many other criticisms of appellant they amount to nothing more than mere references to pages throughout a voluminous record where general objections appear, without argument or citation of authority. They are mere naked statements that the court erred in making certain enumerated rulings, without stating reasons why errors are assigned, and we are not called upon to institute an independent inquiry in order to furnish reasons for or against the correctness of the rulings. People v. Clark, supra.

The judgment and order denying the motion for new trial are affirmed.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was charged with an attempt to murder his wife. From a judgment of conviction and from an order denying him a new trial he appeals to this court. As his main ground for the appeal he claims that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

[1] There is evidence to show the following: On March 13, 1924, defendant's wife owned and conducted a restaurant known as the Royal Barbecue, on Washington boulevard not far from the city of Venice, in the county of Los Angeles. Her brother and likewise her mother lived in Venice. There was a bedroom in the Royal Barbecue in which defendant's wife customarily slept. Immediately in the rear of this bedroom is a toilet. It was in this toilet that defendant and a man of the name of Woodhead, sometimes referred to by defendant as Tate, on the night of March 13, 1924, were about to place a bomb, when they were seized and arrested by officers of the law. Defendant and his wife had been married but a short time prior to this occurrence. In the month of February and in the early part of March, 1924, defendant, who had quarreled with his wife shortly after their marriage and had left Los Angeles county, was operating a restaurant or lunch stand in Ventura county. It was there that he met Woodhead, who was experienced in the handling of explosives, and who was the principal witness for the prosecution. At no time did Woodhead intend carrying out defendant's scheme to murder his wife; instead it was his purpose to turn defendant over to the authorities before any killing was actually accomplished. The pith of Woodhead's testimony, reduced to narrative form, is substantially as follows:

"I first met defendant on February 3, 1924, at the restaurant which he was then running in Ventura county. I met him at the same place a week later. He told me then that he had had family troubles and that he would like to put his wife out of the way. I mentioned dynamite and told him that things like that had happened before. In one of our conversations he told me that a few weeks previously he had unsuccessfully tried to poison his wife. When I mentioned dynamite he said, 'I think you are the man that can put her out of the way. She has a brother and I want him out of the way by all means.' I knew that if he could not get me to blow up his wife and her family it was his intention to get some one else to do it. I was trying all the time to find out whether he was going to dynamite his wife or poison her or what he was going to do. I saw defendant again on February 11th at the same place. On that day he said to me, 'I am nearly sure this thing can be pulled off; you using dynamite. I think you can pull the job off for me.' I said, 'All right, if that is the case we will see how we can fix plans.' He said, 'There is a lot of money in this. My wife's brother is very wealthy. I would like to have my wife's mother out of the way. I would like to kill her first; there are five in the family, and my wife will get a fifth share. Then we will plan to put my wife out of the way. Then the whole bulk will come to me.' He figured that there would be somewhere near $100,000. On February 13th I again saw defendant at his restaurant. I told him I had been using dynamite on some work that I was doing nearby and showed him three sticks of the stuff. He said, 'This is just the thing. I will fix you pretty well for this if you can pull the job off. I am going to sell out my restaurant on the first of March and then we will go down to Los Angeles and make final arrangements.' The next day he wanted to know whether I could go to his wife's restaurant near Venice in Los Angeles county, look it over, and get the lay of the land. He told me he would like to have me put the dynamite in the oven of the Royal Barbecue. He said, 'It is easy.' I said, 'Such things like this are not so easy. They have to be planned carefully, to take life like that.' He showed me a photograph of his wife's restaurant. He drew a diagram of the place showing where the oven was. He said, 'I want you to put it there, because my wife sits at the cash register nearly all the time, and the best time to get her will be 9 o'clock in the morning, because then the cook is not on duty.' Upon another occasion, before going to Los Angeles, defendant and I experimented with dynamite. I showed him how a detonator works. We timed it. He said it went off too soon—that it would not allow sufficient time to get away. He said, 'I think my wife has a gasoline tank just back of the oven in the Royal Barbecue. You can go down there with a bomb, and if that does not get them you can set the gasoline going and empty the gasoline out of the can and string it all the way around the house.' Then he showed me with a rag saturated with gasoline how to make a ring of fire around the house. Defendant sold his restaurant on March 3d, and on the 5th or 6th of that month we came to Los Angeles. On the 8th of March defendant took me to Venice and pointed out to me his mother-in-law's house. He took me under the house and showed me the spot which he thought would be the best place to plant a bomb. On the 11th of March I went to see defendant's mother-in-law at her house in Venice. I told her of the plot. She sent for her daughter. I told them what defendant intended to do. They brought me to the district attorney's office. There I told a deputy district attorney about the case. Through him I met two deputy sheriffs who instructed me to go ahead and prepare a dynamite bomb. Before coming to Los Angeles nothing had been said by the defendant and myself about blowing up the house otherwise than by putting dynamite in the oven of the Royal Barbecue. On the 13th of March defendant met me at my hotel room in the city of Los Angeles. I told him I had got a real proper bomb, clock and dry battery, sticks of dynamite, wire and everything attached. He said, 'That is fine. Are you sure it will work?' I told him it would. He said, 'I want you to kill my wife; kill all of them. I want you to go to my wife's place at 7 o'clock this evening and meet me in front of her place, and bring the bomb with you.' He said he would give me $2,000 or $3,000 for the job. I met him shortly after 7 o'clock that evening as we had agreed. He conducted me to the rear of the Royal Barbecue near his wife's bedroom. We came to an outbuilding where the cook lives. I was carrying the bomb. Defendant said, 'I want this job done, and I want you to get it done sharp. Can you fix the bomb to go off at 3 o'clock in the morning?' I said I could, but that I would have to pull the detonator out. I told him that monkeying with bombs is not a good thing, but that I would wind the clock up and put the alarm on, so it would go off at the time he wanted it to. He then brought me back to the toilet immediately in the rear of his wife's bedroom. He told me that his wife had gone to a show, but that she probably would be back about 9 or 10 o'clock in the evening. He said, 'According to what I heard my wife say, they are all [defendant's wife, mother-in-law, and brother-in-law] going to sleep here in my wife's place, the Royal Barbecue, to-night. So I want you to get this bomb properly timed. Fix it for 3 o'clock in the morning.' I set it for 3 o'clock in the morning as he told me to. He said, 'This is my wife's bedroom here.' I had opened up the box containing the bomb and had taken out the detonator. I told defendant to light a match for me so I could see to fix the detonator. He struck a match, but it went out before the detonator could be fixed. Then he struck a second match for me, but I didn't get the detonator fixed. Then he struck a third match, and I had the detonator out, and I said to defendant, 'Run back and fetch me another match,' and he fetched me another match. By that time I was just putting the detonator in, when the officers rushed in on us and arrested us. The bomb would have gone off, if permitted to. If it had gone off, it would have blown the building and also the people a quarter of a mile away."

The officers had been informed by Woodhead of defendant's intentions, and pursuant to a prearranged plan, to which Woodhead was a party, they had concealed themselves at several stations where, without being seen by the defendant, they could observe what was going on in the toilet.

[2] The jury was warranted in finding defendant guilty of an attempt to commit murder—a crime denounced by section 664 of the Penal Code. An attempt to commit a crime is compounded of two elements: (1) An intent to commit the crime, and (2) a direct, ineffectual act done toward its commission. In this case there is abundant proof to support the first element. Without doubt appellant intended to murder his wife. His intention to accomplish that crime, an intention conceived and born in his own malignant mind, is shown beyond peradventure and quite independently of the acts done by him in his attempted consummation of the crime. A more serious question presents itself as to the existence of the second element. That is to say, Is there substantial evidence that appellant personally did any act which immediately and directly tended to the execution of his fixed purpose to put his wife out of the way by murdering her?

[3-5] It unquestionably is true that mere acts of preparation—acts not proximately leading up to the consummation of the intended crime—will not suffice to establish an attempt to commit the offense, especially when made at a distance, from the place where the contemplated crime is to be committed. 8 R. C. L. p. 278. It is useless to undertake to reconcile the authorities on the subject of what constitutes an attempt and what is mere preparation. To a very great extent each case must stand upon its own facts. The text-books and the decisions upon this subject are noted for their lack of harmony. Generally speaking, the attempt, as distinguished from mere preparation, consists of some direct movement toward the consummation of the intended crime after the preparations have been made. People v. Murray, 14 Cal. 159. The difficulty generally is in determining the proximity of the overt act or acts to the complete accomplishment of the substantive crime. The acts proximately leading up to the consummation of the intended crime need not include the last proximate act for its completion. It is sufficient if the overt acts reach far enough toward the accomplishment of the intended offense to amount to the commencement of its consummation. That is to say, if the actual transaction has commenced which would have ended in the crime if not interrupted, there is an attempt to commit the crime. People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 256, 205 P. 435, 24 A. L. R. 1383. In State v. Roby, 194 Iowa, 1032, 188 N. W. 709, the Iowa Supreme Court correctly states the rule as follows:

"It [the overt act] need not be the last proximate act to the consummation of the offense attempted to be perpetrated, [but] it must approach sufficiently near to it to stand either as the first or some subsequent step in a direct movement towards the commission of the offense after the preparations are made. Whenever the design of a person to commit crime is clearly shown, slight acts done in furtherance of that design will constitute an attempt; and the courts should not destroy the practical and common sense administration of the law with subtleties as to what constitutes preparation and what an act done towards the commission of a crime. It would be useless to attempt to lay down any rule by which an act might be characterized as overt or otherwise in a particular case, and the general principles * * * must be applied in each case as nearly as can be, with a view to working out substantial justice."

Upon this subject the New York Court of Appeals, in the case of People v. Sullivan, 173 N. Y. 122, 65 N. E. 989, 63 L. R. A. 353, 93 Am. St. Rep. 582, speaking through Cullen, J., says:

"The question of what overt act is sufficient to constitute an attempt to commit a crime has been the subject of much discussion by both text-writers and courts, and of some conflict in the decisions. In the early English cases the view seems to have been adopted that to constitute an attempt the overt act must be the final one towards the completion of the offense and of such a character that, unless it had been interrupted, the offense itself would have been committed. * * * This extreme doctrine has not been accepted in this country, certainly not in this state. * * * But assuming that mere preparation is not in all cases an attempt to commit the crime, it is well settled in this country that it is not necessary to constitute an attempt that the act done should be the last proximate one for the completion of the offense. 'However attempt is viewed in England, the act need not, according to the American idea, be the next preceding the one which would render such substantive crime complete.' Bish. Cr. Law, § 762."

In People v. Mills, 178 N. Y. 274, 70 N. E. 786, 67 L. R. A. 131, it was said by Vann, J.:

"An overt act is one done to carry out the intention, and it must be such as would naturally effect that result, unless prevented by some extraneous cause. * * * If the defendant did anything with intent to steal the papers, which in the ordinary course of events, unless interfered with, would have resulted in the theft thereof, it was an overt act."

The proximity of the overt acts to or their remoteness from the place where the substantive offense is to be committed enters largely into the question of whether the actual transaction has been commenced or not. People v. Stites, 75 Cal. 576, 577, 17 P. 693.

As we have stated, we know the criminal intent of appellant as an independent fact. "Murder most foul" he had committed "already in his heart." The circumstances of the case satisfy all requirements of proximity to the place where the intended crime was to be consummated. Appellant, in conjunction with Woodhead, was actually engaged in the commission of overt acts upon the very spot where the substantive offense was to be perpetrated. The instrument with which he intended to blow his wife and the members of her family into eternity was fully prepared for the horrid deed, with the one exception that it remained to replace the detonator—that part of the murderous mechanism having been temporarily removed by Woodhead for precautionary reasons while he was setting the alarm clock to "go off" at the hour designated by appellant. This one act of replacing the detonator—a proximate act in a direct movement toward the consummation of the intended crime—was being done on the identical spot where appellant intended that the substantive offense should be accomplished. Appellant assisted in the replacement of the detonator by striking several matches and holding them so that Woodhead could see to do his part of the work. These acts of assistance on the part of appellant constitute a series of overt acts personally performed by him and tending toward the present execution of his murderous design. They constitute a course of conduct tending directly to the commission of the crime of murder. Moreover, Woodhead, who carried the bomb, was guided by appellant to the exact spot where the deadly contrivance was to be deposited in close proximity to the sleeping apartment occupied by appellant's intended victim. In Stokes v. State, 92 Miss. 415, 46 So. 627, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 898, it was held that an overt act sufficient to convict the defendant of attempt to murder has been committed when he hires another to commit the act, procures a loaded gun and goes with the person hired to the point where they are to lie in wait for the victim, although the accused is arrested just as he is in the act of handing the gun to the one whom he had hired to do the killing. See, also, People v. Stites, supra. In the Stokes Case the Mississippi Supreme Court says:

"The mere buying of a gun and loading it might not constitute an attempt. But when the facts show, in furtherance of the design, that a gun has been procured and loaded, and the party so procuring and loading the gun has armed himself and started out on his mission to kill, but is prevented from carrying out his design by such extraneous circumstances as that the party he intends to kill does not come to the point where he expected to carry out his design, or if the party designing to kill is arrested and prevented from carrying out the design, he is clearly guilty of the attempt. When Stokes attempted to procure Robertson to perpetrate this crime, and in furtherance of this purpose took the gun, loaded it, and started with him to the point where the killing was to occur, the act was an act done tending to effect the commission of the crime, within the meaning of" section 1049 of the Code, "and was an attempt. In this stage it had proceeded beyond mere preparation or intent, and was an actual step taken towards the commission of the crime. * * * Whenever the design of a person to commit crime is clearly shown, slight acts done in furtherance of this design will constitute an attempt. * * *"

[6] But for the interruption which put an end to appellant's criminal endeavor—the timely arrival of the officers—he would have effected the crime he was then attempting to consummate, provided, of course, that Woodhead had been willing to go on with the enterprise to the end. But the fact that Woodhead would not have gone all the way to the actual consummation of the crime contemplated by appellant is no defense. It is the condition of appellant's mind and his conduct in the attempted consummation of his design which determines whether there was an actual attempt to commit crime. Here appellant did his utmost to effect the consummation of the crime intended by him. He failed only by reason of a cause or causes not previously apparent to him. "It is a well-settled principle of criminal law in this country," says our Supreme Court in People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 668, 30 P. 801, 17 L. R. A. 626, 29 Am. St. Rep. 165, "that where the criminal result of an attempt is not accomplished simply because of an obstruction in the way of the thing to be operated upon, and these facts are unknown to the aggressor at the time, the criminal attempt is committed. Thus, an attempt to pick one's pocket or to steal from his person, when he has nothing in his pocket or on his person, completes the offense to the same degree as if he had money or other personal property which could be the subject of larceny." In People v. Moran, 123 N. Y. 254, 25 N. E. 412, 10 L. R. A. 109, 20 Am. St. Rep. 732, it is declared:

"Whenever the animo furandi exists, followed by acts apparently affording a prospect of success and tending to render the commission of the crime effectual, the accused brings himself within the letter and intent of the statute. * * * The question whether an attempt to commit a crime has been made, is determinable solely by the condition of the actor's mind and his conduct in the attempted consummation of his design. * * * So far as the thief is concerned, the felonious design and action are then just as complete as though the crime could have been, or, in fact, had been committed, and the punishment of such offender is just as essential to the protection of the public, as of one whose designs have been successful."

The court, after calling attention to some English decisions to the contrary, continues:

"In this country, however, the courts have uniformly refused to follow the cases of Regina v. McPherson and Regina v. Collins, * * * and have adopted the more logical and rational rule, that an attempt to commit a crime may be effectual, although, for some reason undiscoverable by the intending perpetrator, the crime, under existing circumstances, may be incapable of accomplishment."

See, also, In re Magidson, 32 Cal. App. 566, 163 P. 689.

[7-9] Appellant next contends that even if his overt acts, coupled with his murderous intent, did fulfill all the essential requirements necessary to constitute an attempt to commit murder, still, under the circumstances of this case, no crime can be imputed to him, for the reason that he was led on by Woodhead, and his arrest, prosecution, and conviction were the result of an "entrapment," as that term is understood in the criminal law. There is no merit in this point. When officers of the law are informed that a person intends to commit a crime against the property or person of another, the law permits them to afford opportunities for its commission and to lay traps which may result in the detection of the offender. To this end a person may be engaged to act with the one who is suspected and to be present with him at the time the crime is to be committed; and if the accused, having himself originally conceived the criminal intent, commits such of the overt acts as are necessary to complete the offense, he will not be protected from punishment by reason of the fact that when the acts were done by him the person who was present with the knowledge and approval of the authorities aided in and encouraged their perpetration. It is, of course, necessary that the defendant should have directly participated in so much of the entire transaction that the acts which he himself personally committed shall alone be sufficient to make out a complete offense against the law; for no act done by his feigned accomplice may be imputed to him, and if, in order to constitute the offense, it is necessary that something done by the supposed confederate shall be imputed to the accused, then the prosecution will fail. Or if it appear that the intent to commit the crime did not originate with the accused but was suggested by the person present with him, and that he was not intentionally carrying out his own criminal purpose, the prosecution will likewise fail. Dalton v. State, 113 Ga. 1037, 39 S. E. 468; State v. Jansen, 22 Kan. 498; State v. Currie, 13 N. D. 655, 102 N. W. 875, 69 L. R. A. 405, 112 Am. St. Rep. 687; Crowder v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 92, 96 S. W. 934; People v. Conrad, 102 App. Div. 566, 92 N. Y. S. 606, affirmed in 182 N. Y. 529, 74 N. E. 1122; State v. Mantis, 32 Idaho, 724, 187 P. 268; People v. Macy, 43 Cal. App. 482, 184 P. 1008; 8 R. C. L., p. 128.

In State v. Jansen, supra, Mr. Justice Brewer says:

"The act of a detective may, perhaps, not be imputable to the defendant, as there is a want of a community of motive. The one has a criminal intent, while the other is seeking the discovery and punishment of crime. But where each of the overt acts going to make up the crime charged, is personally done by the defendant, and with criminal intent, his guilt is complete, no matter what motives may prompt or what acts be done by the party who is with and apparently assisting him."

In McAdams v. State, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 456, it is said:

"A man may direct his servant, or a third person to appear to encourage the design of a thief, and lead him on until the offense is complete, so long as he does not induce the original intent, but only provides for its discovery after it has been formed."

In Crowder v. State, supra, the Texas court of criminal appeals states the rule thus:

"If an owner of property in order to detect a thief directs another person to apparently encourage the thief's design, and lead him on, and the act is consummated [by the accused], it would be theft, provided the owner or his agent did not induce the original intent on the part of the thief."

People v. Conrad, supra, was a prosecution for an attempt to commit an abortion. It seems that a woman, acting under the direction of the officers of a county medical society, went to the defendant, a physician, and asked him to commit an abortion on her. The defendant agreed to do so and arrangements were made for the commission of the offense. Just as the defendant had prepared his instruments and placed the woman in a position convenient for their use, the detectives, on a prearranged signal given by the woman, entered and made the arrest. The court, holding that the entrapment was no defense, used this language:

"The conviction of the defendant was brought about by means of a trap arranged by the officers of the county medical society. It is claimed that, as the defendant was lured into the commission of the claimed overt acts, he cannot be punished therefor. This contention has recently been the subject of examination by this court and by the court of appeals, and decided adversely to the contention of the defendant. He was not a passive instrument in the hands of the entrapping parties. He did the act with which he was charged voluntarily, with full knowledge of the subject, and of the consequences which would flow therefrom. Under such circumstances, setting a trap by which he was caught is not a defense."

These principles, applied to the facts of this case, warranted the jury's verdict, notwithstanding Woodhead's apparent willingness to aid and abet appellant in his murderous design. Woodhead, it is true, fell in with and apparently agreed to appellant's purpose to murder his wife, and did certain acts which, had his motive been a criminal one, would have made him also a guilty party in the attempt to commit murder. But the original intent to murder Mrs. Lanzit was conceived in appellant's brain. It was not planted there by Woodhead. It was because it already had germinated in appellant's mind, as a result of his own independent volition, that Woodhead seems to have thought that the ends of justice would best be subserved if he adopted the strategy pursued by him. The suggestion that murder be committed, and a very considerable part of the active planning of it—even to suggesting the time and place when and where the explosion should occur—is shown to have come from appellant. As we have pointed out, appellant himself did certain overt acts which proximately led up to the commencement of the consummation of the intended murder and which of themselves were sufficient to constitute an attempt on his part to commit the crime of murder. Every essential ingredient of the crime with which appellant is charged was committed by him in person. To complete his guilt it was not necessary that any act done by his supposed confederate should be imputed to him.

Nor do we perceive wherein any principle of public policy has been violated through Woodhead's pretended co-operation. It is true Woodhead, who assisted with his acts but with a hidden motive, deceived appellant as to the purpose of his apparent complicity in the crime. We refrain from either commending this practice or commenting upon it as dangerous and generally of doubtful propriety. We content ourselves with saying that it is enough that appellant originated the idea of doing away with his wife and that he committed overt acts which of themselves were sufficient to constitute the attempt to murder. This being the situation, the feigned complicity of Woodhead cannot and should not be a shield for the protection of guilt. The authorities almost unanimously hold that one who undertakes to aid in the commission of any offense, in conjunction with the real criminal, in order to detect the latter in his crime and to bring him to justice, may render such aid, and that the guilty party will not be exonerated, if he independently conceived the original intent and personally did every act necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged. Appellant was not a passive instrument in the hands of Woodhead, but voluntarily did the acts performed by him, and did them with full knowledge of the subject and of the consequences which would flow from them.

Counsel have cited and commented upon several cases of "entrapment" in which the defendants were adjudged guiltless of the crimes charged. But this feature distinguishes them: Some act essential to the crime charged was in fact done by the feigned accomplice and not by the defendant, and such act not being imputable to the defendant, the latter's guilt was not made out. Such a case is People v. Collins, 53 Cal. 185. Intent alone does not make crime. The intent and the act must combine, and all the elements of the act must exist and be imputable to the defendant. But here appellant himself, quite independently of what his supposed accomplice did, performed acts which, in conjunction with his guilty intent, constituted every essential ingredient of the crime of attempt to commit murder.

[10] Finally, it is contended that in its charge to the jury upon the subject of "entrapment" the court gave contradictory and misleading instructions. To support this position appellant picks out one of the instructions as an unimpeachable model of accuracy, saying of it that it correctly states the law, and then sets forth a number of other instructions which he says are inconsistent with the one which he sets up for a flawless standard. He makes no attempt to point out wherein the instructions are contradictory, but simply makes the point and cites authorities which he claims sustain his contention. Obviously, if the instructions of which appellant complains are correct statements of the law and are applicable to the facts of the case, he has not been prejudiced even if they are in seeming conflict with the one picked out by him as a standard for comparison. While generally the giving of conflicting or misleading instructions will warrant a reversal, this rule is subject to the exception that when this condition results to appellant's advantage, as it may if one of the instructions be too favorable to him, he has no ground of complaint.

We have examined with painstaking care the instructions complained of, and are convinced that each of them is an accurate statement of the law applicable to the case. They are too numerous to warrant a separate consideration of each. One of those to which objection is made will suffice for the purpose of illustrating our view that the charge as a whole does not misstate the law. The one which we select for that purpose is as follows:

"If you find from all the evidence, to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant originated the idea and formed the intent of killing his wife, and that he communicated his intent to kill her to one Tate or Woodhead, the fact, if it be a fact, that the officers of the law planned to and did furnish the defendant an opportunity to carry out his intent to kill his wife is no defense to the charge of attempt to murder his wife."

[11] We find no error or inaccuracy in this instruction. Where the alleged offense is against property rights, as in larceny, for example, any instigation on the part of the owner or his authorized agent which amounts to a consent to the injury or attempted injury to the owner's right of property is a defense. In such cases the consent of the individual affected by the alleged crime eliminates one of the essential elements of the offense. But here the crime of which appellant was found guilty involved an attempted injury to the person of another, and not to that other's property right. Moreover, Mrs. Lanzit did not consent to appellant's attempt upon her life; and even if she had consented thereto and murder had actually followed, her consent would not have excused the crime. When appellant, with the intent to murder his wife, personally did overt acts which proximately led up to the commencement of the consummation of the contemplated murder, an offense against the people of the state of California was perpetrated, and he cannot insist as a defense that he would not have committed the crime if Woodhead had not furnished him with the opportunity. In People v. Liphardt, 105 Mich. 80, 62 N. W. 1022, the court says:

"We know of no case that holds that one who has committed a criminal act should be acquitted because induced to do so by another. It is merely when the criminality of the act is shown to be absent by the fact of the inducement that such proof justifies acquittal. In cases of alleged larceny, where the master has directed a servant to deliver his property to a thief, or burglary, where he has directed the admission of a burglar, the principal element of the offense is lacking; in the former there is no felonious taking, in the latter no felonious breaking and entering."

See, also, Hummelshime v. State, 125 Md. 563, 93 A. 990, Ann. Cas. 1917E, p. 1072, and People v. Conrad, supra. In a note, to Butts v. United States, 18 A. L. R. 146, the author says:

"Where the doing of a particular act is a crime regardless of the consent of any one, the courts are agreed that if the criminal intent originates in the mind of the accused, and the criminal offense is completed, the fact that an opportunity is furnished, or that the accused is aided in the commission of the crime in order to secure the evidence necessary to prosecute him therefor, constitutes no defense."

In People v. Mills, supra, the New York Court of Appeals voices the doctrine thus:

"We are asked to protect the defendant, not because he is innocent, but because a zealous public officer exceeded his powers and held out a bait. The courts do not look to see who held out the bait, but to see who took it. When it was found that the defendant took into his possession the property of the state with intent to steal it, an offense against public justice was established and he could not insist as a defense that he would not have committed the crime if he had not been tempted by a public officer whom he thought he had corrupted. He supposed he had bought the assistant district attorney when he handed over the money, but he knew he had not bought the state of New York and, hence that the assistant had no right to give him its property for the purpose of enabling him to steal it."

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

GREENWOOD v. BUILDING TRADES COUNCIL OF SACRAMENTO et al.
(Civ. 2857.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Feb. 5, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 5, 1925.)

1. Associations ⇨14—Court will not interfere in controversy between members of voluntary association until all remedies of association exhausted.

Courts will not interfere in controversy between members of voluntary association until aggrieved member has exhausted all remedies afforded him by Constitution or by-laws of association.

2. Trade unions ⇨4—Fact that hardship may be suffered while remedies provided for by association are exhausted does not warrant interference of court.

That a local labor union seeking reinstatement as member of Building Trades Council will suffer hardships during a period necessary to exhaust remedies afforded it by their by-laws and constitution does not furnish ground for interposition of court.

3. Trade unions ⇨4—Court will not interfere to prevent collection of money from members of trade union.

Court will not interfere to prevent collection by Building Trades Council of a per capita tax from members of local union; it being pure matter of law between respective parties.

4. Injunction ⇨101(1) — Right to quit work cannot be enjoined, and motive immaterial.

The right to quit work, either individually or collectively, cannot ordinarily be restrained, and motive actuating a strike or withdrawal of men from employment is immaterial.

5. Trade unions ⇨4—Court will not interfere with questions of membership and enforcement of rules of labor unions until remedies afforded by their by-laws exhausted.

Court will not interfere with questions as to membership and enforcement of rules of labor unions until aggrieved members have exhausted all remedies afforded by by-laws and constitution of their organizations.

6. Associations ⇨7—When fact of membership in voluntary association established, court will restrain violation of rules, if property rights involved.

When fact of membership in a voluntary association has once been established, and property rights are involved, court will restrain violation of rules governing association at behest of any one suffering injury by such violations.

7. Trade unions ⇨7—Relation of trustee and cestui que trust held not to exist between labor union and Building Trades Council where union not member of council.

In suit by local labor union to compel Building Trades Council to reinstate union to membership, plaintiff not being a member of council and having no representation therein, relation of trustee and cestui que trust does not exist between them.

8. Associations ⇨10—When membership in voluntary association acquired, court will prevent illegal expulsion.

When a membership in a voluntary association has once been acquired, court will afford protection against illegal expulsion.

9. Associations ⇨8—Injury by nonadmission of membership in voluntary association not ground for relief.

That one may suffer injury by reason of nonadmission to membership in a voluntary association affords no ground for relief.

10. Trade unions ⇨8—Court will not compel admission of local union into membership of Building Trades Council regardless of motive of council in excluding union.

Where a local union seceded from membership in local Building Trades Council, but later sought reinstatement, a court of equity will not interfere with action of council in excluding such union from membership, which it had legal right to do, or compel admission into membership, regardless of its motive, especially where action of local council has been approved by parent association.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Suit for injunction by Robert Greenwood, for and on behalf of himself and all members of the Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance and the Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance, Local 162, against the Building Trades Council of Sacramento and others. From a judgment granting a temporary injunction, defendants appeal. Reversed.

P. H. Johnson and A. L. O'Grady, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Downey, Downey & Seymour, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. In passing upon the petition for rehearing herein, we have concluded to restate the issues involved and our views thereon. It is therefore ordered that the opinion heretofore filed in this cause on January 6, 1925, be and the same is hereby entirely set aside and the following substituted as the opinion of the court in lieu thereof:

This is an appeal by the defendants from an order of the trial court granting a temporary restraining order or injunction whereby the defendants were restrained and enjoined from collecting, or attempting to collect, a certain per capita tax of $4.50 from members of Local Union No. 162 of the sheet metal workers, and also restraining said defendants from threatening to or actually striking or calling out members of other crafts engaged in the building industry in the city of Sacramento, in either shops or buildings, in which members of said Local Union No. 162 were employed. A hearing was had upon an order to show cause why a temporary restraining order or injunction should not be issued during the pendency of the trial of the action.

The record shows that the Sheet Metal Workers' Union, Local No. 162, was, at the time of the commencement of this action, a local union duly chartered by the Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance; that the Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance is affiliated with and chartered by the American Federation of Labor (Building Trades Department); that the Building Trades Council of the State of California is chartered by and affiliates with the American Federation of Labor (Building Trades Department); that the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento is a duly chartered organization of and affiliates with the Building Trades Council of the State of California; that all of the organizations, and, through their affiliations, are connected with the American Federation of Labor (Building Trades Department); it further appears from the transcript that on or about the 1st day of January, 1922, the Sheet Metal Workers' Union, Local No. 162, of the City of Sacramento, was suspended by the International Sheet Metal Workers' Alliance, and thereupon the affiliation of said Local No. 162 with the said Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento ceased to exist; that thereafter, and on or about the 1st day of September, 1922, said Sheet Metal Workers' Union, Local No. 162, was reinstated by the International Alliance, and on or about the 1st day of October, 1922, delegates representing said Local No. 162 applied for admission to the said Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento; that admission was refused on the ground that there were already delegates representing an organization known as Sheet Metal Workers' Union, No. 2, of the City of Sacramento, admitted as delegates and members of said Building Trades Council. It appears that shortly after the suspension of Local No. 162, and the ceasing of its affiliation with the Building Trades Council, a number of sheet metal workers of the city of Sacramento organized Sheet Metal Workers' Union No. 2, elected delegates to the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento; that said delegates applied for admission and were admitted to membership in the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, and ever since such admission said affiliations have continued and still continue. It further appears that the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento is composed of delegates representing the various local unions existing in the city of Sacramento. It further appears that, after the refusal of the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento to admit the delegates of Sheet Metal Workers' Union, Local No. 162, the matter of the status of the delegates of Local No. 2 was brought before the annual convention of the Building Trades Council of the State of California, in March, 1923; that said Building Trades Council of the State of California approved, ratified, and confirmed the action of the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, in seating delegates representing Local No. 2, and refusing to seat delegates representing Local No. 162; that thereafter the question in dispute was taken to the executive council (Building Trades Department) in behalf of said Local No. 162; that said executive council is composed of the officers of said Building Trades Department, the allegation of the complaint being that the executive council conducts all business of said Building Trades Department between conventions of said department; that said executive council, under the rules and regulations of said department, and according to the practice of said department, is a duly and regularly constituted tribunal for the purpose of hearing, between conventions of said department, disputes and grievances which may arise in connection with or among members of organizations affiliating with said department; that thereupon the said executive department rendered its decision and recommendation as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal. March 30, 1923.

"At a meeting of the International Officers of the Building Trades Department, held at the Stowell Hotel at 10 a. m. on March 30, 1923, the following decision was arrived at:

"It is decided that all building trades organizations in Los Angeles shall affiliate with the existing chartered council.

"It is further decided that the basis of representation of all local unions shall be in accordance with the laws of the Building Trades Department.

"It is also decided that all independent or dual local unions associated with the State Building Trades Council of California, or local building trades councils, shall be immediately dropped from membership, and that the State Building Trades Council and local councils use their good offices to have said independent or dual locals affiliate with their respective International Unions.

"Unanimously adopted as read.

"William J. Spencer, Secretary-Treasurer."

It is further alleged that this decision was forwarded to the Building Trades Council of the State of California, and also to the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, but that said Building Trades Council of the State of California and the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento have disregarded the same, and that the next tribunal before which that matter can be heard is the annual convention of said Building Trades Council Department of the American Federation of Labor, and that such convention will not be held until October, 1923, or thereabouts, and will be held in the city of Portland, state of Oregon.

The by-laws of the Building Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, in relation to membership in local councils, provide as follows:

"Sec. 3: Membership in this council shall be confined to local unions in good standing with international unions affiliated with the Building Trades Department, which local unions must be accepted on application.

"Sec. 4. Affiliation of local unions by their national or international unions with this local council shall be required, and affiliation with central labor unions chartered by the American Federation of Labor where such central bodies exist shall be a qualification for membership in this council."

The constitution and by-laws of the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, in so far as pertinent to this action, are as follows:

"Section 1: The revenue of this council shall be derived from a per capita tax levied monthly, or as the council may require, on all affiliated unions for the legitimate work and general support of the council and its constituency."

As to membership, the following appears:

"Section 1. Any union applying for membership in this council shall be referred to the organizing committee, which shall investigate the application and report upon the same to the council at its next regular meeting whereupon a motion to admit shall be decided by a majority vote.

"Section 2. A motion to admit being carried, the organizing committee shall investigate the credentials of the delegates, and, if it be found that the delegates are members of the organization applying and were properly elected, they shall be seated. The council, however, reserves the right to object to the seating of any, or all delegates, who, in its judgment, are considered undesirable or detrimental to the best interests of the council."

The section of the by-laws relating to quarterly cards reads as follows:

"Section 1. Quarterly working cards shall be issued to unions quarterly two weeks prior to the issue, bearing the seal of the council and recording and corresponding secretary. It shall be the duty of the financial secretary of each affiliated union to attach his signature to each card issued to members thereof.

"Section 2. It shall be imperative for all members affiliated with this council to carry with them their working cards while at work.

"Section 3. It shall be the duty of all members of the union affiliated with this council to show such working card when requested to do so or when challenged by any duly accredited business agent of this council or the steward appointed by the business agent.

"Section 4. A steward shall be appointed on each and every job or building when members of the union in any department of the building industry is going to work thereon; said steward shall carry a stewardship card showing that he has been appointed by a duly authorized business agent of this council, and it shall be the duty of such steward to ascertain before 8 a. m. between M. and 1 p. m. or after 5 p. m. from all men going to work if they carry the current quarterly working card of the council. Should the steward find any man without said card or proper credentials he shall immediately report the fact to the business agent or the secretary of the council at such places as the council may direct."

It is also alleged in the complaint, and appears in the transcript, that the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, pending the time of the settlement of the controversy relating to Local Sheet Metal Workers' Union No. 162 and Local Sheet Metal Workers' Union No. 2, sought to collect from members of said Local No. 162 the sum of $4.50 per quarter, and, in consideration of such payment, agreed to issue to the members of said Local No. 162 quarterly working cards. This sum was to be held in escrow until such time as the controversy should be settled; that some dues were paid under this agreement by Sheet Metal Workers' Union No. 162, when further payment by the members of said No. 162 was refused. The explanation given for the imposition of this tax was to place members of Local No. 162 on an equal footing with Local No. 2, the claim being made that members of Local No. 2 were subject to dues in that amount, in support of their local union and of the Building Trades Council, and that the members of Local No. 162 were not subject to such dues. It further appears that under the rules and regulations of the Building Trades Council, members of unions not affiliated with the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, were furnished cards authorizing them to work with regularly affiliated union workers, where the circumstances were such that affiliation could not be had. After members of Sheet Metal Workers' Local No. 162 refused to pay any further dues to the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, the matter of members of other building crafts affiliated with the Building Trades Council working on jobs, or rather their inability to work on jobs with persons not holding quarterly working cards, was called to the attention of certain employers, and also to the attention of members of Local No. 162 who were refusing to take out cards, the statement being made that, under the rules of the organization, members of crafts affiliated with the said Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento could not work on jobs where persons were employed not holding quarterly cards, the business agent in one instance stating that he would have to call out the members of regularly affiliated crafts holding cards unless the dues were paid, and also, in one instance, one of the employers paid the dues, which dues were thereafter returned to him. It does not appear that any actual threats were used, but attention was called to the constitution, by-laws, and rules of the Building Trades Council which forbade members of affiliated unions working where there are other employees not holding quarterly cards issued under the authority of the Building Trades Council, and it appears that all parties understood the meaning, force, and effect of the constitution, by-laws, and rules of the Building Trades Council. So far as the record shows, there were no actual acts of violence, intimidation, or force. The influence used was the inference that any one might properly draw from the constitution, by-laws, and rules hereinbefore referred to. None of the employers of any of the parties referred to in this cause are made parties to this controversy. The litigation involves only a dispute between members of the voluntary associations named herein, and the injunction or restraining order was issued at the instigation of one group, enjoining and restrain-ing the members of another group from refusing to work with the first group, and also restraining the collection of money.

Sheet Metal Workers' Union, Local No. 2, referred to herein, is an independent voluntary association affiliated with the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, but having no charter connection with any branch of the American Federation of Labor. This local is not made a party to this action and therefore is not further mentioned herein.

[1, 2] Were this a controversy between members of a voluntary association, as argued in part by the plaintiff, the authorities all agree that courts will not interfere until the aggrieved member has exhausted all his remedies afforded him by the constitution or by-laws of the association. This rule is clearly set forth in 3 California Jurisprudence, p. 354. See, also, Martin on the Modern Law of Labor Unions, § 317, p. 390. The record in this case shows that the question of admitting Local No. 162 to membership in the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento was taken to the state convention of the Building Trades Council of the State of California, and that said Building Trades Council decided adversely to the contentions of Local No. 162; that, thereafter, an appeal was taken to the executive council of the Building Trades Department, and a decision rendered and recommendation made as we have hereinbefore stated; that compliance with the decision and recommendation last herein referred to has been denied and refused, not only by the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, but also by the Building Trades Council of the State of California, of which the defendant Building Trades Council is a dependent member, and that the next tribunal before whom said matter can be heard is the annual convention of the Building Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor meeting at Portland, Or., in October, 1923. Whether further proceedings have been taken to carry the dispute to such convention does not appear from the record. The recommendation of the executive council, however, does not purport to affect or to decide the matter of the admission or nonadmission to membership of Local No. 162, by the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento. The fact that hardship may be suffered during the pendency of the period when such proceedings are being taken and had does not obviate the necessity of their being taken, or furnish any ground for the interposition of a court of equity. Martin on the Modern Law of Labor Unions, supra. The only exceptions to this rule are where the manner of taking the appeal or the proceedings attendant thereupon are made so burdensome as to practically preclude the seeking of redress in this manner. Nothing of that kind appears in this case.

[3, 4] There is no controversy between the parties that, as a general proposition, a court of equity will not interfere to prevent the collection of money; that being a pure matter of law between the respective parties. The law is also well established in this state that the right to quit work, either individually or collectively, cannot ordinarily be restrained. Parkinson Co. v. Bldg. Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 P. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165, and Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 P. 324. The Parkinson Case also lays down the rule that the motive actuating a strike, or the withdrawal of men from employment, is immaterial. Other states have announced a different rule, but the cases which we have cited are controlling here. To meet these objections the plaintiffs argue that there is between the parties a contractual relation, and also a relation of trustee and cestui que trust. Under the fifth subdivision of section 526 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the same numbered subdivision of section 3423 of the Civil Code an injunction to restrain the violation of a contract will not lie except in certain specified cases, of which this case is not one. Is there any such relation between the parties to this action as exists between a trustee and a cestui que trust?

Sheet Metal Workers' Union, Local No. 162, of the City of Sacramento is a voluntary organization chartered by the International Sheet Metal Workers' Alliance, which, in turn, is chartered by and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (Building Trades Department). The Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento is likewise a purely voluntary association, chartered by and affiliated with the Building Trades Council of the State of California, which, in turn, is chartered by and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (Building Trades Department).

[5] The law relating to labor unions in relation to interference by the court as to membership and the enforcement of rules is the same as that applied to other voluntary associations. As heretofore shown, the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, in relation to membership, has adopted a by-law, a portion of which reads as follows:

"The council, however, reserves the right to object to the seating of any, or all, delegates, who, in its judgment, are considered undesirable or detrimental to the best interests of the council."

It is argued that the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento is not governed by this provision of its own by-laws, but is subject to and must act in accordance with the by-law adopted by the Building Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor, which, in relation to Building Trades Councils reads as follows:

"Membership in this council shall be confined to local unions in good standing with international unions affiliated with the Building Trades Department, which local unions must be accepted on application."

As to the precedence to be given to these by-laws, the plaintiff relies upon the following cases: Gilmore v. Palmer, 109 Misc. Rep. 552, 179 N. Y. S. 1, Loftus v. Division No. 7, Ancient Order of Hibernians (N. J. Sup.) 60 A. 1119, and Taylor v. Pettee et al., 70 N. H. 38, 47 A. 733. These cases, however, are not pertinent to the issues here involved. The Loftus Case deals with a by-law limiting the pecuniary benefits to be received by a member, after such member has acquired a pecuniary right and property interest under the by-laws of the parent association. The case of Gilmore v. Palmer, supra, involves the question of the unlawful suspension of a member, and the case of Taylor v. Pettee is based upon the amount of pecuniary benefits to be paid to a deceased member. Thus all of these cases have to do with the property rights of members after those property rights have been acquired, and are no different from the holding of many other cases that courts of equity will interfere to prevent the unlawful expulsion of a member, or the unlawful deprivation of his property rights by voluntary associations.

Lack of membership is the fundamental defect apparent in the instant case. Were the court to decree admission to membership, the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, being a purely voluntary association, could immediately defeat that decree by voluntary dissolution, but, when property rights are involved, the decree of the court cannot be so defeated. This statement shows that courts of equity will interfere in the one case, and not in the other. Jurisdiction in the one instance is founded upon property rights, and the protection of the rights of a member; jurisdiction is lacking in the other case for want of such conditions.

[6, 7] It must be remembered that all of these associations are purely voluntary organizations, not governed by any statutes, and therefore permitted, so far as the law is concerned, to adopt any regulations they may see fit in relation to their local membership. If such local regulations are in conflict with the rules and regulations of what is called the "parent organization," or the rules and regulations governing the Building Trades Council of the State of California, then, and in that case, it is the province of the Building Trades Council of the State of California to take such measures as it may deem wise or expedient to establish harmony in the rules governing both the state and the local associations. When the fact of membership has once been established, the court will, where property rights are involved, restrain the violation of the rules governing voluntary associations at the behest of any one who has suffered injury by such violations. But this relationship must first be established, and until it is established the parties are independent of each other. In the instant case the plaintiffs are not members of the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, and they have no representation in such council. We do not well see how the relation of trustee and cestui que trust can be held established or shown in this case so long as membership by Local No. 162 in the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento is wanting. In 3 California Jurisprudence, 350, § 5, the rule as to membership is stated as follows:

"Membership in a voluntary association is not a right which can be gained independently and then enforced. It is rather a privilege which may be withheld, or accorded on such terms and conditions as the association sees fit to impose. Once acquired, it is a personal right, which, resting as it does in contract, can only be divested in the manner provided in the contract. The holder of such personal right of membership will be protected against any unauthorized act or proceeding on the part of his fellow members, either as individuals, or in their official or collective capacity, by which his enjoyment of such right will be impaired or destroyed."

[8] When this membership has once been acquired, protection against illegal expulsion will be afforded by the courts. Dingwall v. Amalgamated Ass'n, etc., 4 Cal. App. 565, 88 P. 597. Whether any power exists on the part of the Building Trades Council of the State of California or on the part of the American Federation of Labor (Building Trades Department) to impose any penalties, fines, or impositions upon the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, for and on account of its refusal to admit delegates from Local No. 162 to its membership, is immaterial, because, until that membership is established, the right to protection under the rules and regulations adopted governing voluntary associations has no application. We have not been cited to any authority holding that the courts have any power to enforce the admission of members; the only rule which we have discovered is that which we have quoted from 3 California Jurisprudence.

[9] The fact that one may suffer injury by reason of nonadmission to membership in a voluntary association, affords no ground for relief. "Membership in a voluntary association is a privilege which the society may accord or withhold at its pleasure, and a court of equity will not interfere to compel the admission of a person not regularly elected, even though the arbitrary rejection of the candidate may prejudice his material interests, where no rights of property or of person are affected, and no rights of citizenship are infringed upon." 5 C. J. § 64, p. 1353. A long list of authorities is there cited in support of the rule just stated. In the case of Mayer v. Journeymen Stonecutters' Ass'n, 47 N. J. Eq. 519, 20 A. 492, the court followed the rule that no jurisdiction exists to compel the admission to membership in voluntary associations of persons not elected according to the rules and by-laws of the association. They will interfere only after one has become a member to prevent the violation of some by-law or to protect or enforce a right acquired by becoming a member. This case is almost identical with the one at bar. A number of individuals were denied admission to the Journeymen Stonecutters' Association, and it is alleged that an attempt was being made to prevent such nonmembers from working at their trade and coercing and intimidating them by refusal of members to work in the same shops with the said nonmembers. After alleging these matters, the complaint in the case further sets forth that, in consequence of their exclusion from membership, they had been deprived of the power of exercising their trade in which they could have made a living and supported their families, and have been compelled to abandon their trade and work at inferior labor at lower wages; that two master stonecutters were at the time of the application to membership in the association in need of larger numbers of skilled journeymen stonecutters than they could obtain from among the members of the association, and would have given them employment but from the danger to their business which they knew would ensue, and that for these reasons they were obliged to refuse, and did refuse, to employ the two men. All of these matters are particularly set forth at great length and particularly detailed. The court said:

"It appears that the complainants Hahn and Zimmerman did make some effort to obtain admission into the defendant association, but it is quite clear that they did not make application for membership regularly, as required by the by-laws, and that the question was never considered or passed upon by that body. But, if it were otherwise, has this court power to require the admission of a person to membership in a voluntary association, when it has been denied by the society? These organizations are formed for purposes mutually agreed upon; their right to make by-laws and rules for the admission of members and the transaction of business is unquestionable; they may require such qualifications for membership and such formalities of election as they choose; they may restrict membership to the original promoters, or limit the number to be thereafter admitted. The very idea of such organizations is association mutually acceptable, or in accordance with regulations agreed upon; a power to require the admission of a person in any way objectionable to the society is repugnant to the scheme of its organization. While courts have interfered to inquire into and restrain the action of such societies in the attempted exclusion of persons who have been regularly admitted to membership, no case can, I think, be found where the power of any court has been exercised, as sought in this case, to require the admission of any person to original membership in any such voluntary association. Courts exist to protect rights, and where the right has once attached they will interfere to prevent its violation, but no person has any abstract right to be admitted to such membership; that depends solely upon the action of the society, exercised in accordance with its regulations, and, until so admitted no right exists which the courts can be called upon to protect or enforce." (Supra.)

In Harris v. Thomas (Tex. Civ. App.) 217 S. W. 1068, quoting from page 1076, the law in relation to membership in voluntary associations is thus stated:

"A voluntary association has the power to enact laws governing the admission of members and to prescribe the necessary qualification for membership. Mayer v. Stonecutters' Association, 47 N. J. Eq. 519, 20 A. 492. Membership therein is a privilege which the society may accord or withhold at its pleasure, with which a court of equity will not interfere, even though the arbitrary rejection of the candidate may prejudice his material interest. McKane v. Adams, 123 N. Y. 609, 25 N. E. 1057, 20 Am. St. Rep. 785; Branagan v. Buckman, 67 Misc. Rep. 242, 122 N. Y. Supp. 610. Courts sometimes interfere where members have been wrongfully excluded or expelled, but as a rule they do not interfere with the right of an association to make laws or rules, unless they are against good morals or violate the laws of the state. The courts of this state recognize the general principles above announced."

[10] In the language of the Supreme Court of New Jersey as set forth, supra, we may add no case has been called to our attention where the power of the court has been exercised to enforce admission of membership in a voluntary association. The legal right to exclude Local No. 162 by the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento is fully established by the foregoing authorities, irrespective of its motives in so doing. If, by so doing, it runs counter to some regulation of a superior or parent organization, the penalties to be inflicted, whatever they may be, are matters to be enforced by such superior or parent organization. In the present case, the parent organization of the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento has approved its action, and we have been pointed to no authority, decided case, or by-law which would authorize the court in reversing such action and compelling admission to membership.

The mere fact that the parties involved in this action are members of unions does not obviate the fact that, so far as the record shows, they are members of separate and distinct voluntary organizations, and therefore stand in the same legal relation as would be the case if they were not members of any union. When Local No. 162 forfeited its charter, seceded from the International Alliance of Sheet Metal Workers, and ceased to be a member of the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, it broke away from the relationship argued by counsel, and, before being reinstated and reacquiring the rights which it had theretofore held and enjoyed, it appears that another union of Sheet Metal Workers of the City of Sacramento, known as Local No. 2, was organized, comprising a large percentage of the persons who had theretofore composed Local Union No. 162, and was admitted to seats in the Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento, and this admission and retention of membership by said Local No. 2 has been approved and confirmed by the Building Trades Council of the State of California, the immediate parent organization of the defendant Building Trades Council of the City of Sacramento.

There being nothing in this case which takes it from the rule announced by the Supreme Court in Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, supra, and Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, supra, in relation to the right of individuals to withdraw from work, and it being likewise clear that a court of equity will not interfere to prevent an effort to collect money unless other circumstances give rise to the equitable interposition of the court that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is not shown to exist, it follows that there is nothing in the complaint or the record to support the temporary injunction issued herein.

It is therefore ordered that the order heretofore entered herein that the judgment herein appealed from be reversed stand as the order of this court. It is further ordered that the petition for a rehearing herein be and the same is hereby denied.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
v. BOYLE, City Auditor. (S. F.
No. 11352.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 21, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨224—Municipality held authorized to lease real estate.

Under charter of San Francisco, art. 1, § 1, art. 2, c. 2, § 12, relating to purchase and condemnation of real and personal property, it had power to enter into a lease of privately owned real estate.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨224—Lease included in power to hold property.

Generally, broad power under a charter to purchase and hold real and personal property includes lesser power to lease same classes of property.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨59—Municipality has only express powers and those necessarily incident thereto.

Municipal corporations have only powers expressly conferred, and such as are necessarily incident to those expressly granted or essential to declared objects and purposes of corporation.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨224—Agreement, though denominated "lease," held agreement to purchase.

Agreement by municipality to acquire land and buildings for public uses, though denominated a lease, held to constitute an agreement to purchase, where its ultimate end was purchase of such property by municipality, and alleged "lessor" was to acquire no pecuniary advantage from use thereof by municipality during agreement, except application of revenues to payment of its bonds, and whatever advantage might accrue to it by municipality's exercise, or failure to exercise, alleged option to purchase property.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨224—Agreement held not lease, though purchase of premises was optional.

Agreement by municipality to acquire land and buildings for public uses did not constitute a lease, though purchase of premises was stated to be optional, where failure to consummate purchase price would result in loss to municipality, not only of primary and succeeding annual payments, which it was bound to make under agreement, but also usufruct of property during period of its occupation, and property itself.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨864(1)—Agreement to acquire land held to create "liability," within constitutional restriction.

Agreement to acquire land and buildings for public uses, though denominated a lease, by which municipality bound itself to pay two bond issues of "lessor," and to exercise an option to purchase property, or forfeit certain payments, which it was required to make under agreement, and use of property and property itself, created a "liability," in violation of Const. art. 11, § 18, providing that no city shall incur any indebtedness or liability exceeding in any year income and revenue provided for such year without assent of two-thirds of qualified electors thereof.

7. Mandamus ⇨168(2)—Burden on petitioners to show that indebtedness was not in violation of Constitution.

Petitioners, seeking by mandamus, under Code Civ. Proc. 1138-1140, to compel auditor of municipality to audit a claim, had burden of showing affirmatively that auditor's objection that claim required municipality to incur an indebtedness and liability, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 18, was not founded in fact.

8. Municipal corporations ⇨867(2), 868(1)—Agreement to purchase land held void for want of election, and tax levy to pay indebtedness created.

Agreement by city and county of San Francisco to acquire land and buildings for public uses, if constituting an agreement to purchase, and requiring municipality to create obligations exceeding its revenue for every year during term of agreement, held void in view of Charter, art. 16, § 29, and art. 12, where no election was to be held to authorize obligations assumed or tax levied for payment thereof.

Application for writ of mandate by the City and County of San Francisco, to be directed against Thomas F. Boyle, as Auditor of such city and county, to compel him to audit and approve a certain demand for $100,000 for development of the Marina. Writ denied.

George Lull, City Atty., and Chas. S. Perry, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Edward F. Moran, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Chauncey F. Eldridge, of San Francisco (George O. Bahrs, of San Francisco, of counsel), for San Francisco Exposition Company.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, amici curiae.

Wright, Wright & Stetson, of San Francisco, for San Francisco Chamber of Commerce.

Edgar D. Peixotto, of San Francisco, for Central Bureau and Program Committee of San Francisco Organizations, California Industries Exposition, and Down Town Association, amici curiae.

RICHARDS, J. This application for a writ of mandate was presented to this court upon an agreed statement of facts. The petitioners purport to make the application under the provisions of sections 1138 to 1140, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which relate to the submission of controversies which might be the subject of a civil action to courts which would have jurisdiction of such action, upon an agreed statement of facts. It is not necessary to determine whether these sections of the code have application to the submission of causes to this court, since the facts set forth in the application herein would suffice to support the issuance of a writ of mandate if, as a matter of law, such writ should issue. The stipulation of the respondent, taken with his appearance upon the hearing, amounts to a return admitting the facts, but demurring to the sufficiency of the application as a matter of law. The petitioners herein seek to compel the respondent, as auditor of the city and county of San Francisco, to audit and approve a certain claim and demand in favor of the petitioner San Francisco Exposition Company in the sum of $100,000, based upon certain proceedings had and taken by and before the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, pursuant to which a certain agreement was entered into between said municipality and the exposition company by which agreement the payment from the former to the latter of the said sum of $100,000 was provided for. The questions presented for our consideration upon this application involve the validity of said agreement. From the agreed statement of facts herein, it appears that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco in its budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, under the head of "Miscellaneous accounts under the control of the board of supervisors," included the following item: "No. 82. To initiate the development and improvement of the Marina—$100,000." The "Marina" referred to in the foregoing allocation of said sum of money consists of several blocks of land in the northern portion of said municipality lying along the shore line, near the Golden Gate entrance to San Francisco bay, and being intersected by several public streets, but at present unoccupied by any substantial improvements. On April 28, 1924, the said board of supervisors passed and adopted the following resolution, which was, on May 9, 1924, approved by the mayor, viz.:

"Resolution No. 22387. New Series. Resolved that the sum of $100,000 be and the same is hereby set aside and appropriated out of 'To initiate development and improvement of the Marina,' budget item 82, fiscal year 1923, 1924, authorized in payment to San Francisco Exposition Company, as first payment for certain grounds and buildings to be used for exposition grounds and buildings, pursuant to subdivision A, section 2, of that certain agreement, approved March 27, 1924, by ordinance No. 6180 (new series), between San Francisco Exposition Company, a corporation, and city and county of San Francisco."

The petition herein alleges that pursuant to said resolution and of the agreement referred to therein, and on April 30, 1924, a demand was duly presented to the respondent herein, as auditor of the city and county of San Francisco, for the audit and approval of said claim for said sum of $100,000 and that the said respondent refused to audit or approve said claim and demand, and still refuses so to do, basing his said refusal upon certain specified objections going in the main to the validity of the said agreement upon which said claim and demand were based. The agreement referred to in the foregoing resolution and demand purports to have been entered into between the San Francisco Exposition Company, a corporation, and the city and county of San Francisco, and bears date of April 16, 1924. It embraces a description of the several blocks of land above referred to. It recites that:

"Whereas, it has been proposed that the company construct on said tracts of land a building suitable for the holding therein of agricultural exhibits and fairs, exhibitions of horses, cattle and other livestock, and of agricultural, viticultural, mechanical, manufacturing and domestic products, pageants, athletic exhibitions and other exhibitions and performances designed to foster and stimulate the business and welfare of the people of the city;

"And whereas, by reason of the public nature of the purposes for which said premises are to be used, it is desirable that the same should immediately come under the control of the city and should ultimately be owned by it;

"And whereas, the company proposes to raise the funds necessary to acquire said lands, and to construct thereon said building, by authorizing and selling an issue of its bonds in the amount of one million two hundred thousand (1,200,000) dollars secured by first mortgage upon said premises, and an issue of its bonds in the amount of six hundred thousand (600,000) dollars secured by second mortgage upon said premises, each of which mortgages shall be executed by the company to Anglo-California Trust Company, as trustee (hereinafter termed the 'trustee'), and shall each bear date the 1st day of January, 1924."

Following these recitals the agreement proceeds to provide that the exposition company shall proceed to acquire the foregoing tracts of land, and to construct thereon a building substantially in accordance with plans and specifications, which are annexed to said agreement, and which building is after its construction to be approved by the architect of said exposition company, whose approval thereof is to be binding upon both of the parties to said agreement. The agreement then proceeds to state that:

"The company hereby leases said premises to the city for the term commencing with the 31st day of December, 1924, and ending with the 15th day of December, 1941, subject to and in consideration of the following conditions and agreements of the city, to wit:"

Then follow the terms and conditions of said agreement, the first of which is the requirement that the city of San Francisco shall forthwith pay to the exposition company the sum of $100,000. It is the payment of said sum to the demand for which the respondent refuses to give his official audit and approval. The agreement further provides:

"2. (a) The city agrees to pay to said trustee, for account of the Company, in gold coin of the United States, the following sums strictly at the times following, to wit: * * * On the 15th day of December of each of the years from and including 1924 to and including 1941, the sum of one hundred and eighty-five thousand (185,000) dollars. Any of said sums in this section 2 mentioned, or any part thereof, may, at the option of the city, be paid prior to the date herein specified for the payment thereof.

"(d) Said lease shall take effect on the date in this section above specified as the time of commencement of the term thereof, and all payments in this indenture agreed to be made by the city shall be made at the times hereinabove specified, notwithstanding said building shall not be then completed.

"(h) Said lease shall not terminate, nor shall the city be relieved of its obligation to make the payments, or any thereof herein specified, by reason of loss or damage by fire or otherwise to said building; but the city in such event shall, with reasonable diligence cause said building to be restored, and for this purpose it shall be entitled to use (so far as required) all insurance moneys received and held by said trustee.

"(k) The city further agrees that, during the term of this agreement, it shall include in each of its annual budgets such amounts and sums as shall be requisite in order that the payments herein required to be made by the city shall be made at the time and in the manner herein specified, and that it will also take any and all other steps necessary or advisable in order that each and all of its covenants herein contained may be performed as herein provided. The city further agrees that in the event that it shall fail to perform any of its agreements in this indenture contained, and any suit or suits shall be brought by the company and/or by said trustee against the city or any of its officers in respect thereof, which suit or suits shall result in judgment in favor of the company and/or said trustee, the city will pay on demand the reasonable costs and attorneys' fees of the company and/or trustee in such suit or suits."

[1,2] The first contention which the respondent makes in support of his refusal to audit and approve said demand is the contention that the city and county of San Francisco has, under the terms of its charter, no power to enter into a lease of privately owned real estate. We are disposed to hold that this general objection is without merit. The charter of said municipality, in article I, section 1, thereof, provides that it "may purchase, receive, hold and enjoy real and personal property." By article II, chapter II, section 12, of said charter, the board of supervisors are given power "to purchase or acquire by condemnation such property as may be needed for public use." Certain other sections of said chapter contain provisions regulatory of the method and exercise of the foregoing powers, but we are directed to no other article or section of said charter which undertakes to place any such limitation upon the amplitude of the foregoing powers as the respondent herein would have us impose. On the other hand, it is a general rule of interpretation applicable to charters that the broad power to "purchase, receive, hold and enjoy real and personal property" embraces and includes the lesser power to lease the same classes of property. 3 Dillon Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) p. 1593; Hackett v. Emporium Borough School Dist., 150 Pa. 220, 24 A. 627; 28 Cyc., pp. 604, 605, and cases cited. The succeeding contentions of the respondent go to the substance and effect of the agreement itself rather than to its own definition of its name or nature; and in this connection it may be well to refer to the language used by this court in the case of Parke, etc., Co. v. White River L. Co., 101 Cal. 37, 39, 35 P. 442, 443, wherein, in construing the document presented in that case and which purported on its face to be a "lease," this court said:

"This paper was not a lease. Calling it a lease did not establish the fact. This is peculiarly a case where there is nothing in a name, for the contents of the paper determine its true character. It is said in Heryford v. Davis, 102 U. S. 235: 'What then is the true construction of the contract? The answer to this question is not to be found in any name which the parties may have given to the instrument, not alone in any particular provisions it contains disconnected from all others, but in the ruling intention of the parties gathered from all the language they have used. It is the legal effect of the whole which is to be sought for. The form of the instrument is of little account.'"

[3,4] It may also be said in this connection that while it is true, as was stated by this court in the case of Egan v. City and County of San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576-581, 133 P. 294, 295 (Ann. Cas. 1915A, 754), that "the trend of authority, in more recent years, has been in the direction of permitting municipalities a wider range in undertaking to promote the public welfare or enjoyment," it is also true, as stated in the same case, that the elementary rule still obtains that "municipal corporations have only the powers expressly conferred, and such as are necessarily incident to those expressly granted, or essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation." Dillon, Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 357; Von Schmidt v. Widher, 105 Cal. 151, 38 P. 682; Gassner v. McCarthy, 160 Cal. 82, 116 P. 73. It may also be suggested that the objects and purposes for the consummation of which the agreement under consideration has been entered into by the parties thereto, are such as are embraced within the powers and functions which may be beneficially exercised by or on behalf of said municipality and its people under the conferred powers of its charter; and that the motives of those persons who, on behalf of said municipality and of said corporation, have promoted the entering into and furtherance of the agreement in question are public spirited and unselfish, and are not tinctured with any suggestion of personal advantage. But as this court has already said in the Egan Case:

"However worthy the motive, however advantageous to the public the result sought to be attained, it must always be remembered that municipal corporations are public bodies of limited powers, and that the validity of their acts must be judged by an examination of the charter or law defining their powers, rather than by a view of the purposes or results of those acts."

Bearing in mind the foregoing principles which must govern the action of this court, we address ourselves to an interpretation of the written agreement upon the basis of which this writ is sought, for the purpose of resolving upon its real scope and effect regardless, in a certain measure, at least, of the phrases which are made use of within it purporting to define its nature. The agreement is by its express terms denominated a "lease," but, if we are permitted to look to the stipulation of the parties to said agreement accompanying the application for this writ and made a part of its averments, the ultimate purpose of this agreement, and of the activities and conduct of the parties thereunder, is "to the end that said municipality shall be entitled to acquire said lands and buildings at the actual cost thereof to said San Francisco Exposition Company." And even if we are to disregard said stipulation and look only to the content of the agreement itself, we can arrive at no other conclusion than that the agreement in question is not a lease merely, nor a lease with an option to purchase merely, but that when read in the light of the subject to which it relates, and when construed as a whole, with a view to determining the end of its creation, it is nothing more nor less than an agreement for the conditional sale of the premises described within it to the municipality for public uses, in accordance with the terms and conditions which said agreement contains. The agreement itself declares in the opening recitals thereof that the purpose for which the exposition company has obtained options to purchase said lands, and for which it intends to acquire the same, is that of constructing thereon a building at a cost of approximately $1,800,000 (including the purchase price of said land), "such building to be suitable for the holding of agricultural exhibits and fairs, exhibitions of horses, cattle, and other livestock, and of agricultural, viticultural, mechanical, manufacturing and domestic products, pageants, athletic exhibitions and other exhibitions and performances designed to foster and stimulate the business and welfare of the people of the city." This recital is immediately followed by another declaring that "by reason of the public nature of the purposes for which said premises are to be used, it is desirable that the same should immediately come under the control of the city, and should ultimately be owned by it." These recitals dominate the entire agreement, and bind the parties thereto to the admission that the ultimate end of its creation is the ownership by the municipality of the lands and premises in question, and for the public uses and purposes set forth therein.

When we pass from the recitals of said agreement to the covenants thereof we find that while the instrument embodying the mutual agreements of the parties is denominated a "lease," certain of the usual elements of a lease are lacking. For example, there is no fixed or determinable rental for the premises, the possession of which is to be transferred to the municipality as of the date of said agreement. True, the municipality is to pay over to the exposition company the sum of $100,000 as of the date of the execution of the agreement, but it is nowhere stated therein that this payment is being made on account of rental or is to be so applied. On the contrary, the fact that at the date of said agreement, which was to be also the date of said payment, the exposition company was not the owner of said property, but had only an option to purchase the same, coupled with the further fact that the premises were at said date unequipped for the public uses for which it was being taken over, and that, before it could be usable for such purposes, extensive and costly structures were to be constructed thereon, occupying much time in their erection, would lead to the somewhat plain inference that the primary payment of $100,000 was intended by the parties to be included in the purchase of the property by the exposition company and was, as to at least some portion thereof, to be accounted for and applied to the ultimate purchase price to be paid by the municipality for the property, in the event that it should acquire the same. The same reasoning is to be applied to the subsequent annual payments of $185,000 to be made by the municipality on the 15th of December of each and every year during the term of said agreement. These payments were not to be received by the exposition company to be applied as rental of the premises, but were to be paid to the trustee named in said agreement, and to be applied by it upon account of the purchase price of the property, upon the exercise by the municipality of its right to purchase the same, and said aggregate sums of money were only to pass to the exposition company upon the failure of the municipality to exercise said right of purchase, or to otherwise keep the covenants of said agreement to be by it performed. The same thing is true of the annual income to be derived by the municipality from the operation of the premises for the public uses to which these lands with the buildings to be erected thereon were to be applied. As to the first $30,000 of these revenues earned in each year, the gross amount thereof was to be paid over by the municipality to the trustee to be held by it and applied to the eventual purchase price of the property. The net earnings annually above that sum were to be similarly applied. In a word, the exposition company, the so-called lessor of said property, was to derive no pecuniary income or advantage from the use thereof by the municipality during the term of said agreement, except in so far as the trustee was to apply such revenues to the payment of its bonds, and also except as to whatever advantage might accrue to it by reason of the exercise or the failure to exercise the so-called option to purchase said property.

Turning now to the advantage, if any, accruing to the municipality from the entering into and operating under said agreement. The prime advantage of a lease to a lessee is the usufruct of the premises during the term thereof. But under this agreement the entire usufruct in the way of the annual income from the use of said property was to be paid over to the trustee to be applied upon the eventual purchase price thereof; or, in the event of the failure of the municipality to consummate such purchase, was to be utterly lost to it. Viewed from either standpoint, therefore, it is seen that those elements which are the usual concomitants of a lease are lacking from this agreement, while, on the other hand, these are the usual and consistent elements entering into agreements for the conditional sale and purchase of real property.

[5] It is, however, claimed by the petitioners that this should not be construed to be such an agreement, because the provision therein for the purchase of the premises by the municipality is expressly stated to be a mere option to purchase, which is not binding upon or enforceable against it. It is to be noted, however, that the agreement to make the several payments to be made by the municipality as a prerequisite to the exercise of the so-called "option" are not in themselves optional. As to the first of such payments the petitioners are united in insisting upon its enforcement by means of this very proceeding; while as to the annual payments of $185,000, to be made by the municipality during the period of 14 years, the entire life of this agreement, or at least until the municipality shall exercise said option, these payments are not only made binding obligations upon the municipality, but are expressly made enforceable by actions to be brought by either the exposition company or the trustee in the event of any default on the part of the municipality in taking the necessary steps provided by its charter for the payment of these obligations. The same compulsions and the same remedies are made applicable to all of the other payments provided for in said agreement, with the possible exception of the obligation on the part of the municipality to assume and pay the bonded indebtedness of the exposition company. A closer reading of this agreement will show, however, that this is an apparent and not a real exception. By the several subdivisions of section 2 of said agreement, the municipality is bound, as we have seen, to make each and all of the annual and other payments provided for in the agreement to the trustee named therein. By the provisions of subdivision 3 of said agreement, the said trustee is required to apply all amounts so agreed to be paid to such trustee (with certain minor exceptions) to the payment of the first and second mortgage bonds of the exposition company and to that purpose only. With each succeeding year during the life of this agreement the voluntary or compelled payments of the obligations of the municipality thereunder accumulate in the hands of the trustee until, as the life of this agreement draws towards its close, these payments aggregate several million dollars, applicable only to the redemption of said bonds, whether the municipality does or does not exercise its so-called option to purchase the said property. It thus appears that while it is not expressly stated in said agreement that the municipality has obligated itself to the payment of the principal and interest of the two bond issues of the exposition company, it has bound itself to do so, in effect, since it is bound to pay over to said trustee the accumulating funds from which said bonds are to be paid. It also quite clearly appears that the so-called option on the part of the municipality to purchase the said property becomes in effect an increasing compulsion upon it to consummate such purchase, since not to do so would result in the irrevocable loss to the municipality, not only of the primary and succeeding annual payments, which it is bound to make under this agreement, but also of the entire usufruct of the property during the period of its occupation, and also of the property itself.

Sufficient has thus far been said as to the real nature and effect of this agreement, as revealed by the recitals and obligations thereof, to lead to the inevitable conclusion that it must be construed to be an agreement for the purchase by the municipality of the property described therein for public uses. Being thus interpreted we are next to consider the obstacles, if any, which the law interposes against the validity and execution of such an agreement as affecting the city and county of San Francisco. Section 18 of article 11 of the state Constitution provides as follows:

"No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district, shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose, nor unless before or at the time of incurring such indebtedness provision shall be made for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also provision to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof on or before maturity, which shall not exceed forty years from the time of contracting the same. * * * Any indebtedness or liability incurred contrary to this provision * * * shall be void."

"The natural and reasonable construction to be given this language," said this court in the case of Higgins v. City of San Diego, 131 Cal. 294, 298, 63 P. 470, 472, "is that all legitimate indebtedness of the municipality for any year must not exceed all the revenues and income provided for that year, and all indebtedness beyond such provision becomes void and cannot be paid out of the funds of a succeeding year or at all except by the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters." In the case of Chester v. Carmichael, 187 Cal. 287, 201 P. 925, it was held that the liability assumed by the city of Sacramento, under the facts as shown in that case, to make certain expenditures of money, annually, for a series of years, amounted to the creation of an indebtedness to the extent of the aggregate of such payments as of the date when the obligation was entered into, and that the above provision of the Constitution was violated thereby. In that case it appeared that certain persons, the owners of a tract of land in Sacramento suitable for park purposes, had executed to the city a conveyance of such land for said purposes upon certain covenants and conditions set forth in the conveyance, and which had been formally accepted by said city. Among these was the condition that the city should annually, and for a period extending over a number of years, expend the sum of at least $5,000 in the improvement and maintenance of said property, such improvement to exceed in cost the sum of $50,000, in addition to the annual cost of maintenance, which was estimated as in excess of $5,000 per annum. The penalty of failure or refusal on the part of the city to make these expenditures was to be the forfeiture of its rights to said property under said conveyance, and the reversion thereof to the grantors. This court held that the obligation thus imposed upon said city by said transaction amounted to the creation of a liability to the extent of the aggregate of such expenditures as of the year and date of the conveyance, and that as such it was an indebtedness and liability created in violation of said constitutional provision. In so declaring this court cited and commented approvingly upon a number of cases from other jurisdictions having a more or less immediate bearing upon the matters involved in the present controversy. Among these was the case of Browne v. City of Boston, 179 Mass. 321, 60 N. E. 934, the facts in which case showed that the city of Boston had made an agreement with the owners of certain lands by which it agreed to purchase said lands for the sum of $226,000, paying $24,000 down, and entering into an arrangement by which the owners were to place mortgages upon said lands for the sum of $202,000, payable three years after date, whereupon the city was to take said lands subject to said mortgages, with no personal liability to pay the same, but with the result that in order to retain the lands the city would be put to the compulsion of paying off the mortgages when due. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that such an arrangement was in violation of the statutory provision of that state limiting the debt liability of cities. In the case of Voss v. Waterloo Water Co., 163 Ind. 69, 71 N. E. 208, 66 L. R. A. 95, 106 Am. St. Rep. 201, 2 Ann. Cas. 978, also cited, the facts were that the town of Waterloo, not having sufficient money to construct a waterworks and electric light plant for the town, and not being able to borrow the money necessary for such purpose without creating an indebtedness exceeding the constitutional limit, entered into an agreement with a private corporation by the terms of which the latter was to construct such electric light and water plant and issue bonds for the cost thereof, whereupon the town agreed to levy and collect annually taxes, and pay the same to a trustee for the bondholders until such time as a sufficient sinking fund had been created for the payment of such bonds, the city to become eventually the owner of the plant. It was expressly provided in the agreement that there should be no liability upon the town for the payment of such bonds. The court nevertheless held that the agreement created an indebtedness beyond the limit fixed by the Constitution. In the case of Eddy Valve Co. v. Town of Crown Point, 166 Ind. 613, 76 N. E. 537, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 684, also cited and approved, the town of Crown Point, desiring to become the owner of a system of waterworks, entered into an agreement with a private corporation, by the terms of which the latter was to construct said plant, mortgaging the same for that purpose, the town to pay annually certain rentals for the use of hydrants and of water for the inhabitants, and was to have the right at its option to purchase the plant, subject to its incumbrance, but that the town was not to otherwise assume the payment of such incumbrance. The court held that in accepting the conveyance of the property subject to the incumbrance, but without any obligation to pay the same other than that imposed by the liability of a foreclosure of the mortgage, thereby depriving the town of the property, an indebtedness was created beyond the constitutional limitation. In Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 199, the general rule applicable to this class of cases is thus stated:

"If the city purchases waterworks or other valuable property subject to a mortgage, the amount secured by the mortgage is indebtedness of the city even if it do not assume it or become liable for it in any way. In order to keep the property purchased the city will have to pay the mortgage, and if the amount due exceeds the limit of the debt which the city is authorized to incur, the purchase is beyond its power and void."

In the discussion of the case of Chester v. Carmichael, supra, the court considered the similarity of the transaction in that case to that of a purchase of lands upon the installment plan, holding, that in either case, even though the only remedy of the seller for the enforcement of payment was the right to forfeiture, yet the debt was created at the time the contract was entered into for all the sums subsequently to be paid. The court, also, in that case distinguished it from the cases of McBean v. Fresno, 112 Cal. 160, 44 P. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191; Smilie v. Fresno, 112 Cal. 311, 44 P. 556; and Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 176, 76 P. 958, by pointing out that each of the foregoing cases involved contracts for the furnishing to the city in the future of service, materials, etc., and that no indebtedness or liability within the meaning of the constitutional provision in question was incurred until the furnishing of the consideration for which the payments were to be made. The distinction between those cases and that case, and also the instant matter is obvious. The recent decision of this court in the matter of the Controversy, etc., with Boyle, 191 Cal. 172, 215 P. 549, shows that matter to be within the class of cases considered in McBean v. Fresno, supra, and the other like cases cited, and hence distinguishable from the instant case. In the latter case it was held that question of the applicability of section 18 of article XI of the Constitution was removed from inquiry under the stipulated facts of that case.

[6, 7] We are unable to perceive that there is any difference as to the principles involved between the case of Chester v. Carmichael, supra, and the matter here in controversy. The only remaining inquiry is as to the applicability of the constitutional provision to the facts herein agreed upon in the state of the record before us. The petition for a writ of mandate herein is silent as to whether the creation of a liability on the part of the city and county of San Francisco, to the extent of approximately $3,500,000 during the year 1924, would have the effect of causing said municipality to exceed during that year the income and revenue provided for such year. In the agreed statement of facts embodied in said petition it, however, appears that, at the time of the presentation of the aforesaid claim and demand to the auditor, he specified, among the several grounds of his refusal to audit and approve the same, the fact—

"that by said agreement said city and county of San Francisco incurs an indebtedness and liability exceeding in each of the years of the term thereof the income and revenue provided for such year without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof voting at an election held for that purpose, in violation of section 18 of article XI of the constitution of the state of California."

In the presence of this express objection to the audit and approval of said claim and demand, it was, we think, incumbent upon the petitioners herein to show affirmatively, either in their petition or agreed statement of facts, that this objection was not founded in fact. This is particularly true where the municipality itself is seeking to have one of its own officials compelled to act in the approval of an expenditure from its treasury, and when the state of its finances and expenditures for the year in question is peculiarly within its knowledge.

[8] Aside from the constitutional obstacle, which seems to stand in the way of the enforcement of the agreement under review, there are also certain provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco which, it is urged, deny to the city the power to acquire property or construct permanent buildings or improvements above a certain cost without submitting the matter to the vote of the people. Section 29, of article XVI of the charter provides as follows:

"When the supervisors shall determine that the public interest requires the acquisition of any land or lands, or the construction or acquisition of any permanent building or buildings, improvement or improvements, the cost of which, in addition to the other expenses of the city and county will exceed the income and revenue provided for the city and county for any one year, they must, by ordinance, submit a proposition or propositions to incur a bonded indebtedness for such purpose or purposes to the electors of the city and county at a special election to be held for that purpose only. All provisions of this charter, as the same shall read at the time of submitting such propositions to the electors, providing for the acquisition of public utilities, so far as the same are applicable, shall apply to the manner of submitting such proposition or propositions, to the issuance, character, and registration of said bonds and to the time when, and the kind of money in which said bonded indebtedness shall be payable."

Article XII of the said charter, to which the foregoing provision refers for its procedure, embraces an elaborate plan for the acquisition of public utilities, which need not be here recited, but with reference to which it will suffice to say that, in the agreed statement of facts which are embodied in the petition for this writ, it is expressly set forth:

"That no election has been called nor will any be held for the purpose of authorizing the incurring by said city and county of San Francisco of the liabilities assumed by it in and by said agreement, and no provision has been made, and it is intended that no provision shall be made, for the levy or collection by said city and county of an annual or other tax sufficient to pay the interest on said indebtedness created by said agreement, nor any part thereof, nor for the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of the principal of said indebtedness."

This stipulation and averment amounts to a frank avowal that the foregoing provisions of the charter relating to the acquisition of these properties for public uses are not being and are not to be complied with; and if the nature of this agreement is as we have construed it to be, and if, as we have seen, the statement of the auditor in refusing to audit and approve the present demand, to the effect that said agreement has the effect of creating obligations exceeding the income and revenue of the municipality for each and every year during the term thereof, is to be taken to be true because uncontroverted, it follows inevitably that said agreement is wholly void as in violation of the express requirements of these provisions of said charter.

There are a number of other respects in which, as urged by the respondent or by amicus curiæ, this agreement is obnoxious to the provisions of the state Constitution, or of the charter of said municipality, and which, though fully considered, we do not deem it necessary to discuss in this opinion, having thus far based our conclusions upon what appear to be vital points involved in this controversy. There are also certain technical objections urged by the respondent against his present audit or approval of the claim and demand which form the immediate reason for seeking this writ, but which we have not considered because of the evident desire of the parties hereto that our decision should go to the ultimate question as to the validity of this agreement, rather than that it should be based upon any matter that might be remedied in a later proceeding.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

In re STEEHLER'S ESTATE.

STEEHLER et al. v. RILEY, State Controller.

(L. A. 8040.)

Rehearing Denied March 16, 1925.)

1. Taxation $\S$ 860—Rule of strict construction against state applicable in determining whether Inheritance Tax Act imposes tax on family allowances.

Rule that statutes imposing taxes must be strictly construed in favor of individual and against state applies in determining whether St. 1917, p. 880, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1500, imposes inheritance tax on family allowances.

2. Taxation $\S$ 866—No inheritance tax on family allowance to widow and minor children of deceased.

St. 1917, p. 880, §§ 1(3), 2(1), as amended by St. 1921, p. 1500, in view of history of legislation, imposes no inheritance tax on family allowance to widow and minor children of deceased; section 2(1), imposing tax on transfers by court orders "setting apart" property referred to in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 963, 1464-1470, 1486, 1719.

3. Taxation $\S$ 860—Exemption provisions of Inheritance Tax Act construed strictly against claimant.

Exemption provisions of Inheritance Tax Law of 1921 should be construed liberally in favor of state and strictly against those claiming exemptions.

4. Statutes $\S$ 225—Rule that latest of two statutory provisions must be given effect inapplicable, unless irreconcilable conflict clearly appears.

Rule that when two provisions in statute are irreconcilable, one last adopted must be given effect, is one of necessity, and should not be applied, unless irreconcilable conflict clearly appears.

5. Taxation — 886½ — Entire amount of property transferred above $25,000 taxed at increased rate by deducting exemption from first $25,000.

St. 1921, p. 1500, § 6, subd. 6, requiring deduction of exemptions, therein allowed from "aggregate" amount of property transferred, and taxation of transfer of remainder at same rates as if exemption were not allowed, does not change rule, under St. 1905, p. 341, §§ 1-4, that entire amount of property transferred be considered in fixing rate, and hence that amount above $25,000 be taxed at increased rates, under section 3, by deducting exemption from first $25,000.

6. Statutes — 245 — Interpretation of statutory provisions which lays burden uniformly on all standing in same degree with relation to tax adopted.

Where two interpretations of statutory provisions imposing or exempting from taxes are urged, that should be adopted which lays burden of taxation uniformly on those bearing it, and standing in same degree with relation to tax.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William A. Steehler, deceased. From an order confirming inheritance tax appraiser's report and fixing amount of tax to be paid by deceased's widow, Rose H. Steehler, and minor daughter, the former, as administratrix, and others appeal, Ray L. Riley, as State Controller, appearing as respondent. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part, with directions.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles (John N. Cramer, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Ralph W. Smith, State Inheritance Tax Atty., and Wesley E. Marten, Asst. State Inheritance Tax Atty., both of Sacramento (Erwin P. Werner, of Los Angeles, Adrian C. Stanton, of Sacramento, and Ida V. Wells, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the administratrix and heirs of William A. Steehler, deceased, from an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county, confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser and fixing the amount of inheritance tax to be paid by the widow and minor daughter of said deceased. The facts of the case are conceded to be correctly set forth by the appellants in their opening brief and are as follows: William A. Steehler died intestate in Los Angeles county on August 28, 1921, leaving a widow, Rose H. Steehler, and a minor daughter, Rosemary Hastings Steehler, as his only heirs at law. The estate, which was appraised at about $229,000 consisted entirely of personal property. Letters of administration were issued to the widow by the superior court of the county of Los Angeles. Pursuant to orders of that court, she paid, as administratrix, to herself as widow, sums awarded as a family allowance, aggregating $12,600. In due course the state inheritance tax appraiser filed her report. She did not deduct any of said sums paid as a family allowance in order to determine the clear market value of said property, but, having computed the market value at a sum including the family allowance, she then deducted the sum of $10,800 (the amount which had been paid as family allowance to the date of the report), in order to, and "only in order to add said sum of $10,800 to said taxable estate and thus tax said sum to the said Rose H. Steehler, widow, and Rosemary H. Steehler, minor daughter," in the proportions of two-thirds and one-third respectively. Having ascertained in the manner above indicated the amount of taxable property passing to the widow and daughter, the inheritance tax appraiser computed the tax in each instance by deducting the statutory exemption of $24,000 from the first $25,000 taxable to the distributee at 1 per cent. "instead of from the distributive share as a whole." Objections were filed to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser on the grounds: (1) That she erred in failing to deduct the amount paid as a family allowance and in holding that the same was taxable in the proportions of two-thirds and one-third, respectively, against the widow and daughter; (2) that she erred in computing the amounts taxable to the widow and daughter, in each case, by deducting the exemption of $24,000 allowed by law from the first $25,000 taxable at 1 per cent. under the terms of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1921, instead of deducting each of said exemptions of $24,000 from each of the aggregate amounts of property transferred, respectively, and taxing each remainder, after making such deductions, at the rates at which it would have been taxed had no exemptions been allowed. The court overruled said objections and confirmed the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, holding that the family allowance was taxable, adopted the method of calculation employed by the inheritance tax appraiser, and fixed the total tax due from the widow and daughter at $5,789.44. It is from this order that appellants prosecute this appeal. They renew their aforesaid objections upon this appeal. They contend: First, that a family allowance is not taxable under the terms of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1917 as amended in 1921, which act was in force at the date of the decedent's death; second, that the $24,000 exemptions to which the widow and daughter of said decedent were and are entitled should have been deducted from the aggregate amount of property distributable to each heir, rather than from the first $25,000, as was done by said appraiser and approved by said court.

[1] In making each of these contentions the appellants invoke the well-established rule that statutes imposing taxes upon the persons or property of individuals for public purposes are to be strictly construed in favor of the individual and against the state. The respondent, while not denying the rule or opposing the authorities urged in its support, insists that it is not to be given application to the portion of the inheritance tax law which relates to the exemption from or inclusion of family allowances within the provisions of said law, for the reason that the appellants herein are seeking to claim the benefit of an exemption from a tax upon inheritance, the right to which inheritance is itself wholly statutory, and since exemptions from taxation are not favored by law the rule as to strict construction is to be applied to those seeking the exemption and not to the general terms of the act, which should be liberally construed in aid of the legislative intent, citing Cornett's Ex'rs v. Commonwealth, 127 Va. 640, 105 S. E. 231; In re Ferrel's Estate, 112 Wash. 231, 192 P. 12, 11 A. L. R. 820; Dos Passos on Inheritance Tax Law (2d Ed.) p. 74; Estate of Bull, 153 Cal. 715, 96 P. 366. In each of these cases above referred to, however, the courts, and in the case of the text-book citation the author, were dealing with express exemptions in statutes otherwise generally imposing inheritance taxes; and the appellants point out, and we think correctly, that in this branch of the case we are not dealing with the exemption clauses in the statute, but are dealing with the question as to whether the statute in fact imposes a tax upon family allowances, and that to such a case the general rule applies; and they cite in support of this view the cases of Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 64, 204 P. 826; McDougald v. Boyd, 172 Cal. 753, 159 P. 168; and other earlier decisions of this court and which we think justify the application of the rule of strict construction to the provisions of the inheritance tax law here under review.

[2] The provisions of the Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 880) relating to inheritance taxes and which were carried into the act of 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 1500), which amended said former act without change in the particular respect important to the consideration of the questions presented upon this appeal, read as follows:

"Section 1. (3) The word 'transfer' as used in this act shall be taken to include the passing of property or any interest therein, in possession or enjoyment, present or future, by inheritance, descent, devise, succession, bequest, grant, deed, bargain, sale, gift, or appointment in the manner herein described. * * *

"Sec. 2. A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any property, real, personal or mixed, or of any interest therein or income therefrom in trust or otherwise, to persons, institutions or corporations, not hereinafter exempted, to be paid to the treasurer of the proper county, as hereinafter directed, for the use of the state, said taxes to be upon the market value of such property at the rates hereinafter prescribed and only upon the excess over the exemptions hereinafter granted, in the following cases:

"(1) When the transfer is by will or by the intestate or homestead laws of this state, from any person dying seized or possessed of the property while a resident of the state, or by any order of court setting apart property pursuant to article one, chapter five, title eleven, part three of the Code of Civil Procedure."

In the attempt to so interpret the foregoing provisions of the act of 1917, as to support the conflicting claims of each of the parties to this appeal, their respective counsel have chosen to consider the language of the statute above quoted as sufficiently uncertain as to its meaning to require a reference to the provisions of the several earlier acts imposing inheritance taxes in this state, and to our decisions construing the same for the purpose of shedding light upon the proper interpretation of the foregoing provisions of the act here under review. We shall therefore pursue a similar inquiry.

By the Inheritance Tax Law of 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 341) it was provided in section 1 thereof:

"All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person who may die seized or possessed of the same while a resident of this state * * * to any person or persons, or to any body politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, * * * shall be and is subject to a tax hereinafter provided for," etc.

The interpretation of the foregoing provision of said statute came before this court for decision in the case of Estate of Kennedy, 157 Cal. 517, 108 P. 280, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428, in which case the trial court, after making an order for family allowance under the provisions of section 1466 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and after making an order, under section 1465 of the same Code, designating, selecting, and setting apart a probate homestead to the widow, was called upon to fix the amount of the inheritance tax under the statute of 1905. In so doing the court deducted from the whole value of the estate subject to such tax the amount of the family allowance ordered and paid, but refused to deduct the value of the property set apart as a probate homestead. There were separate appeals; the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco appealing from that portion of the court's order refusing to impose the inheritance tax upon the family allowance, and the widow appealing from the portion of said order subjecting the homestead to said tax. In passing upon both appeals in the same decision, this court held that neither the family allowance nor the probate homestead "passed by will or by the intestate tate laws of this state," and hence that neither of said forms of property was subject to the inheritance tax, under the provisions of said statute. The decision in said case was handed down in April, 1910. The Legislature in 1911, with the decision of the Kennedy Case obviously in mind, amended section 1 of the act of 1905 to read in part as follows:

"Section 1. A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any property * * * or of any interest therein or income therefrom * * * in the following cases:

"(1) When the transfer is by will or by the intestate or homestead laws of this state, from any person dying seized or possessed of the property while a resident of the state, or by any probate homestead [act] set apart from said property." Stats. 1911, p. 713.

It would seem clear that in thus amending the former statute the Legislature, while expressly intending to subject homesteads, both statutory and probate, to an inheritance tax, did not intend to include within the terms of said statute family allowances. Two years later, however, the Legislature adopted a new inheritance tax law, revising its prior legislation upon the subject and expressly repealing its former acts, and particularly the act of 1911. In so doing, however, it adopted without change the verbiage of section 1 of the act of 1911, except as to the numbering thereof, making it section 2 of the new act. In subdivision (c) of section 1 of the new statute, it undertook to define the word "transfer" as used in said act as follows:

"(c) The word 'transfer' as used in this act shall be taken to include the passing of property or any interest therein, in possession or enjoyment, present or future, by inheritance, descent, devise, succession, bequest, grant, deed, bargain, sale, gift, or appointment in the manner herein described."

The Legislature also, in reframing section 4 of said act inserted the following significant provision:

"The tax so imposed shall be upon the market value of such property at the rates hereinafter prescribed and only upon the excess over the exemptions hereinafter granted; and provided, that in determining said market value no deduction shall be made for any family allowance made out of said estate." Stats. 1913, pp. 1066-1069.

The effect of the incorporation of this provision in section 4 of said act, which has relation to the lien imposed by, and the method and procedure for, the collection of inheritance taxes, would apparently be that of imposing the burden of the tax not upon the person or persons receiving the family allowance, but upon those persons to whom the property of the estate was otherwise transferred under the terms of section 2 of said act, which, as we have seen, did not, under the former act, include family allowances, and hence cannot be held to have done so under section 2 of the act of 1915, which took over said section of the former act without any change in the verbiage thereof. The Legislature of 1915 undertook to make several amendments to the act of 1913, but made no change in the wording of those portions of sections 1, 2 or 4 to which reference has above been made. The Legislature of 1917 again undertook to enact a new inheritance tax law and to repeal the act of 1913 and all later amendments thereof. It adopted the definition of the term "transfer" as given in said former act, and also adopted much of the language of section 2 of said act. It, however, materially modified the language of subdivision 1 of section 2 of said former act so as to make the same read as follows:

"(1) When the transfer is by will or by the intestate or homestead laws of this state, from any person dying seized or possessed of the property while a resident of the state, or by any order of court setting apart property pursuant to article one, chapter five, title eleven, part three of the Code of Civil Procedure."

It also, in reframing said law, omitted therefrom the provision which had been a part of section 4 of the former act, relating to family allowances and to their inclusion in determining the market value of the estate to be burdened by the tax. It is argued by the respondent herein that such omission was not due to any intent on the part of the lawmakers to relieve those persons who had received family allowances from the burden of inheritance taxes, but that it was due to the change in the wording of subdivision 1 of section 2 of said act, bringing family allowances within its terms. But if, as above stated, we conclude that the provision in section 4 of the act of 1913 did not lay the burden of inheritance taxes upon the recipients of family allowances, at least directly, the above argument would lose its potency, and the respondent would thus be driven to take and maintain the position that the changed language of subdivision 1 of section 2 of the statute of 1917 must in and of itself be interpreted as evincing an intent in the lawmakers to impose upon family allowances an inheritance tax which had not theretofore been imposed by any previous statute. Looking, therefore, to the language of said subdivision, and applying to its terms the principle of strict construction above held to be applicable generally to inheritance tax laws, we find that in addition to the inclusion of transfers by will, or by the intestate or homestead laws of this state within the scope of such taxes, the subdivision also purports to include therein such property of the decedent as had been transferred "by any order of court setting apart property pursuant to article three, chapter five, title eleven, part three of the Code of Civil Procedure." Comparing this subdivision with subdivision 1 of section 1 of the act of 1911, we discover that by the use of the term "homestead laws," in the opening clause in each subdivision, the Legislature intended to refer to homesteads created under statutory homestead laws, as distinguished from so-called "probate homesteads," since the latter are separately specified in the succeeding clause in subdivision 1 of the previous statute; and since in subdivision 1 of the later statute the first clause of the former act is copied in hæc verba, but the succeeding clause thereof relating to "probate homesteads" is omitted, we thus have the situation that, but for the inclusion of the latter portion of subdivision 1, above quoted, in the act of 1917, "probate homesteads" would not have been subjected to an inheritance tax. It is also to be borne in mind that prior to the adoption of the act of 1915 property of an estate exempt from execution and set apart as such for the use of the surviving husband or wife, or in the event of the death of each such survivor to the use of the minor children of the decedent, under the provisions of section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure, had never been subjected to the burden of inheritance taxes. Estate of Kennedy, supra.

The purpose of the lawmakers in reframing subdivision 1 of section 2 of the previous inheritance tax law was to embrace within its terms "probate homesteads" which had theretofore been subjected to the tax by the express terms of the previous act, and to further extend its provisions so as to include "exempt property" which had not theretofore been made subject to the tax. This is made clear by the use of the term "set apart" in said subdivision, and by its reference to the title, chapter, and article of the Code of Civil Procedure in which this term is used in relation to orders of the probate court dealing with the creation of probate homesteads and with the sequestration of those portions of the decedent's property which was by other statutes exempt from execution. When we turn to the said title, chapter, and article of the Code thus referred to we find that it embraces sections 1464 to 1470, inclusive, of said Code, and that these sections deal generally with the subject of provision for the support of the decedent's family; and that among these is section 1466, by the terms of which the probate court is empowered, under certain conditions, "to make such reasonable allowance out of the estate as shall be necessary for the maintenance of the family, according to their circumstances during the progress of the settlement of the estate." Certain other sections of said article refer to probate homesteads and to exempt property; and as to each of these the orders of the court sequestering these forms of the estate's properties are expressly designated as orders "setting apart" such properties for the use of the surviving member or members of the decedent's family. In other portions of the same Code these orders when referred to are designated as orders "setting apart" such homestead or exempt properties. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 963, 1486, 1719. It would thus appear that the phrase "setting apart" has been given a particular meaning as applicable to orders affecting those forms of property to which it is applied in the foregoing sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that this being so the lawmakers made use of this expression in subdivision 1 of section 2 of the Inheritance Tax Law of 1917, as having reference to the particular kinds of property to which it had been applied in the article, chapter and title referred to in said subdivision.

There is much reason for holding that its said use in said subdivision should not be extended to family allowances. The provision for the family of the decedent is one which arises out of the necessities of the situation. By the very terms of the section of the Code, which permits the court to make such allowance, it is only to be made "if the property set apart," that is to say the homestead and exempt property, "is insufficient for the support of the widow and children or either." It is in the nature of a continuance of that contribution to the daily or regular maintenance of the household and its occupants which the decedent himself was accustomed to provide, and would have continued to supply but for his death, and which, if so supplied, would to that extent have diminished the substance of his assets subject to this form of taxation. When allowed by the court in such reasonable amount, and under such circumstances as are prescribed by the statute, it would in the nature of things be disbursed and dissipated in providing for the family necessities pending the settlement of the estate. There is every reason, therefore, why this perishable part of decedent's estate ought not to be diminished by the imposition of an inheritance tax in the absence of a clear intent on the part of the Legislature to so prescribe. We discover no such clear intent either in the past history of inheritance tax legislation in this state, or in the terms of the existing statute, and hence find no difficulty in the way of holding that in so far as the inheritance tax appraiser undertook to impose such tax upon the family allowance made to the widow and minor daughter of said deceased, and in so far as the trial court undertook by its order to approve the action of the inheritance tax appraiser in that regard each of these was in error and that such order should be reversed.

[3] The second contention of the appellants herein is that the inheritance tax appraiser was also in error in computing the amounts taxable to the widow and daughter of the decedent in each case, by the plan of deducting the exemption of $24,000 allowed by the Inheritance Tax Law of 1921, from the first $25,000 taxable at 1 per cent., under the terms of the said law instead of deducting each of said exemptions of $24,000 from each of the aggregate amounts of property transferred respectively, and taxing each remainder after making such deductions at the rates at which it would have been taxed had no exemptions been allowed; and that the trial court was also in error in approving the report of the inheritance tax appraiser based upon such erroneous plan of computation. The appellants use the term "aggregate" as referring to the last $25,000 of the transferred estate. It is claimed that the difference to each of the appellants resulting from this alleged improper method of calculation would amount approximately to $800. It may be here stated that since we are now dealing with the exemptions provided for in the Inheritance Tax Law the provisions of said law applicable to this phase of the present appeal should, under the principles heretofore announced, be construed liberally in favor of the state and strictly as to those claiming the benefit of such exemptions. See Dos Passos on Inheritance Tax Law, and cases cited, supra. In determining the state of the present law as applicable to the question here presented we are again required to have access to the earlier statutes upon the subject and to decisions of this court interpreting the same. The Inheritance Tax Law enacted in 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 341), after declaring in section 1 thereof that all property passing by will, etc., shall be subject to such tax, provides that "the tax so imposed shall be upon the market value of such property at the rates hereinafter prescribed and only upon the excess over the exemptions hereinafter granted." Section 2 fixes certain rates, varying according to the degree of kinship between the decedent and the successor, "when the property * * * exceeds in value the exemption hereinafter specified and shall not exceed in value $25,000." Section 3 declares that the "rates in section 2 are for convenience termed the primary rates" and fixes an increasing scale of rates, consisting of multiples of the primary rates, for the property in excess of $25,000. Section 4 allows exemptions of different amounts to various classes of persons and corporations. In the matter of the Estate of Timken, 158 Cal. 51, 109 P. 608, this court was called upon to interpret the foregoing provisions of the act of 1905 in a case wherein the appellant (in that matter the state) contended that the exemptions provided for in section 4 of said act should be deducted from the amount to which the primary rates were to be applied under the language of section 2 thereof. This court upheld this contention, holding that the entire amount of the property transferred whether exempt or not, was to be considered for the purpose of fixing the rate of taxation, and that it followed necessarily that where the property including the exemption exceeds $25,000 the excess is taxable at the increased rates provided for in section 3 of said act; and that the only way in which this could be accomplished was by deducting the exemption from the first $25,000 rather than from the entire value of the property transferred, and that such interpretation involved no inconsistency between section 1 and the succeeding sections of said act. In so deciding, this court followed the rule of computation which had been already approved in the case of Estate of Bull, 153 Cal. 715, 96 P. 366, although in that case the direct point involved in the Timken Case was not under review. The act of 1905 underwent a number of amendments and revisions, both after its passage in that year and after its interpretation by this court in the foregoing cases, and it is to be noted that during these several amendments to and revisions of said act down even to the year 1921, the foregoing provisions thereof remained practically unchanged, except in a particular hereafter to be noted, the several succeeding Legislatures being apparently satisfied with the terms of the foregoing provisions of the original act and with the interpretation which this court had placed upon the same in the above-cited cases. The act of 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 1500) corresponds as to sections 2, 4, and 5 thereof, in practically identical language with sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Act of 1905, and it would seem to follow that, but for a certain other provision in the act of 1921 which, as claimed by the appellants herein, evinces a different intent, the same interpretation must be given to sections 2, 4, and 5 of the Act of 1921 which this court gave to the similar provisions of the act of 1905 in the cases already referred to. Such was in fact the interpretation given to said sections and in fact to the entire act of 1921 by the respondent in computing the inheritance taxes involved in this branch of this appeal.

[4] The appellants herein, however, contend that an entirely different intent has been expressed by the Legislature in its revision of the inheritance tax laws through the incorporation in the act of 1921 of subdivision 6 of section 6 of said act reading as follows:

"(6) In computing the tax upon transfers subject to tax under the provisions of this act, the exemptions in this section allowed shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of property transferred, and the transfer of the remainder of the property after making such deduction shall be taxed at the rates at which it would have been taxed had no exemption whatever been allowed."

It is the contention of the appellants herein that the insertion of this provision in the act of 1921 evinces a clear intention on the part of the Legislature to abandon the rule for the computation of inheritance taxes declared by this court in Estate of Timken, supra. To adopt this view would be to confess that the earlier provisions in the said act of 1921, and which were retained in it in practically identical form in which were phrased the like provisions in the act of 1905, and which were interpreted to mean what that case said they did mean, are irreconcilable with the said amendment as the appellants interpret it, and to so conclude would be to refuse to give any further force and effect to said earlier provisions in said statute in so far as they relate to the method of computation of such taxes upon the theory that when two provisions in a statute are found to be irreconcilable the one last adopted is to be given effect as the latest expression of the legislative intent. That such is the rule applicable to such a situation may not be gainsaid (Alameda County v. Dalton, 148 Cal. 246, 82 P. 1050, and cases cited), but it is a rule of necessity and ought not to be given application unless and until it shall be made to clearly appear that such irreconcilable conflict between the earlier and the later provisions of the law exists.

[5] Looking to the terms of subdivision 6 of section 6 of the Statute of 1921, we are not satisfied that the interpretation which the appellants insist in placing upon it is the only one which its language, when read as a whole, will bear. It is argued by the appellants that the first half of said provision declaring that "The exemptions in this section allowed shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of property transferred," was intended to provide a different method of computation than that laid down in Estate of Timken, wherein it is stated that the only way to accomplish the result intended by the sections 2 and 3 of the Act of 1905 was by deducting the exemption from the first $25,000 rather than from the entire estate transferred. It is to be clearly kept in mind, however, that exemptions in any event are but deductions from the whole of the estate transferred and are important as affecting the inheritance tax to be computed only when the bases of computation of such tax upon the remainder of such property are to be affected by such deduction. The remainder of the property to be affected by the deduction of the stated exemptions could only be differently affected by taking the exempted amount from the first $25,000, as contrasted with taking it from the last $25,000 of the estate transferred, because the inheritance tax is a progressive tax; or as it is sometimes termed, a "step tax" which increase progressively with the size of the estate transferred. To illustrate: Taking the rule of computation laid down in Estate of Timken, supra, as exemplified in the computation given in that decision and applying it to the instant case we would have the following result in so far as it affects the widow of decedent, one of these appellants herein: Total amount of estate transferred $102,699; exempt under section 6 of said act, $24,000; remainder of estate subject to tax, $78,699; balance of first $25,000 subject to tax ($1,000) of 1 per cent. under section 4 of said act, tax $10; balance under $50,000 subject to tax of 2 per cent. ($25,000) under section 5 of said act, tax $500; balance above $50,000 subject to tax of 4 per cent. ($50,000) under section 5 of said act, tax $2,000; balance of remaining estate subject to tax of 7 per cent. ($2,699) under section 5 of said act, tax $188.94; total tax, $2,698.94. Such would doubtless be the computation if the rule in the Timken Case remained unchanged. Under the appellants' contention that the rule in the Timken Estate has been changed by the provision in the first clause of subdivision 6 of section 6, above quoted, so as to require the exemptions to be deducted from the last instead of the first $25,000 in value of said estate, the result would be that of reducing the tax upon the widow's share to $1,897.67. It is to be noted, however, that the language of the first clause in said subdivision 6, of section 6 of said act above quoted, does not expressly require that the exemptions allowed under said section, while required to be taken from the "aggregate" of the estate transferred, shall be taken out of either the first or the middle or the last of the several classes of said estate to be progressively taxed. In any event, whether taken out of the first or the middle or the last of said classifications, the exemptions to the extent thereof diminish the taxable amount of the estate transferred and are therefore taken out of the aggregate of said estate. If the Legislature had intended by this particular clause in subdivision 6, of section 6 of said act, to effectuate a change in the amount of the tax to be placed upon the unexempted portion of said estate after allowing such exemptions, it would have said so in the latter clause of said subdivision. But when we read the latter clause of said subdivision it would seem to express an exactly contrary intention. Said latter clause in said subdivision reads as follows:

"And the transfer of the remainder of the property after making such deduction shall be taxed at the rates at which it would have been taxed had no exemption whatever been allowed."

This portion of said subdivision is clearly susceptible of the interpretation that the exemptions provided for in the earlier portions of said section may be deducted from the first part of the property transferred which is to be subjected to said exemptions, and afterwards the remainder of the property is to be subjected to such tax. The foregoing interpretation of subdivision 6, of section 6 of said act, either when read separately or together, harmonizes with sections 2, 4, and 5 of the Act of 1921, which, as we have seen, were substantially, and in the main verbally, re-enactments of sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Act of 1905.

The appellants contend, however, that in making such re-enactments of the sections of said earlier statute the Legislature has omitted from section 3 thereof, as it read prior to such re-enactment, the provision that the "rates in section 2 are for convenience termed the primary rates," and that this court, in Estate of Timken, supra, emphasized the phrase "the primary rates" in giving to said sections of said earlier act the interpretation which it is claimed by the respondent their counterpart in the latter statute should bear. It appears, however, that the foregoing sentence in section 3 of the Act of 1905, and which was retained in the revision of said act in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1066), referring to "primary rates," was eliminated therefrom in the amendments of the statute of 1913 by the act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 419). Notwithstanding this elimination of said phrase in the latter year, this court, in the case of Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 64, 204 P. 826, gave to the act of 1915 the same interpretation as that given by it to the act of 1905 in Estate of Timken. It would seem therefore that the omission of the phrase "the primary rates," made in 1915, could have no significance in determining the meaning of the phrase "the aggregate amount of property transferred" as found in the first clause of subdivision 6 of section 6 of the Statute of 1921. We must therefore look elsewhere for the meaning to be given to the latter phrase in order to determine whether it was the intent of the Legislature by its use to change the rule laid down in Estate of Timken. Subdivision 6 of section 6 of the Act of 1921 was adopted and made a part of section 6 of said act at the same time that another important change was made in the matter of exemptions as allowed in former acts. That change is to be found in clause (b) of subdivision 2 of said section 6, which provides for the exemption of "All property transferred by a decedent to any person described in the first subdivision of section four, providing the same was transferred to such decedent not more than five years prior to his death by another decedent of the class described in the first subdivision of section four, and a tax paid thereon." By reading the clause just quoted in connection with clause (a), which immediately precedes it, and also in connection with subdivision 1 of section 4 of the same act to which it refers, it will be seen that the persons described in clause (a) of said section 6, and who are also embraced in the enumeration of relatives of the decedent given in subdivision 1 of section 4 of said act, are or may become the beneficiaries to two different kinds of exemptions under the terms of section 6 of the Act of 1921. This condition having for the first time been recognized and dealt with in our inheritance tax laws, it became necessary to define the method of making these two sorts of exemptions in estates wherein the facts justified their application and of computing the inheritance tax upon the remainder of such estates after such exemptions had been made. Hence, the addition of subdivision 6 to said section 6 so as to provide that in those estates where these two sorts of exemptions might occur the aggregate of the estate transferred was in each case to be taken in making the deductions due to these and each of these exemptions, and that as to the remainder of the estate, it should be taxed at the rates at which it would have been taxed had no exemptions been allowed. When the entire content of section 6 of said act is thus considered the scope and purpose of subdivision 6 thereof would seem to be entirely plain, and thus interpreted it is again found to be in entire harmony with the earlier provisions of said act and with the interpretation thereof as given by this court in Estate of Timken, supra.

[6] It may further be suggested that where two interpretations of the provisions of a statute imposing taxes are urged, that one should, if possible, be adopted which lays the burden of taxation uniformly upon those who bear that burden and who stand in the same degree with relation to the tax, and a like rule would apply to those who stand in the same degree with regard to their statutory right, if any, to exemption from the burden of the tax. For example, widows of decedents are entitled to those exemptions from inheritance taxes to the extent provided in section 6 of the Act of 1921, and this being so the act should be so interpreted that all widows should be equally affected by the making of the deductions from the estates transferred arising from these exemptions. If the exemption is in every case to be deducted from the first $25,000 of every estate, then the benefit to each widow would in every case be the same; that is to say, she would save the tax of 1 per cent. upon the amount of her said exemption. But, if the rule insisted upon by the appellants herein were to be followed this equality of benefit would be destroyed, since the wealthier the widow, by virtue of the estate transferred, the greater would be the percentage of her saving in the amount of her tax. For example, the widow whose transferred share in the estate of her deceased husband was $124,000 would, by the application of her exemption of $24,000 to the last $24,000 of her said transferred estate, save 7 per cent. in her inheritance tax, while a widow whose whole transferred estate was $24,000 would only save a tax of 1 per cent. in her inheritance tax upon the amount of her exemption.

For the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the inheritance tax appraiser was correct in the application of the rule declared in the Estate of Timken, supra, to the method of appraising and computing inheritance taxes under section 6 of the Act of 1921, and hence we conclude that the portion of the order of the probate court in approving that portion of her said appraisement was and is correct.

The order of this court will therefore be that the order of the trial court, in so far as it undertook to impose an inheritance tax upon the family allowance allowed the appellants is reversed; and that the portion of its said order approving the report of the inheritance tax appraisers as to the amount of inheritance tax to be imposed upon the estate transferred to said appellants and each of them, after the deduction of the exemptions to which said appellants and each of them are entitled, is affirmed. The trial court is directed to make and enter such order or orders in the matter of such inheritance taxes as shall conform to this opinion.

The evidence adduced on the trial of the case warranted the jury in believing that the following facts, among others, were true: That Mr. and Mrs. George E. Schick were married in 1913; that in the fall of 1922 they went to live in the city of San Diego, Cal.; that two children were born of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Schick, and at the time of the trial of the action such children were aged respectively four and seven years; that with the exception of two occasions averaging about three or four weeks each Mr. and Mrs. Schick were never separated one from the other during their married life; that during each of such separations Mrs. Schick heard from Mr. Schick nearly every day; that within a very short time after Mr. and Mrs. Schick arrived in San Diego Mr. Schick purchased a house and lot; that near the end of the month of October, 1922, Mr. and Mrs. Schick became acquainted with defendant and the wife of defendant, who thereupon became frequent visitors at the Schick residence, often dining with the Schicks and on many occasions remaining at the Schick home over night; that the Schicks resided in a suburb of San Diego known as Kensington Park; that in the month of November, 1922, Mr. Schick purchased another house and lot, which is known as the Mission Drive house, and shortly after the first of the year 1923 defendant and Mrs. Clark moved into the Mission Drive house where, without paying any rent therefor, they continued to reside until the day of Mr. Schick's disappearance; that during the fall of 1922 Mr. Schick purchased a real estate business, also a millinery shop; that Mr. Schick was in the habit of making statements to the effect that he was a man of considerable financial means; that some time prior to the 7th day of February, 1923, Mr. Schick had lent to defendant the sum of $400, and had taken defendant's note for the same.

On the morning of February 7, 1923, Mr. Schick left his home as usual. At that time some conversation occurred between him and Mrs. Schick relative to Mr. Schick's going to South America, but for years prior thereto Mr. Schick had talked of removing to South America, and on that particular morning said nothing which would indicate that he would leave for South America on that day. To quote Mrs. Schick's testimony:

"He said if I would say that I would go down, that he would sell out all the property and we would all go down there any time that I would say that I would go."

That was the last time Mrs. Schick ever saw or heard from her husband. After Mr. Schick's arrival in California in the fall of 1922, and up to the 7th day of February, 1923, he wrote regularly each week to his mother in the East. After the 7th day of February, 1923, Mr. Schick's mother received no letter from him. On the day following Mr. Schick's disappearance he had a business engagement of considerable importance, but which engagement he failed to keep.

On the afternoon of February 7, 1923, defendant called Mrs. Schick on the phone, and stated that Mr. Schick had been called out of town, and that he (defendant) would come to the Schick home that evening and tell her all about it. About 8 o'clock that evening defendant and his wife arrived at the Schick residence in the Studebaker automobile which had been owned and driven by Mr. Schick and which he had driven away from his home on the morning of that day.

Upon his arrival defendant told Mrs. Schick of the circumstances surrounding the alleged departure of her husband, stating to Mrs. Schick that her husband had been "tipped off" that morning at the bank; that detectives were after him on account of some financial difficulties in the East; that Mr. Schick had gotten hold of a Russian from Los Angeles, and had departed in a red Stutz car belonging to the Russian; that Mr. Schick had furnished the money for the trip, and the Russian had furnished the automobile; that they had equipped themselves with khaki clothes and ammunition, but that Mr. Schick had been afraid to go to the bank for funds; that therefore he (defendant) had given Mr. Schick $5,000 in sugar bonds, and that Mr. Schick had sent word to Mrs. Schick that she was to go to the safe deposit box and pay defendant out of the government bonds. Defendant at that time gave Mrs. Schick the keys to the safe deposit box and to the Studebaker automobile, stating that Mr. Schick had directed him so to do. The defendant further stated that Mr. Schick, before his departure, had torn up the $400 note given him previously by defendant, and that Mr. Schick had left instructions to Mrs. Schick to sell the property, and for all of them to live together; that he, Mr. Schick, was going into Mexico, and from there to South America; that Mrs. Schick should not let anyone know which way he had gone; that Mrs. Schick would not hear from him for three months; that he was going into business down there, and would send for Mrs. Schick. Defendant at that time further stated that Mr. Schick had told him that Mrs. Schick would be the first one to turn yellow and tell people which way he had gone, so that detectives could get him.

From the time the Clarks commenced to live in the Mission Drive house, which was at least a month previous to Schick's disappearance, the Clarks never remained all night at the Schick home until the night of the 7th of February; they remained at the Schick home that night and never spent another night in the Mission Drive house where they had been living.

When Mrs. Schick awakened the morning of the 8th of February, 1923, about 9 o'clock, defendant was absent from the house; he returned later in the forenoon.

During the month of January, 1923, defendant had induced Mr. Schick to transfer to Mrs. Schick the title to the two houses which he owned in the city of San Diego.

Almost immediately following Mr. Schick's disappearance, to wit, on the 8th or the 9th day of February, 1923, defendant, Mrs. Clark, and Mrs. Schick removed some papers and bank books from Mr. Schick's safe deposit box. Admission to the box was secured through a letter purporting to have been written and signed by Mr. Schick, but which in reality bore his forged signature, which forgery had been perpetrated by Mrs. Schick at defendant's suggestion and with his co-operation therein. Very soon thereafter defendant also induced Mrs. Schick to forge Mr. Schick's signature to a general power of attorney, as well as to several letters written to various banks in the East, requesting the payment to Mr. Schick of balances of accounts in such banks. Among the keys belonging to Mr. Schick, which were given to Mrs. Schick by defendant on the night of Mr. Schick's disappearance, were safe deposit box keys which defendant stated he believed were on some bank in the East. Those keys were likewise sent to the bank inclosed in letters with the signature of George E. Schick forged on them by Mrs. Schick at defendant's solicitation and request. A few days following Mr. Schick's disappearance, defendant purchased a new Hupmobile. Prior thereto defendant had not been the owner of an automobile. At the time defendant purchased the automobile he secured from Mrs. Schick the sum of $4,000 in the following manner: $750 credit was allowed for the automobile belonging to Mr. Schick, and which was taken in part exchange on the Hupmobile; $400 credit for a promissory note owned by defendant to Mr. Schick, and which defendant stated to Mrs. Schick had been destroyed by Mr. Schick on the day of his disappearance, and the balance in cash. The $4,000 was for the purported purpose of paying defendant for certain bonds which he claimed to have given Mr. Schick on the day of his disappearance. Shortly after Mr. Schick disappeared defendant stated that it would be necessary to tell the story that Mr. Schick had been back to his home two or three times in order to fit the dates of the various papers on which Mr. Schick's signature had been forged. Later defendant told Mrs. Schick that because of her pregnant condition it would be necessary to state that Mr. Schick had been back to his home on the 23d of April. Mrs. Schick and defendant had engaged in illicit sexual relations with each other, beginning in November, prior to Mr. Schick's disappearance in the following February, which relations continued up to and after Mr. Schick disappeared. About two months after Mr. Schick's disappearance defendant asked Mrs. Schick to make a will in his favor, naming him trustee of the estate and guardian of Mrs. Schick's children. At the same time he also requested her to turn over her money to him in order that he might go into business; that he (defendant) could not make any money if she did not give him a freer hand with the funds. In July, 1923, defendant and Mrs. Schick removed from the city of San Diego to the city of El Cajon, and took the two Schick children with them; Mrs. Clark taking an apartment in San Diego, but occasionally spending days at El Cajon. At about the same time Mrs. Schick turned over to defendant a $1,000 Liberty bond and several smaller amounts in cash, totaling several hundred dollars. In August, 1923, defendant requested Mrs. Schick to give him $3,000, stating that unless she would turn over more money to him he would have to leave and get a position elsewhere. A short time after the disappearance of Mr. Schick defendant stated to Mrs. Schick that he had a clairvoyant vision in which he saw Mr. Schick killed in Mexico; full details of the vision being narrated. On numerous occasions thereafter defendant insisted that he knew this vision was true.

In a conversation in July, 1923, when the question of giving out information as to the fact that Mr. Schick had disappeared was under discussion, defendant stated that Mrs. Schick would have to give out the fact that some man had told her of the manner in which Mr. Schick came to his death; that the world would not believe in a clairvoyant vision; and that in telling this story Mrs. Schick was to be the only one who had seen the man who had communicated to her the manner of Schick's death. In conformity with this story, defendant dictated a letter which Mrs. Schick signed and sent to the department of justice setting forth the same facts occurring in defendant's alleged vision, except that it was stated that a certain man, whose name was Peter Hawkins, had witnessed the occurrence, and had brought the news to Mrs. Schick. This letter was sent to the department of justice after an effort had been made to collect insurance. In the attempt to collect this insurance, Mr. Atkinson, local representative of the insurance company, was called out to the home in El Cajon, and the story of Mr. Schick's disappearance told to him. This story was told by both the defendant and Mrs. Schick, and agreed with defendant's alleged vision, except, also, in this instance claim was made that the news of Mr. Schick's death had been brought by one Peter Hawkins.

Defendant and Mrs. Schick learned from a clipping in an Eastern newspaper, which was sent to Mrs. Schick, that detectives were working on the disappearance of Mr. Schick, and that Mr. Schick's brother, Martin Schick, was coming to California. Upon learning that Martin Schick was coming to California to investigate regarding the absence of George E. Schick, defendant stated to Mrs.

Schick that the first thing Martin Schick would do would be to try to implicate defendant in the disappearance of George E. Schick, but that no one could arrest defendant or charge him with anything until the body of George E. Schick had been found, and that if they would all "stick to the same story" and give the same dates on which Mr. Schick was supposed to have returned, there could be no trouble. Within a very few days after the disappearance of George E. Schick defendant appeared in possession and claimed to be the owner of a watch formerly owned by George E. Schick, which had been given to him by his father; a Shrine emblem worn by Schick, which had been given to him by his wife; and a thirty-second degree Masonic diamond ring owned and worn by Schick. Immediately thereafter defendant had each of such articles altered so that none of them could be recognized. Defendant made statements to the effect that he had received these various articles through inheritance from his father. Defendant also appropriated to his own use some of Mr. Schick's neckties and silk hose. On the night of the day on which Mr. Schick disappeared a commotion occurred in the house occupied by defendant, in which loud voices of two men and unusual noises, such as chairs being knocked over, were heard, and which noises suddenly ceased. The next day, or shortly thereafter, there was a fire in the rear of the house in which defendant resided, kindled underneath an oil drum, of the size 18 inches in diameter and 30 inches tall, which gave off a most offensive odor like burning bones or egg shells. Prior to that time defendant had never burned anything in that manner at that place. The Clarks never remained in that house another night, although for a month thereafter defendant visited the house nearly every day, twice in company with his wife, who on each of such occasions remained outside. The house was in an out of the way place. On the second morning after the 7th day of February, which was the date of the disappearance of Mr. Schick, defendant was seen in a lonely canyon, and shortly thereafter went to a garage, his automobile covered with red adobe mud and brush. The shift fork of the automobile had been bent so that the automobile could be driven only in low gear or in reverse. The clutch had been burned out from slipping or pulling.

In addition to the foregoing, there was evidence of many admissions made by defendant to officers, among which were statements that he could not be convicted of murder unless they could find the body. Also the testimony of a witness detailing a confession made to him by defendant. There was other evidence in the record which favored defendant's innocence.

The principal point relied upon by appellant for reversal of the judgment is that the corpus delicti was not established.

Appellant contends that the elements of the corpus delicti in the charge against defendant necessitated either direct evidence that Schick was dead as established by the production of his dead body, or of the testimony of at least one witness of his own knowledge that Schick was deceased, together with further proof that Schick's death was brought about by criminal agency. Many authorities are cited to support such contention. They are, however, either general in their nature or based upon a state of facts which make such a rule in all its strictness inapplicable to the facts in the instant case. Where cases are found which in their facts are analogous to those as shown by the evidence introduced on the trial of the present case, the general rule is greatly relaxed. A few illustrations will suffice for the purpose of demonstrating the attitude of the courts.

In the case of State v. Williams (1905) 46 Or. 287, 80 P. 655, the defendant was convicted of murder. The body of the victim was never found; nor was there testimony of any eyewitness to any act of violence upon the person alleged to have been murdered. The incriminating facts were purely circumstantial, and, while weak in character, pointed not only to the commission of the crime, but as well to the defendant's participation therein. With reference to the necessity of proving by direct evidence the fact of death of the supposed victim, the court reviewed many decisions on the subject, and in discussing the matter, among other things, said:

"To require direct proof of the killing or the production of the body of the alleged victim in all cases of homicide would be manifestly unreasonable, and lead to absurdity and injustice; and it is believed that it is now clearly established by the authorities that the fact of the death as well as the guilt of the defendant may be legally inferred from such strong and unequivocal circumstances as produce conviction to a moral certainty. * * * The strict rule contended for by defendant would operate completely to shield a criminal from punishment for the most atrocious crime, and afford him absolute immunity if he were cunning enough to consume or destroy the body of his victim by fire or some chemical agency, or completely hide it away or otherwise destroy its identity, although the proof of his guilt might be of the most clear and convincing kind, and remove all possible doubt in the premises. * * * Where, as here, the entire circumstances point with one accord to the death of the person alleged to have been murdered, the finding of fragments of a human body or of metallic articles which are positively identified as part of the body of the alleged victim, or as articles worn by him, will be sufficient, if believed by the jury, to establish the fact of death, when this is the best evidence that can be obtained under the circumstances [citing cases]. No universal and unvariable rule can be laid down in regard to the proof of the corpus delicti. Each case depends upon its own peculiar circumstances. The body of the crime may be proved by the best evidence which is capable of being adduced, if it is sufficient for the purpose. Such an amount of accompanying or relative facts, whether direct or circumstantial, must be produced as establish the fact beyond a moral certainty, and to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis."

The case of the United States v. Williams, reported in 28 Fed. Cas. 636, No. 16,707, presents a state of facts which, without the aid of a confession, resemble the case last cited, in that there was no discovery of the body of the victim of the murder, nor was there any direct evidence that a murder had been committed. It was a case of apparent mutiny on board a brig; the murder of the master and mates thereof; abandonment of the brig by the assassins in a small boat; their subsequent rescue in the open sea by another vessel; their possession of the brig's compass, register, water, and provisions, besides certain articles of a personal nature, such as a watch and clothing which belonged to the master and to the first and second mates. On the phase of the case regarding the requirement of absolute proof of death, the court said, in part:

"Cases, however, have occurred, and it is greatly to be feared may hereafter occur, where the application of this rule would secure impunity to the murderer, and therefore would be unreasonable, as it would be in the highest degree prejudicial to the court of criminal justice. A murderer would only have to consume the body by fire, or decompose it by chemical means, or sink it in the depth of the sea, and the laws of society would be powerless to punish the offender."

Speaking to the question of the necessity of production of proof of death, Judge Story, in United States v. Gibert, 25 Fed. Cas. 1287, No. 15,204, made the following statement:

"The first proposition [that there ought to be no conviction for murder unless the murdered body is actually found] certainly cannot be admitted as correct in point of common reason, or of law, unless courts of justice are to establish a positive rule to screen persons from punishment, who may be guilty of the most flagitious crimes. In the cases of murders committed on the high seas, the body is rarely, if ever, found; and a more complete encouragement and protection for the worst offenses of this sort could not be invented than a rule of this strictness. It would amount to a universal condonation of all murders committed on the high seas."

In the case of State v. Lamb, 28 Mo. 218, where the defendant had confessed to the murder of his wife by drowning her in the Mississippi river, the court said:

"Although the dead body has not been found, and although no witness swore that he saw the perpetration of the murder, yet the circumstances extrinsic to the confession, and established by other evidence, are so strong that they cannot fail to satisfy any unbiased mind that the accused is guilty of the crime of which he has been convicted. We consider the true rule, as deduced from the current of authorities, to be, that an extrajudicial confession, with extrinsic circumstantial evidence satisfying the minds of a jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the crime has been committed, will warrant a conviction, although the dead body has not been discovered and seen, so that its existence and identity can be testified to by an eyewitness."

It is said in the case of People v. Alviso, 55 Cal. 230, 233, that—"It is very seldom that a conviction occurs without positive proof of the former [death], either by eyewitnesses of the homicide, or the subsequent discovery of the body; and, while the general rule is clearly laid down, yet the authorities concede that there may be exceptions. Thus, Wharton, in his work on Homicide, § 637, relates instances of the human body being disposed of by fire, or boiled in potash, or dissolved by acids, rendering it impossible that it should ever be produced; and concludes: 'It is clear that in such cases the corpus delicti may be proved circumstantially or inferentially.'"

[1-3] From a reading of the cases to which reference has been had, as well as to other authorities which might be cited, it is clear that the general rule requiring either the production of the body of the person supposed to have been murdered or some circumstance from which death would necessarily follow cannot be applied in all cases. If the circumstances surrounding the disappearance of the alleged victim be such as to convince the mind to a moral certainty as to his death, the demands of the law will be satisfied. Nor is it necessary in establishing the corpus delicti that the means by or through which such death resulted be established beyond a reasonable doubt. The only requirement is that there be some evidence to justify the conclusion that criminal agency was the direct cause. The case of People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 P. 698, is authority for the statement that, "to justify a conviction, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of every fact necessary to constitute the offense and to identify the defendant as the perpetrator; but it is not necessary that the evidence of the criminal act should be of that conclusive character in order to justify the admission of the defendant's confessions," which language, as we understand it, is to be taken in connection with the laying of a foundation for the admission of a confession.

It is said in People v. Alba, 52 Cal. App. 603, 199 P. 894, that (syllabus):

"It is not required that the corpus delicti be established beyond a reasonable doubt, but it is sufficient if there is some evidence tending to establish a criminal agency as the cause of the facts forming its basis."

And in People v. Wagner, 29 Cal. App. 366, 155 P. 651, the following language is pertinent to the question of the amount of evidence required regarding the criminal character of the act in question:

"Proof of the corpus delicti of the conclusive and convincing character required to support a conviction of the crime charged was not a prerequisite to the reception in evidence of the extrajudicial statements of the defendant that he had killed the deceased. * * * People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404 (146 Pac. 890); People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 6 (106 Pac. 428); People v. Spencer, 16 Cal. App. 756 [117 Pac. 1039]."

That the corpus delicti need not be proven beyond a reasonable doubt before the admissions of the confession of the defendant may be received in evidence, see U. S. v. Williams, 28 Fed. Cas. 636, No. 16,707; People v. Hatch, 13 Cal. App. 531, 109 P. 1097; People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 10, 106 P. 428.

In addition to the authorities which have already been cited herein, the following cases will illustrate the rule that the corpus delicti may be established by circumstantial evidence, to wit: People v. Wilkins, 154 Cal. 530, 111 P. 612; People v. Wilkison, 30 Cal. App. 473, 158 P. 1067; People v. Spencer, 16 Cal. App. 756, 117 P. 1039.

In the case of People v. Wilkins, supra, quoting from 3 Rice on Evidence, 465, 466, it is said:

"Nor is it necessary that the corpus delicti should be proved by direct and positive evidence. It would be most unreasonable to require such evidence. Crimes, and especially those of the worst kinds, are naturally committed at chosen times, and in darkness and secrecy; and human tribunals must act upon such indications as the circumstances of the case present or admit, or society must be broken up. Nor is it very often that adequate evidence is not afforded by the attendant and surrounding facts, to remove all mystery and to afford such a reasonable degree of certainty as men are daily accustomed to regard as sufficient in the most important concerns of life; to expect more would be equally needless and absurd."

[4] Without again attempting to repeat the substance of the incriminating evidence, exclusive of defendant's admissions, adduced on the trial, we are content to hold that it was ample in quantity and quality to sustain the conclusion reached by the trial court that, independent of any confession or admissions made by defendant, the corpus delicti was established.

[5, 6] Appellant's brief contains many specifications of error dependent upon the rulings of the trial court either in admitting or in rejecting certain testimony. Nearly all of them which have to do with the admission of testimony over defendant's objections relate to the state of the evidence at the time of the reception of the evidence in question; that is, that the corpus delicti had not been established. While it is recognized as better practice to establish the corpus delicti as early in the proceedings of the trial as may be practicable, it is well settled that the order of proof is discretionary with the court; and where, as in the instant case, the corpus delicti was finally established, the error, if any, resulted in no prejudice to defendant's rights. People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 111 P. 612.

[7, 8] One of appellant's objections to the admission of evidence by the trial court was occasioned by Mrs. Schick's testimony to the effect that, at defendant's suggestion and request, and with his active co-operation, she forged the name of George E. Schick to several different documents. It is contended that, because such evidence tended to prove the commission by defendant of an independent offense, and was calculated to prejudice defendant in the minds of the jury, the objections thereto should have been sustained. By many decisions of the courts of this state it is declared to be the law that—"If the evidence of another crime is necessary or pertinent to the proof of the one charged, the law will not thwart justice by excluding that evidence, simply because it involves the commission of another crime." People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 230, 46 P. 157.

And see People v. Klopfer, 61 Cal. App. 291, 214 P. 878, where cases bearing on the subject are cited, and where the rule is said to be that—

"Where the evidence tending to prove such independent offense also tends to prove a fact material to the commission of the offense charged, such evidence is admissible, and the fact that such evidence may appear to prejudice the defendant with the jury is no ground for its exclusion."

[9, 10] Certain testimony was admitted by the court over defendant's objections regarding statements made by other persons in the presence of defendant. While it is the rule that such statements are not admissible simply because they are made in the presence and in the hearing of the accused, it is also true that, if such statements are material as bearing upon conduct of the defendant, in such circumstances they may be introduced in evidence. People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 325, 338, 86 P. 671, and 8 Cal. Jur. § 196, and cases therein cited. With so much in mind, but considering the further fact that much of the evidence to which objection was made was fully covered by other evidence which was unobjectionable, it cannot be said that any injury resulted to defendant by reason of any erroneous ruling of the court (assuming it to be such) to which attention is directed. As to that part thereof not covered by other evidence which was properly admitted, it need only be said that it comes within the rule which permits such evidence for the purpose of showing defendant's attitude when incriminating statements are made against him in his presence; also as part of the res gestæ of a material conversation in which defendant joined.

[11, 12] On the trial of the case defendant objected to the introduction of evidence by the prosecution to the effect that after the disappearance of George E. Schick defendant and Mrs. Schick engaged one with the other in acts of illicit sexual intercourse. The objection was overruled by the court, and such ruling is assigned as error. In the prosecution of an offense of the nature of that before the court it is universally conceded that evidence of acts or conduct of the defendant showing motive for the commission of the crime may be presented to the jury. In the instant case, in view of such testimony, it would seem unnecessary to look for a motive in defendant in the doing away with Schick other than to be free from the possible fear of detection by the husband of the relations sustained by defendant with Schick's wife. The evidence was clearly admissible.

[13] Complaint is made of a certain remark made by the district attorney in the presence of the jury. It is apparent that the statement by the district attorney was not intended as any testimony in the case, but was simply an inadvertent comment. There was ample evidence in the case which justified the conclusion stated by the district attorney, and, while not ordinarily permissible practice for an attorney in the course of the trial, outside of argument, to comment upon the evidence, the statement to which objection is made was a fact which, so far as the attention of the court has been directed, was uncontradicted by any testimony, and apparently was conceded to be correct. In such circumstances, no prejudicial injury resulted to defendant.

[14] It is urged that during the trial the court was guilty of misconduct in that on two or three occasions the judge made certain remarks in the presence of the jury from which the jury might have inferred that the judge was of the opinion that the evidence showed the existence of certain disputed facts, such, for example, as the death of George E. Schick. An examination of the transcript of the proceedings to which attention has been directed fails to disclose any clear violation of the rule which forbids any expression of opinion by the judge on the effect or the value of the evidence. Furthermore, instructions given by the court to the jury emphasized the rule that the jury was the exclusive judge of the facts of the case, and that the expression of any opinion thereon by the judge was to be disregarded by the jury. It would therefore follow that any slight error which inadvertently might have crept into the record because of some vague remark by the court was cured by the court's instructions to which reference has just been had.

[15] Appellant further complains because, before a certain witness had finished his testimony on direct examination, the court refused defendant permission to "cross-examine" such witness regarding the condition of certain checks and their whereabouts prior to their being produced in court. Even assuming the existence of such a right as is the basis of defendant's contention, in view of the fact that subsequent cross-examination failed to disclose anything of a prejudicial nature to defendant's rights in the premises by reason of the action of the court in delaying the cross-examination until in the ordinary course of procedure such time had properly arrived, it cannot be said that any harm resulted to defendant.

[16] During the early part of the trial defendant requested of the court that the cross-examination by defendant of a witness be postponed until "after the evidence of the corpus delicti has been established." The request was denied, and error is predicated thereon. It is a well-settled rule of procedure that such matters rest within the discretion of the trial court. No abuse of such discretion can be reasonably said to exist in the action of the trial court in the instance to which we have adverted, and in such circumstances it must be held that no error was committed in connection therewith.

[17] It is objected by appellant that within the evidence going to make up the corpus delicti there are certain admissions made by defendant; and the point is advanced that the rule forbidding the introduction in evidence of a confession by a defendant until after the corpus delicti has been established should operate in a similar way to the exclusion of an admission. The California cases seem to uphold appellant in his contention to the effect that the corpus delicti must be established without the aid of any admission by a defendant. People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 P. 440; People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, 63 P. 1001; People v. Ward, 145 Cal. 736, 79 P. 448; People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 368, 97 P. 871.

The admission made by defendant, to which most importance is attached, is that in which he is credited with stating in effect that there could be no conviction of a person charged with murder, unless and until the dead body of the supposed victim was discovered. But, if we are to be guided by precedents, as announced in adjudications in analogous cases, every admission made by defendant herein may be excluded, and there will still remain in the record ample evidence to justify the jury in its determination of the fact that Schick was dead and that his death was caused by criminal agency. In no one of the several cases herein cited on the point that no absolute necessity exists for the actual discovery of the dead body of the victim in order that the corpus delicti may be established were the incriminating facts against the defendant of greater strength than the facts against this defendant (exclusive of his admissions), as hereinbefore set forth, and yet they were held sufficient. Take, for example, the following facts as narrated in the case of U. S. v. Williams, 28 Fed. Cas. 636, No. 16,707:

"Many facts and circumstances were proved at the trial, independently of the confessions, tending to show that the crime had been committed; and some of the circumstances thus proved were of a character strongly to implicate the prisoners in the transaction. It was proved that the prisoners left Portland on the 7th of July, 1857, in the same vessel with Quinton D. Smith and the other men supposed to have been murdered, and that neither Smith, the other men, or the vessel have ever since been seen or heard from except through the confessions of the prisoners and of Lahey, who died before the trial. Neither the vessel nor the officers or men ever arrived at the port of destination or returned to the home port. At the time, or about the time, when the vessel should have arrived at Cardenas, the prisoners were picked up in a boat in the open sea, which boat was subsequently brought home and identified, and proved to be the only boat of the vessel in which they sailed. It was tarred inside in a manner to indicate that they had not left the vessel without preparation, and that fact was still more strongly indicated by the circumstance that they had in the boat the ship's compass, and a supply of water and provisions. They had in their possession also the watch of the captain, and the clothing of the murdered men, and all these articles were fully identified at the trial, as was the ship's register, which was also in their possession. After they were picked up, they gave contradictory and false accounts of what had occurred before they left the vessel, and persisted in the falsehood until Lahey disclosed the truth; and, when they saw that detection was certain, they freely and voluntarily confessed their crimes. All these facts and circumstances were fully proved at the trial before the confessions were admitted, and we think they were of a character to be regarded as tending to prove, not only that the crime had been committed, but that it had been committed by the prisoners."

In the case of State v. Lamb, 28 Mo. 218, aside from the confession of the defendant, the evidence was most meager—immeasurably weaker than the evidence adduced in the instant case—notwithstanding which fact the evidence was held sufficient to uphold the verdict.

[18] Near the close of the case, as presented by the prosecution, a witness by the name of Hendrix testified in detail to a confession made to him by defendant. Before the witness was sworn defendant objected "to this person being sworn in this courtroom for the reason that he is incompetent to testify in the court, based upon this: That the oath administered is such an oath as would tend to cause a witness to speak the truth, and this, that he is immune from punishment for perjury, and also that he is in effect immune from contempt of court, and that there is no oath that can be administered to him that would cover those points." The objection was overruled. A motion to strike from the record all the testimony of the witness on the ground that he was incompetent to testify for the reason that theretofore he has been found guilty of murder and at the time he gave his testimony was under sentence of death was denied by the court. Such rulings are assigned as prejudicial error.

Appellant cites no authority in support of his contention.

Section 1879 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"All persons, without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and, perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief; although, in every case the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question, as provided in section eighteen hundred and forty-seven."

Sections 1880 and 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, aside from covering privileged communications by which certain persons are precluded from giving their testimony, relate to persons of unsound mind, children, and parties in actions against executors and administrators. It would therefore appear that by the express provisions of the statutes the witness was competent to testify.

Other specifications of error regarding either the admission or the rejection of evidence are either not seriously pressed by appellant or are of so little comparative consequence that no discussion thereon is deemed necessary. Suffice it to say that each of them has received consideration, but that in the judgment of this court none of them is of that importance which would justify either the space or the time in indicating a specific ruling thereon.

The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by Oscar B. Lyon against Ida B. Lyon and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Webster, Webster & Blewett and Stephen N. Blewett, all of Stockton, for appellant.

L. J. Maddux and Albert L. Johnson, both of Modesto, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint in this action is in the ordinary form in a suit to quiet title. The defendants were given judgment, and the plaintiff appeals. The plaintiff and the defendant Ida B. Lyon are and at all times mentioned herein were husband and wife. During the same time J. R. Broughton was president of the defendant bank.

The property in dispute is block 31 of "what is known as Maze addition to the city of Modesto." The answer of defendants Geo. Cressey, J. J. McMahon, and the Modesto Bank denies the plaintiff's title and alleges that on the 8th day of November, 1897, the land was conveyed to defendant Ida B. Lyon as her separate property; that on the 10th day of February, 1913, the plaintiff executed and delivered to Ida B. Lyon a conveyance of the land; that on the 28th day of October, 1916, he conveyed to Ida B. Lyon, by quitclaim deed, all of his interest in the land; that on the 12th day of January, 1921, Ida B. Lyon executed and delivered to "Geo. A. Cressey and J. J. McMahon, as parties of the second part, and the Modesto Bank, a corporation, party of the third part," her deed of trust conveying the land to secure an indebtedness to the bank of $3,227.60, evidenced by her promissory note of even date for that sum; that the indebtedness is unpaid and that the promissory note and deed of trust "are now in full force and effect"; and prays "that said promissory note be declared valid, and that said trust deed be declared to be a valid lien on said land." The answer of defendant Ida B. Lyon denies plaintiff's title; alleges "that each of said defendants have some right, title, estate, or interest in or to the said land or premises, and the whole thereof," that she is and ever since the 8th day of November, 1897, has been "the sole owner of the said land and premises, and is entitled to have the same quieted against each and every one of the other parties to this suit"; and prays for a decree adjudging that plaintiff has no interest in the land and that her codefendants have no lien thereon. After the commencement of the action, and after lis pendens had been recorded therein, the land was sold, pursuant to the terms of the trust deed, to satisfy the indebtedness secured thereby.

The land was purchased in the year 1897 with community funds and the conveyance thereof made to Ida B. Lyon by direction of the plaintiff. He testified that it was not intended as a gift to his wife. She testified that at the time of the purchase the plaintiff "was getting ready to go to Alaska in the spring, * * * and when he bought this property in the fall he put it in my name, saying that if he never returned I would not have any trouble over the property"; that nothing was said about making her a gift of the property. Broughton acted for plaintiff in the purchase of the property, prepared the deed, and, as notary public, took the grantor's acknowledgment of the execution thereof. Broughton testified that "possibly" he knew at the time of the purchase that it was made with community funds, but that the plaintiff never made any claim to the witness that he had any interest in the property but "always maintained it belonged to" Mrs. Lyon. Plaintiff testified that he never told Broughton that the property belonged to Mrs. Lyon. Several times after the purchase the plaintiff and his wife executed mortgages and trust deeds of the property to the defendant bank to secure the payment of their indebtedness to it. Thereafter, on January 16, 1912, they executed a trust deed to secure an indebtedness of $970 to the bank.

On the 10th of February, 1913, the plaintiff signed a printed form of deed and left it with Broughton. The latter testified:

"He was going away, and I told him his wife was talking about selling the property for a school site, and some people was particular about having their husband sign a deed whether he had any interest in it or not. * * * And so I suggested he sign this deed and, not knowing who she might sell to, that she could sign the same deed afterwards and it would probably answer. * * * And I told him at the time if she didn't sell it, I could insert her name later and then she surely would have no trouble in selling it.

"Q. Yes. And that was done with an understanding with him? A. Yes, sir; said he didn't want her to have any trouble selling it."

Broughton later wrote the description of the property in the blank form of deed and inserted the wife's name as grantee. The deed purports to convey the property to Mrs. Lyon expressly "as her separate property."

For about three years prior to the execution of the quitclaim deed the plaintiff had not been living with his wife, but was working in another part of the state. She caused his arrest for failure to provide her with necessaries and he was imprisoned in the county jail to await his preliminary examination. Broughton called on plaintiff in the jail and "talked to him about" the execution of a quitclaim deed to Mrs. Lyon. Plaintiff testified that at his preliminary examination "the district attorney says to me, 'Will you give Mrs. Lyon a quitclaim deed to this property?' I thought for a moment, and I could easily see that if I hadn't done so that possibly I might have been held over to the superior court, and I says, 'Yes,' and then he speaks to Mr. Rice and says, 'Have you got a deed there to be signed—made out?' And he looked and he says, 'No.' And Mr. Rice rang up the bank and conversed with the bank for a few moments and then he told me that I could go down to the bank and sign it." It does not appear whether Mr. Rice was connected with any of the parties. Plaintiff was discharged and thereafter called at the bank and executed the quitclaim deed. Broughton testified:

"Mrs. Lyon told me she had legal advice that the first deed was not any good on account of it not being filled out at the time her husband had signed it. * * * So the first time I saw him after she told me that, or a few days afterwards, I prepared another one * * * and asked him to sign it and he said, 'All right,' if the other one wasn't good he wanted to make it good. * * * He signed it. * * * Paid me the money to record it."

Mrs. Lyon testified that Broughton told her that "he had made Mr. Lyon sign the quitclaim deed." Broughton testified that he never at any time told anybody that he made Mr. Lyon sign any deed.

On the 9th of November, 1916, Mrs. Lyon executed a trust deed of the property to secure an indebtedness to the bank of $2,137.70. January 12, 1921, she executed the trust deed alleged in the answer of Cressey, McMahon, and the bank. There is no dispute as to the amount of the indebtedness to the bank.

The appellant contends that the land in controversy is community property; that the bank had knowledge of that fact through its president, J. R. Broughton; that the deed of February 10, 1913, is "void for the reason that it was signed in blank by plaintiff, and wrongfully filled in by J. R. Broughton, officer of the Modesto Bank, against the express instructions of the grantor"; that the quitclaim deed is "void by reason of menace and duress exercised upon plaintiff by the Modesto Bank through its president, J. R. Broughton"; that there was no delivery of the quitclaim deed. The other points made are included in the foregoing.

[1-3] At the time of the conveyance of the land to Mrs. Lyon on the 8th of November, 1897, and at all times since, section 164 of the Civil Code provided:

"Whenever any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property. * * * The presumption in this section mentioned is conclusive in favor of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for a valuable consideration."

It was a question of fact for the court to determine whether the evidence against the presumption was sufficient to overthrow it. Stafford v. Martinoni, 192 Cal. 724, 738, 221 P. 919. The purchase being made with community funds, the burden was on plaintiff to show that the conveyance was not intended as a gift to his wife. Pabst v. Shearer, 172 Cal. 239, 156 P. 466. There is no evidence to show that Broughton or the bank had information of any facts which would rebut this presumption. Broughton testified that the plaintiff always maintained that the property belonged to his wife. This evidence, notwithstanding plaintiff's testimony to the contrary, together with the presumption arising from the conveyance to the wife, was sufficient to support the finding, in favor of the bank, that the plaintiff has no interest in the property. The deed of February 10, 1913, may be left out of consideration. That would be the effect of holding it to be void as contended for by plaintiff.

[4-7] Relative to the circumstances under which the quitclaim deed was executed, it was for the trial court to determine whether to believe the testimony of plaintiff or that of Broughton, and, in view of the findings, it must be presumed that the court believed the latter. According to Broughton's testimony, he merely requested the plaintiff to execute the quitclaim deed. A mere request to execute a deed does not constitute menace or duress. There is no evidence to show that either Broughton or the bank was instrumental in causing the arrest or prosecution of the plaintiff for the alleged nonsupport of his wife. It is not shown that either Broughton or the bank had knowledge of the fact, if it be a fact, that the plaintiff executed the quitclaim deed to escape prosecution under the criminal charge of nonsupport. Neither did such prosecution constitute either menace or duress, unless fraudulently obtained or conducted. Civ. Code, §§ 1569 and 1570. The presumption of good faith must prevail in the absence of evidence to the contrary. It certainly is not duress or menace for a prosecuting officer merely to ask a husband, who is being prosecuted for failure to support his wife, whether he is willing to convey property to her for her support.

[8-10] It is contended that there was no delivery of the quitclaim deed to Mrs. Lyon, the particular point urged being that there is no evidence to show her acceptance thereof. The plaintiff executed the deed and left it with Broughton, giving him the money necessary to pay for recording the same. Broughton caused the deed to be recorded and for a few years thereafter kept it, together with the deeds of 1897 and 1913 herein mentioned. He testified that it was his custom to keep instruments of that nature until the parties in whose favor they were made called for them. Mrs. Lyon did not testify whether she had knowledge of her husband's promise to the district attorney that he would execute the quitclaim deed. She testified that she first saw it between the 5th and the 10th of November, 1921, but that in March, 1919, Broughton told her of its existence; that from that time until January, 1921, she "tried continuously" to sell the property. While nominally a defendant, it is apparent that it was to the interest of Mrs. Lyon to support the contentions of the plaintiff to the effect that the land in controversy is community property and that the deeds from plaintiff to her are invalid, because there is no other theory presented by the record on which she could hope to defeat the lien of the bank. She answered questions by counsel for plaintiff as follows:

"Q. * * * You recognize you owe this indebtedness, do you not, Mrs. Lyon? A. Why, certainly.

"Q. And you hope to pay it, intend to pay it, don't you, if you can? A. Yes, sir."

The court, in weighing her testimony, was justified in taking into consideration her verified answer which alleged "that she has been the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the hereinabove described real property, and has been such ever since the 8th day of November, 1897." The court was not obliged to accept her explanation that such allegation was made at the suggestion of her attorney. After knowledge of the execution of the quitclaim deed, Mrs. Lyon endeavored for nearly two years to sell the property and then executed the trust deed under which the bank caused the property to be sold. Under the facts stated the court could not well have drawn any other inference than that the quitclaim deed was delivered and accepted. The delivery of the deed to Broughton to be recorded was a sufficient delivery on the part of plaintiff. Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 507.

The acts of Mrs. Lyon with relation to the property, after knowledge of the execution of the deed, constituted an acceptance thereof. The fact that she may not have assented to the delivery at the time the deed was executed, or may not have then known of such execution, is not material in this case, because no party other than Mrs. Lyon is here claiming under the plaintiff.

"Such assent when given will, as between the grantor and the grantee, relate back to the time when the grantor first handed the deed over to a third person to be delivered to the grantee." Green v. Skinner, 185 Cal. 435, 438, 197 P. 60, 61.

The judgment is affirmed.

LARKEY v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.
(Civ. 4247.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 17, 1925.)

1. Adverse possession §8(2)—No title by adverse possession can be acquired to land dedicated to public as an alley.

Where land was dedicated to public as an alley, no title thereto as against public could thereafter be acquired by adverse possession.

2. Dedication §19(5)—Filing map of record and sale of lots with reference thereto constitutes irrevocable dedication of streets and alleys thereon.

When an owner, after filing a map of record designating certain portion of tract as streets and alleys, sells lots designated thereon by reference to such map, he thereby irrevocably dedicates streets and alleys shown thereon to use of public.

3. Dedication §19(5)—Owners selling lots adjacent to alley estopped from claiming any land between lot and alley.

Where original owners of tract filed map of record showing lots were bounded by streets and alleys, and thereafter sold a lot adjacent to an alley, they are estopped from claiming ownership of any land between such lot and alley.

4. Dedication §46—Owners filing map of record bound thereby, and conflict on face thereof construed most strongly against them.

Original owners of tract filing map thereof of record are bound thereby, and all doubts as to meaning of map and conflict appearing on its face are to be construed most strongly against them.

5. Adverse possession §8(2)—Lot owner held not to have acquired adverse possession of strip of land lying between his lot and alley.

Where original owners filed map of record showing lots were bounded by streets and alleys, and lot purchased by plaintiff did not border on alley, but strip of land existed between plaintiff's lot and alley, held that, as original owners are bound by map showing lots were bordered by alleys and streets and by selling lots with reference thereto, plaintiff could acquire no better title than such original owners, and hence could not acquire adverse possession of such strip of land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Muriel B. Larkey against the City of Los Angeles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Lucius P. Green, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. A. Waters and Newby & Palmer, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted to quiet title to lot 22 of block 21 of the Arlington heights tract, according to the official map of said tract of record in the office of the county recorder of the county of Los Angeles, and to a strip of land 6 feet in width and 142 feet in length, lying immediately north of and parallel to said lot 22. The defendant, the city of Los Angeles, concedes that plaintiff is the owner of said lot 22, but asserts that said 6-foot strip is part of a public alley, and that defendant has an easement in and over the same for highway purposes.

On May 19, 1887, and for some time prior thereto, T. Weisendanger and others were the owners of a tract of land lying westerly of the city of Los Angeles, which they subdivided into lots and blocks under the name of the Arlington Heights Tract. They made a map of this tract, and filed the same of record in the office of the county of Los Angeles, being the county in which the land was situated. This tract was bounded on the north by Washington street and blocks 20, 21, and 22 of said tract front on said street. Block 20, the most easterly of the three blocks, is bounded on the east by First avenue, now known as Arlington avenue. Block 21 lies just west of block 20, and the two are separated from each other by Second avenue; and block 22, the most westerly of the three blocks, is separated from block 21 by Third avenue. Each of these blocks consists of 22 lots. Lots numbered 1 to 6, inclusive, in each block face on Washington street, and extend south to an alley running east and west through said tract, and are 50 feet in width and 200 feet in depth. The remaining 16 lots in each block lie south of the alley. They consisted of two tiers of 8 lots each, one tier of lots facing east and the other tier of lots facing west. These lots are 50 feet in width and 142 feet in depth. Through the center of each of the blocks 20 and 21 an alley extends from the south boundary line of said blocks, northerly to the east and west alley above mentioned. One of these alleys is 16 feet in width, and is so indicated on the recorded map. The other appears to be designated on the map as 10 feet in width. The alley running east and west is indicated on the map as 10 feet in width, although by actual measurements made on the ground the distance between the lots on the north side of said alley and those on the south side thereof is 16 feet. On the north side of this alley, and just opposite to said lot 22, belonging to plaintiff, are three lots, being lots numbered 1, 2, and 3 in said block 21. These three lots face on Washington street and abut on said alley. Lots 1 and 2 in said block 21 were sold by the original owners of said tract on August 8, 1888, to Warren P. Love, and on December 10th of the same year they sold said lot 3 to Nannie E. Todd. It does not appear when lot 22 of said block was sold by the original owners of the tract. About the first we learn of this lot is in the year 1908, at which time it was owned by one Roseen. In this year Roseen built a fence along what he claimed to be the north boundary line of this lot. This fence extended in an easterly and westerly direction, and was parallel to, and 56 feet north of, the south boundary line of said lot. In 1914 plaintiff purchased said lot 22, and at this time the fence constructed by Roseen was still standing, and plaintiff continued to occupy the land inclosed by said fence, and claimed to own the whole thereof up to the time of the commencement of this action, and during this time plaintiff has paid all the taxes that have been assessed against said lot 22. It does not appear that any taxes were ever assessed against said 6-foot strip, unless it can be said that taxes were assessed against it as a part of said lot 22. The lot of plaintiff lies just south of the alley running east and west through said tract, and faces east on Second avenue. Since the filing of said map, and some years prior to the commencement of this action, said tract was annexed to and became a part of the city of Los Angeles.

[1, 2] The court found that plaintiff had acquired title by adverse possession to that portion of said 6-foot strip lying north of and adjacent to her said lot 22. There is no direct finding as to whether this 6-foot strip was a part of the alley, or whether it had ever been dedicated to the public. It is conceded, however, that, if it had ever been dedicated to the public as an alley, as against the public no title thereto could be acquired by adverse possession. This is undoubtedly the law. Orena v. City of Santa Barbara, 91 Cal. 621, 631, 28 P. 268. If, therefore, this 6-foot strip had ever been dedicated to the public as a part of the alley, then the finding of the court that plaintiff is the owner thereof cannot stand. We might first determine when the act resulting in the dedication of the alley, independent of its width, and whether it be 10 or 16 feet, actually took place. The mere filing of the map of record, designating certain portions of the tract as streets and alleys, is simply an offer to dedicate the spaces designated on said map as streets and alleys to the public for highway purposes. Elliott v. McIntosh, 41 Cal. App. 763, 766, 183 P. 692. But when the owner, after recording such a map, sells lots designated thereon by reference to said recorded map, he thereby irrevocably dedicates the streets and alleys shown thereon to the use of the public. San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 P. 405; Archer v. Salinas

City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 P. 839, 16 L. R. A. 145; Davidow v. Griswold, 23 Cal. App. 188, 137 P. 619; Daly City v. Holbrook, 39 Cal. App. 326, 178 P. 725; Elliott v. McIntosh, 41 Cal. App. 763, 183 P. 692; Berton v. All Persons, etc., 176 Cal. 610, 170 P. 151. Therefore, when the original owners of the Arlington heights tract filed for record the map of this tract, and sold said lots in said tract according to said map, the streets and alleys designated thereon became dedicated to the public, and no further action was necessary either upon the part of the public authorities or upon the public in the use of said streets and alleys in order to constitute the streets and alleys of said tract public highways. As we have already seen, said map was filed for record on May 19, 1887, and 3 of the lots of said tract abutting on said alleys and lying immediately opposite to, and to the north of, plaintiff's said lot 22 were sold by the original owner by the 10th day of December, 1888. Accordingly said alley became irrevocably dedicated as a public alley on December 10, 1888. Therefore no title to any portion of said alley could be acquired by plaintiff or her predecessors in interest by adverse possession subsequent to said last-named date. As was said by the court in a similar case:

"The property dedicated has become public property, impressed with the use for which it was dedicated, and neither can the public divert it from that use nor can it be lost by adverse possession. Nor is the effect of such dedication impaired by any delay in the use of the land for which it was set apart. Such failure to make use of the land does not authorize the owner to resume possession. The public can thereafter appropriate the land to the use for which it was dedicated whenever convenience or necessity may suggest." Davidow v. Griswold, supra.

[3-5] This brings us to the real question in the case, and that is the width of the alley running easterly and westerly through said tract, which the original owners set apart or dedicated to the public for highway purposes. If this alley is only 10 feet in width, and must be measured from the south line of the adjacent lots, then this disputed strip of 6 feet is no part of it and plaintiff is undoubtedly the owner thereof. On the other hand, if the alley is 16 feet in width, then it includes this disputed strip, and the defendant has an easement thereon as claimed by it in its answer. As we have before stated, the figures "10" appear on the map within the lines indicating this alley and near the easterly end thereof. Figures placed like these on the alleys, streets, and lots shown on the map undoubtedly were so placed thereon for the purpose of showing the dimensions of the different pieces of land embraced within the tract, and shown on the map. These figures "10" appearing on the map, are unquestionably intended to indicate that this alley is 10 feet in width. If this were the only fact shown by the map regarding the width of the alley, there would be no question of the correctness of plaintiff's claim as to its width. There is, however, another fact shown on the map which we think must be given consideration. This fact is the location of the said alley between two sets of lots. The map shows that the lots facing on Washington street are separated from those to the south by this alley, and that this alley extends the entire distance from the southern boundary line of the Washington street lots to the northern boundary line of those lots situated to the south. This would indicate that the width of the alley was the distance between the lots facing on Washington street and those to the south, which by actual measurement is shown to be 16 feet. Which of these two features shown on the map are to control in this case? It is evident that they both cannot stand, as they are in direct conflict with each other. According to the plaintiff's contention, the original owners set apart only 10 feet for this alley, and that in so doing they left a strip 6 feet in width just south of the alley and running the entire width of the block. This strip of land plaintiff contends lies between the 10-foot alley, as claimed by her, and her lot and those of other owners similarly situated on the south. Just why this 6-foot strip should be located south of this supposed 10-foot alley and not north of it plaintiff has not explained. It appears to us that the same argument used by plaintiff for locating it adjacent to her lot could with equal force be used by the owners of the lots north of the alley to locate it contiguous to their lots. But, accepting plaintiff's contention as to its location, we are faced with this condition: The original locators have filed a map and sold to plaintiff or her predecessor a lot which this map shows is adjacent to an alley. It appears, however, upon a survey of the premises that this lot, according to plaintiff's contention, does not border upon said alley, but that there is a strip of land 6 feet in width between this lot and the said alley, which the original owners (we will suppose) claim was neither a part of said lot, nor of said alley, but that it belongs to them, and they proceed to occupy the same and to exclude the owner of said lot from any right to pass therefrom onto said alley. Could any such claim of the original owners be maintained? We think not. Having sold to plaintiff, or her predecessor, a lot adjacent to an alley, we think the original owners would be estopped from claiming that they were the owners of any land between said lot and said alley, and that when they filed for record a map and sold lots according thereto, which map showed that the lots were bounded by streets and alleys, that they would be bound by said map. This we think would be true even if, by so holding, the width of certain of the streets or alleys were extended beyond the apparent width shown on the map. The original owners, having filed the map, are bound thereby, and all doubts as to the meaning of the map, and any conflict appearing upon its face, are to be construed most strongly against them. 18 Cor. Jur. 110; Maheer v. Brown, 183 Ill. 575, 56 N. E. 181, 186; Florida East Coast Ry. Co. v. Worley, 49 Fla. 297, 38 So. 618, 622. Plaintiff stands in this action in no better position than the original owners would in an action brought by them to recover this strip of land prior to the running of the statute of limitations against them. Plaintiff has by adverse possession succeeded to only such rights in this strip of land as were held by the original owners after they had parted with their title to the lots bordering on this alley. The original owners having parted with all their rights in this strip of land when they filed for record the map and sold lots bordering on this alley, there was nothing for the plaintiff to acquire by adverse possession as against them. The finding therefore of the court that the plaintiff had acquired title to that portion of said 6-foot strip lying adjacent and north of said lot 22 in our opinion finds no support in the evidence.

There was other evidence in the case which we have not heretofore referred to. We have arrived at the above conclusion independent of this evidence. Nevertheless, we think it was both material and competent, and that it affords an additional ground in support of appellant's contention that the original owners intended and did actually dedicate an easterly and westerly alley 16 feet in width. This evidence was that of the civil engineer who made the original survey of the Arlington heights tract and subdivided the tract into lots, blocks etc. He stated at the trial that the alley in question, as originally surveyed and laid out, was 16 feet in width; that he made the original plat or map of the tract which designated said alley on said plat as 16 feet in width. This original map, however, was not produced at the trial, and there was evidence that it had been lost. At the time this map was filed for record in the office of the county recorder the law did not require, as it does now, that the original map should remain on file in said office. On the other hand, the law then in force required the record to make a copy of the map filed and to return the original to the owner. This witness further testified that this and all other alleys in the tract were, at the time of the survey of said tract, staked out on the ground as 16 feet in width. No attempt was made to dispute this testimony. The evidence in the case further shows that all of the owners of lots bordering upon any of the alleys in said tract, where improvements have been made contiguous to any of said alleys, have erected their buildings, fences, and other structures so as to allow 16 feet for the width of said alleys, with the single exception of the plaintiff. As stated above, while we have not based our opinion upon this evidence, we consider it of material importance in the case.

There is a further finding of the court upon which plaintiff relies for an affirmance of the judgment rendered herein. By this finding the court found that "the whole of the land as described in said complaint lies within the city of Los Angeles, and is described as lot 22 of block 21 of said Arlington heights tract, and has a width of 56 feet." We seriously question whether this finding can either be harmonized with the pleadings in the case or sustained by the evidence. By the complaint, plaintiff claims to be the owner of said lot 22 "and a parcel of land 6 feet in width and 142 feet in length lying parallel with, adjacent to, and contiguous with, and northerly of, the northerly line of said lot 22; the northerly line of said 6-foot strip also being parallel with and uniformly distant 210 feet southerly from the southerly line of Washington street." From this description of the property in dispute, given in the complaint, it is plain that the 6-foot strip is not claimed to be a part of said lot 22, but that it lies parallel with, adjacent to, and northerly of, the north line of said lot 22. Furthermore, the map of said tract shows that said lot 22 and every other lot in said tract is 50 feet in width, and there was no evidence in the case which conflicts in any manner with the map in this respect.

For the reasons stated herein, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

RIEDY et al. v. BIDWELL.

COOK v. SAME.

(Civ. 4284.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 9, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 9, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error — 1011(1)—Trial court's findings of fact not disturbed, where based on substantial evidence.

Trial court's findings of facts, based on substantial evidence, will not be disturbed, even though evidence preponderates against decision thereon.

2. Executors and administrators — 93(1)—Not duty of executor to carry on business formerly conducted by testator, unless power expressly given by testator's will or necessary to preserve estate.

An executor need not carry on for benefit of estate a business formerly conducted by testator, unless will of testator expressly creates power so to do or it is necessary to preserve estate.

3. Executors and administrators — 93(1)—Executor managing former business of testator personally liable for losses, unless expressly authorized.

Unless expressly authorized, an executor assuming to conduct former business of testator assumes risk as to losses incurred, but net profits become property of estate.

4. Executors and administrators — 96—Independent contract of executor binding on him personally.

Contracts by executor made on independent consideration do not bind estate, even though for its benefit, but are binding on executor personally.

5. Executors and administrators — 97—Court may make allowance to executor for expenses in connection with continuance of business of testator, where presumably made to preserve estate.

A contract between an executor and employees of business formerly conducted by testator whereby employees were to continue to conduct such business and receive a certain portion of profits being presumably for purpose of preserving estate and not illegal in itself, court could have made allowance to executor for expenses in connection therewith.

6. Executors and administrators — 97—Executor contracting with employees of testator's business whereby employees were to continue to conduct such business in return for percentage of profits held required to compensate such employees who fulfilled their part of contract.

Where executor contracted with employees of business formerly conducted by testator whereby such employees were to continue to conduct business, and in return receive a certain percentage of profits made, which contract was carried out in good faith by employees, and resulted in profit, held, that executor must compensate employees according to terms of such contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Separate actions by Elizabeth Riedy and husband and by Charles Cook against George M. Bidwell. Judgments for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Adam Thompson and Ren Thompson, both of San Diego, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. On December 11, 1918, Chester Bidwell died, leaving a considerable estate. In his will he made several devises and bequests, including one to his brother George M. Bidwell, the defendant in this action, which devise and bequest consisted in certain real estate and personal property known as the San Diego Feed Mills. Defendant was also appointed executor of the will. Immediately after the death of Chester Bidwell the feed mill was "closed down." On the 1st day of the following February defendant entered into an oral contract with the plaintiffs Elizabeth Riedy, Charles Cook, and E. M. Tinney (who before the death of Chester Bidwell had been in his employ) to the effect that, if they would manage and conduct the business of the feed mill, each of them for such services would respectively be paid a certain stipulated salary, and, in addition thereto and as further compensation for such services, after deducting from the net profits of the business an amount equal to 6 per cent. on the investment to be paid to said Bidwell, the sum so remaining would be divided among said Riedy, Cook, and Tinney. Under such arrangement the feed mill was operated for a period of about 13 months at a net profit of somewhere between about $13,000 and approximately $18,000—dependent upon the testimony of which accountant the court believed was a correct statement of fact.

Defendant having failed and refused to pay to his said employees any part of the net profits earned from the operation of the feed mill, two actions for damages were brought against defendant; one by Charles Cook and the other by Elizabeth Riedy, who sued, not only for her own original cause of action against defendant, but also upon an assigned claim made to her by her co-worker E. M. Tinney.

On the trial of the actions it was shown that, although certain profits had arisen from the operation of the business of conducting the feed mill, defendant had never accounted to the estate of Chester Bidwell therefor, but had assumed that such profits were his personal property, and accordingly, had appropriated them to his own use.

The findings of the court included the facts "that on the 1st day of January, 1919, George M. Bidwell was not the owner, nor was he in possession for himself, or running or conducting for himself," the said feed mill; "that on the 10th day of January, 1919, and up to the 28th day of November, 1919, the said George M. Bidwell was the duly and regularly appointed, qualified, and acting executor of the last will and testament of Chester Bidwell, deceased, * * * and that as said executor he was in possession for the estate of said deceased (and running said business as said executor for said estate)." The court further found that during all such time plaintiffs had full knowledge of all such facts.

Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and the plaintiffs have appealed therefrom.

[1] Appellant's first point for reversal of the judgment is that the findings of fact are not sustained by the evidence. An examination of the record herein leads to the conclusion that there is substantial evidence upon which to base the findings to which objection is made, and the rule is so well settled as to require no citation of authority that in such circumstances, even though it may appear that the evidence preponderates to the contrary of the decision thereon as reached by the trial judge, the appellant court will not interfere. It must therefore be assumed that in his individual capacity George M. Bidwell did not enter into the contract with plaintiffs, and that such contract was made by George M. Bidwell as executor of the last will of Chester Bidwell, deceased.

[2, 3] The law appears to be well settled that it is no part of the duty of an executor to carry on for the benefit of the estate a business formerly conducted by the testator in his lifetime. Exceptions to such rule may exist where the will of the testator expressly creates the power so to do, or where the carrying on of a business would be cast upon the executor as a necessary means for the preservation of the estate. If, in the absence of such authority, or other compelling reason, the executor assume to conduct the former business of the testator, it must be at his own risk as to losses incurred, but all net profits derived therefrom become the property of the estate. In re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 P. 86; Estate of Broome, 162 Cal. 258, 122 P. 470; Estate of Smith, 118 Cal. 462, 50 P. 701; Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179; Estate of Freud, 131 Cal. 667, 63 P. 1080, 82 Am. St. Rep. 407; Estate of De Rome, 175 Cal. 399, 165 P. 919.

In the case entitled In re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, at page 173, 22 P. 86, it is said:

"If, as in this case, the administrator elects to assume the peril, and is permitted by the court and parties interested, without objection, to so conduct and manage the business, the liabilities growing out of the management are not claims which could be enforced against the estate by the holders thereof. They are his liabilities. He has a right to pay them out of the increase of the business, but if by so doing a loss is sustained to the estate, he must make the loss good. Protected from loss and from liability at all times, the estate is interested in the business only to the extent of its profits; and in them, not because it is the business of the estate, but because the administrator is using the property of the estate in a way he is not authorized to do, and consequently, is required to account for all the profit made by its use."

[4] It is likewise a general rule, supported by a host of authorities, that contracts made by an executor, even though for the benefit of the estate, if made upon a new and independent consideration as between the promisee and executor, do not bind the estate, but are binding upon the executor personally. 24 Corp. Jur. § 483, and cases there cited; also 11 Cal. Jur. § 673.

In the early case of Dwinelle v. Henriquez, 1 Cal. 388, it was held that a public administrator was personally liable for the services of an attorney, performed by him at the request of the public administrator and in the interests of the particular estate involved. Although the point is not necessary to the decision, the same principle is indicated in the case of Gurnee v. Maloney, 38 Cal. 85, 99 Am. Dec. 352.

In Estate of Page, 57 Cal. 238, it appears that an administrator had made a contract with an attorney to give him an interest in certain property of the estate contingent upon recovery thereof. The court held that it was not within the power of the administrator to bind the estate by such a contract, but that "the administrator might be personally liable."

The case of Briggs v. Breen, 123 Cal. 657, 56 P. 633, 886, was another case where it was held that executors were personally liable for attorneys' fees. Touching the point, the court said:

"Since there was no agreement that the attorneys should look for their fees to the estate or an allowance therefrom by the court, it follows that the executors were liable personally to them for their reasonable compensation; it was so decided in Dwinelle v. Henriquez, 1 Cal. 387, and has been more or less distinctly asserted in several cases since [citing cases]."

In the case of Maxon v. Jones, 128 Cal. 77, 60 P. 516, the administrator of the estate entered into a contract by which he authorized a broker to procure a loan for and on behalf of the estate, and agreed to pay to the broker a commission of $1,500 for his services in obtaining the loan. It was held that the administrator was personally liable. In the course of the opinion it is said:

"We understand the well-settled rule to be that the administrator or executor of an estate is personally liable on his contract for services rendered the estate, unless there is an agreement to the contrary."

In the case of Moffitt v. Rosencrans, 136 Cal. 416, 69 P. 87, an executrix, who was sole residuary legatee under the will, without any order of court, had made a contract to sell certain land, and had given possession thereof to the vendee. Suit was afterwards brought by the executrix to recover possession of the land, and it was held that, in view of the fact that she was the sole residuary legatee of the estate, and that at the time of her agreement to sell the land the time for claims against the estate had expired, and all debts and legacies had been paid, leaving in her hands more than sufficient money to close the administration, she had thus become the sole beneficial owner of the land; and that the contract of sale was binding on her personally.

In Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 P. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127, it is held (syllabus):

"There is nothing unlawful in an administrator binding himself personally by a contract to sell the property of the estate in good faith for the benefit of himself and other heirs; and, though he may not be able to make a title by the decree of the court within the time limited, he may bind himself personally by a valid agreement for the return of the deposit made by his authority."

See, also, McKee v. Hunt, 142 Cal. 526, 77 P. 1103; Estate of Kruger, 143 Cal. 141, 76 P. 891; Golden Gate Undertaking Co. v. Taylor, 168 Cal. 94, 141 P. 922, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1152, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 742; Estate of Kasson, 119 Cal. 489, 51 P. 706; Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 494, 51 P. 695.

The only case which in any manner militates against the principle of law expressed in the forgoing cases to which attention of the court has been directed is that of Danielwitz v. Sheppard, 62 Cal. 339, in which it appeared that an administratrix, under an order of court, sold certain real property belonging to the estate for a specified sum of money, and reported the sale to the court for confirmation, pending which proceedings the administratrix, joining with an heir of the deceased, made an agreement with a broker to the effect that whatever sum he might be able to procure to be bid for said property on the hearing of the petition for confirmation of the sale which would be over and above the amount already bid thereon should be paid to such broker as his commission for effecting such sale at a higher price. The sale was made at an advanced price, and the administratrix and the heir declined to comply with the terms of the agreement. An action was brought against them on the contract. The trial court found that the contract was executed by the defendants as heirs of the estate and not in any representative capacity, and that it was so understood and agreed at the time of its execution. The court held that the contract was illegal and contrary to the policy of the law, and that there could be no recovery thereon.

A somewhat similar case in principle is that to be found in Estate of Willard, 139 Cal. 501, 73 P. 240, 64 L. R. A. 554, wherein it appears that the property was sold at public auction (subject to confirmation by the court) for the sum of $15,500. After the public sale of the property the administrator of the estate made an agreement with a broker to the effect that, so far as he had the power or was able, he would pay to the broker the sum of $1,400, provided that at the time set for the confirmation by the court of the sale of the property the broker would procure a bid of $20,000 therefor; and thereupon that the administrator would ask the judge of the probate court, in fairness to the broker, to order payment to the broker of said sum of $1,400. It was held that, while the administrator had no power to make a contract for services which would bind the court in the settlement of his final account, the court had authority to make an allowance to the administrator for a reasonable compensation to the broker who had rendered valuable services affecting the sale of real estate at a largely increased bid whereby a profit accrued to the estate.

In the case of Hickman-Coleman Co. v. Leggett, 10 Cal. App. 29, 100 P. 1072, an action was brought against the defendant individually for services rendered to the defendant by the plaintiff in procuring a purchaser for real estate belonging to the estate wherein the defendant was the sole executor of the will of the deceased. In the course of the opinion it is said:

"It is well settled that an executor or administrator cannot create any liability against the estate in his charge by his employment of attorneys, brokers, or others to assist him in the performance of his duties. The attorney, broker, or other person employed has no action or claim against the estate. Whatever claim he has, whether it be absolute or conditional, is against the executor or administrator in his individual capacity, who in turn may, if the expenditure was made in good faith and was proper, be credited therewith in the settlement of his accounts with the estate [citing cases]."

The appeal was from a judgment entered against the plaintiff upon an order sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the complaint. The court held that the plaintiff, having fully performed its contract, was entitled to its commissions, and reversed the judgment.

With reference to the contract in the case of Danielwitz v. Sheppard, 62 Cal. 339, to which attention has heretofore been directed, it appears that the purpose of the agreement between the parties was not to benefit the estate, but was solely to advantage the person with whom the contract was made. No part of the increase in price to be paid for the property to be sold was to inure to the benefit of the estate, but the whole thereof was to be paid to the broker, who was to induce some one to make a bid higher than the bid already received by the administratrix. Without the intervention of the broker, it is possible that the identical person who offered the increase in price for the property might have offered a higher price, and thus enriched the estate. But by the contract entered into between the administratrix and the broker there was no possibility of procuring a better price for the property, so far as the estate was concerned, from any person who might be induced to bid therefor by or through the efforts of the broker.

[5, 6] By virtue of the carrying out of the terms of the contract in the instant case the estate stood to receive a very considerable benefit: First, in the fact that the business would be more presentable to any intending or prospective purchaser as a "going concern," and hence more salable and at a higher price than though it were "closed down"; secondly, as a "going concern," and by reason of its reasonable use the various machinery, equipment, and property generally would not deteriorate and therefore depreciate in value to the same extent as though standing idle; and, thirdly, there was a possibility not only of having the taxes and general upkeep bills paid by reason of the operation of the business, but as well a net profit to the estate of 6 per cent. on the investment. The contract was not illegal in itself. Having been made by the executor presumably for the purpose of preserving the property of the estate, as well as with the expectation of earning a profit therefrom, it would have been within the power of the court to make allowance to the executor in his account for his proper and necessary expenses in connection therewith. In re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 P. 86. Had there been no net profit over and above the stipulated fixed salaries of the respective employees, or had the net profit, as estimated solely by dollars and cents, been nominal in amount, no good reason would appear why in effect the contract should not have been recognized and ratified. That under the apparently skillful guidance and management of the plaintiffs the result of business operations was changed from a loss to a considerable gain should in no way militate against the legitimacy of the contract. The plaintiffs in all good faith performed their part of the agreement. It is but right and just that the defendant should be compelled to compensate the plaintiffs in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The judgment is reversed.

Application for writ of mandate by A. M. Eckard against the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County and Merle J. Rogers, one of the judges presiding, to compel dismissal of appeal from justice court. Writ issued.

Otto & Linn, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

W. R. Law, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHENK, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles to enter an order dismissing an appeal from the justice's court, in an action wherein the petitioner is plaintiff, and Everett P. Wilson and Juanita Wilson are defendants.

The plaintiff in said action obtained a judgment against the defendants therein in the sum of $200 and costs. The defendant Juanita Wilson appealed therefrom. The papers in connection with the appeal were filed with the clerk of the superior court on March 13, 1923. On July 31, 1923, the superior court entered an order setting the case for trial de novo on June 2, 1924. On application of the appellant, but over the objection and against the protest of the plaintiff, the court continued the trial of the case to September 23, 1924. On September 17, 1924, the plaintiff served and filed a notice of motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the appellant had failed and neglected to bring her appeal to trial within one year from the date of the filing of the notice of appeal in the superior court, as required by section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said motion was based on the papers, records, and files in said action, and on an affidavit which disclosed that no written stipulation had been entered into and filed with the clerk of the superior court extending the time of trial beyond the statutory period. On September 22, 1924, the court granted the motion and entered an order dismissing the appeal. Thereafter the court on motion of the appellant, duly noticed, made and entered an order setting aside its order dismissing the appeal, and a further order refusing to dismiss the appeal. The present proceeding followed. It is admitted that the petition states all of the facts material to the controversy. One of those facts is that no written stipulation, as required by section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure, was entered into between the parties, and filed with the clerk of the superior court. The section of the code referred to provides that:

"No action heretofore or hereafter appealed from the justice court to the superior court shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all such actions heretofore, or hereafter appealed, must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been appealed, on its own motion, or on motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court, unless such time be otherwise extended by a written stipulation by the parties to the action filed with the clerk of the superior court to which the appeal is taken; provided, however, that in any appeal pending when this section takes effect, a judgment or dismissal shall not be entered under the direction hereof sooner than January first, 1924. * * *

[1, 2] In an action properly coming within its purview the foregoing section requires the dismissal of the appeal and not the dismissal of the action (Meier v. Sup. Ct. [Cal. App.] 227 P. 490; Reynolds v. Sup. Ct. [Cal. App.] 231 P. 354); and the provisions of the section are mandatory (Swim v. Sup. Ct. [Cal. Sup.] 26 P. 2). See, also, Miller & Lux v. Sup. Ct., 192 Cal. 333, 219 P. 1006.

[3, 4] The respondent court vacated its order dismissing the appeal, and thereafter refused to dismiss the same apparently on the theory that the section did not apply to a case where, as here, the trial had been set on a day prior to the effective date of the act, thus following the ruling of the District Court of Appeal in Grafton v. Sup. Ct. (Cal. App.) 226 P. 9. But the legislative intent to provide for pending appeals is evidenced by the proviso that, as to any appeal pending when the act went into effect, a judgment of dismissal should not be entered under the section prior to January 1, 1924. This proviso without any doubt was intended to allow time for the disposition of appeals pending at the time the act took effect. No particular significance is to be attached to the fact that the case had been placed on the calendar for trial prior to that date. Ravn v. Planz, 37 Cal. App. 735, 174 P. 690. The Legislature has power to prescribe the appellate jurisdiction of superior courts (Const. art. 6, § 5) and section 981a is a legitimate exercise of that power. Pacific, etc., Co. v. Sup. Ct. (Cal. App.) 232 P. 995. Any alleged hardship which may ensue by reason of the mandatory provision of the section is subject to control and correction by the Legislature.

[5] It was insisted by counsel for appellant on oral argument that the trial of this case was continued to September 23, 1924, upon a sufficient showing that the appellant was ill and could not for that reason be in attendance at the trial. Assuming, but not deciding, that, when an appeal from a justice's court has been set down for trial within the one-year period, and a necessary party to the action is unable to be present in court on the day of trial, or on any other day designated by the court for the trial thereof, before the expiration of the statutory period, solely because of illness, the court could, upon a proper showing, continue the trial beyond the one year and still preserve its jurisdiction to try the same, there is no showing herein that said appeal could not have been brought to trial with the appellant in attendance prior to the expiration of the year, to wit, prior to March 13, 1924.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 19, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡931(1)—On appeal, findings construed most favorable to judgment.

On appeal, findings must be construed most favorable to judgment.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡513(7)—Evidence held to warrant finding superintendent of streets made assessment, though prepared by another.

Evidence held to warrant finding that superintendent of streets signed assessment certificate and warrant, prepared by another under contract with superintendent with knowledge of contents of assessment roll, intending that assessments therein should be for improvement.

3. Evidence ⚡48—Common knowledge that work of preparing assessments for street improvements is done by skilled assistants.

It is common knowledge that in large cities work of preparing assessments for street improvements is done by skilled assistants in office of person or board having supervision of streets.

4. Municipal corporations ⚡515(1)—Employment of another by superintendent of streets to prepare assessment held irregularity not invalidating assessment.

Contract, whereby city superintendent of streets employed another to prepare assessment for street improvements, was not delegation of power to make assessment, in violation of Street Improvement Act 1911, § 20, subd. 10, as amended, where superintendent did not delegate power to act officially, but adopted assessment as his own, but was mere irregularity which did not invalidate assessment in view of sections 26 and 82.

5. Municipal corporations ⚡493(6)—Improvement assessment confirmed by council conclusive.

Street improvement assessment made by proper officer confirmed on appeal by city council is conclusive in absence of fraud on part of council.

6. Municipal corporations ⚡493(6)—Evidence of unequal assessment must be clear and convincing.

To set aside assessment for street improvements, confirmed by city council on appeal, on ground that whole assessment designedly preferred one section over remainder of district, record on its face must show clear and convincing evidence that under no circumstances could individual parcels have been benefited in proportion stated in assessment.

7. Municipal corporations ⚡513(7)—Evidence held not to show assessment for street improvement was arbitrary, unjust, or discriminatory.

Evidence held not to show that assessment of benefits for street improvement was arbitrary, unjust, or discriminatory.

8. Municipal corporations ⚡460—Inclusion in assessment of compensation of third person preparing assessment held proper as "incidental expenses."

Inclusion in assessment for street improvement of compensation to third person for making up assessment under contract with superintendent of streets held not improper as constituting increase in salary of superintendent, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9, in view of Improvement Act, §§ 18, 79, which defines "incidental expenses."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Incidental Expenses.]

9. Municipal corporations ⚡425(1)—Railroad property assessable for street improvements.

Railroad property may be assessed for street improvements on same basis as other property, in view of Improvement Act, § 20, subd. 11.

10. Municipal corporations ⚡294(2)—Torrens Land Title Law, requiring filing of notice of resolution for improvement, applies to resolution for work and not of intention.

Provision of Torrens Land Title Law, § 94, requiring filing in registrar's office of notice of resolution for street improvements affecting registered land within five days after its passage, refers to resolution ordering work, and not to resolution of intention.

11. Pleading ⚡433(1)—Insufficiency of complaints to raise issue of effect of want of notice held cured by allegations of answer and findings.

Insufficiency of complaints to raise issue of effect of want of notice of passage of resolution ordering work, because of failure to file notice of resolution in registrar's office within five days, as required by Torrens Land Title Law, §§ 94, 95, held cured by allegations of answer and findings of court.

12. Municipal corporations ⚡294(2)—Provision of Torrens Land Title Law for registering memorial of lien does not apply to street improvement resolution not creating lien.

Torrens Land Title Law, § 95, providing that no lien shall affect registered land until memorial thereof is entered on register, does not apply to memorial of resolution for street improvement which could not create lien on land.

13. Municipal corporations ⚡266—Provision of Improvement Act as to jurisdiction held not repealed by Torrens Land Title Law.

Improvement Act, § 7, giving council jurisdiction to order street improvement work on complying with certain requirements, was not repealed by Torrens Land Title Law, § 94.

14. Municipal corporations ⚡302(1) — Filing notice of resolution for street improvement before recording assessment held sufficient compliance with Torrens Land Title Law.

Filing notice of resolution for street improvement work required by Torrens Land Title Act, § 94, within five days after passage of resolution, is not mandatory, "must" and "will" being construed as directory, in view of section 34, subd. 4, and filing of notice of resolution before recording of assessment was sufficient compliance with statute.

15. Municipal corporations ⚡513(7)—Assessment roll held admissible in evidence to determine whether assessments were discriminatory.

In action to have assessments declared void, assessment roll was properly received in evidence to determine whether assessments were so arbitrary and discriminatory as to amount to constructive fraud.

16. Municipal corporations ⚡493(6) — Evidence showing inequality in assessments for street improvement inadmissible on question of benefits.

In action to declare street improvement assessments void, evidence showing that certain property was favored held inadmissible on question of benefits; determination of city council being conclusive.

17. Municipal corporations ⚡493(6) — Evidence showing inequality in assessments held inadmissible on question of constructive fraud.

In action to have street improvement assessments declared void, evidence showing certain property was favored held inadmissible on question of constructive fraud, which must be determined by conditions shown by record or coming within judicial knowledge.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; C. O. Busick, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Mary E. Rutledge and others against the City of Eureka and others to have certain assessments levied against property declared void. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

F. A. Cutler and J. F. Coonan, both of Eureka, J. M. Mannon, Jr., of San Francisco, and J. H. G. Weaver and Mahan & Mahan, all of Eureka, for appellants.

Alfred C. Skaife and Guy Le Roy Stevick, both of San Francisco, and Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondent Citizens' Nat. Bank of Los Angeles.

James W. Henderson, of San Jose, for respondents City of Eureka and officials thereof.

Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, Charles W. Cobb, of San Francisco, Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, and Everett W. Mattoon, Chief Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ in support of respondents' contention.

SHENK, J. Ten complaints were filed by the plaintiffs and appellants in the superior court in and for the county of Humboldt to enjoin the respondent city of Eureka and its officers from issuing bonds to represent certain special assessments in a street improvement proceeding. The actions were consolidated and tried together. Findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the defendants and respondents were signed and filed by the trial court, and from a judgment entered in accordance therewith the plaintiffs have appealed. The record is presented pursuant to section 953a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The street improvement proceeding was initiated by the adoption on the 20th day of May, 1919, of an ordinance of intention to order certain improvements to be made and work performed in said city pursuant to the improvement act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730) and amendments thereto. As therein contemplated the work was to consist, among other things, of grading, paving, and the construction of culverts, sanitary sewers, and storm sewers. The improvement was to extend from the southerly limits of the city along Broadway, Highway avenue, and Fourth street to the northerly city limits. No improvement, however, was to be constructed on Fourth street between E and H streets. The council declared and determined that the proposed improvement would be of more than local or ordinary public benefit and prescribed a district deemed to be benefited thereby, which district covered practically the entire city of Eureka. It also gave notice that serial bonds would be issued to represent unpaid assessments pursuant to the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1441). Following the adoption of the resolution of intention, all of the steps necessary to enable the council to acquire jurisdiction to order the work were admittedly duly taken. The contract was let to the Worswick Construction Company, the work was performed by that company in accordance with the requirements of the contract and was approved and accepted by the city. To this point the appellants make no objections to any of the proceedings under said improvement laws. Thereafter an assessment was made to cover the cost of the work, and on June 9, 1921, the said assessment together with the warrant were recorded in the office of the superintendent of streets and the diagram was there filed.

It is contended by appellants that the assessment so made and recorded was not the assessment of the superintendent of streets as required by the Improvement Act and was therefore void because of the alleged unlawful delegation of authority by the superintendent of streets to one A. J. Larson of the firm of Endicott & Larson in connection with the making of the assessment. It appears that on or about the 16th day of September, 1920, the superintendent of streets entered into a contract with Endicott & Larson to make up the assessment and the contractor's return and to furnish all necessary records and bonds, all for 1 per cent. of the contract price. When the improvement contract had been completed and the work accepted, the said Larson proceeded to and did make his estimate of the proper assessment to be charged against each lot, piece, or parcel of land in the assessment district, spreading the entire cost of the proceeding over the land in the district in accordance with his ideas of benefits. These estimates he delivered to the superintendent of streets, who thereafter adopted the same as his own and made the assessment accordingly.

The superintendent of streets certified, among other things, as follows:

"Pursuant to and in accordance with the statutes, I, W. H. Colwell, street superintendent of said city of Eureka, do hereby certify that that certain contract entered into between Worswick Construction Company and myself as the street superintendent of said city, on the 25th day of July, 1919, for the grading, paving, constructing sanitary sewers, storm sewers, catch-basin laterals, culverts, curbs, shoulders, ditches, bulkheads, manholes, lampholes, survey monuments, storm water inlets and fill in said streets above set forth in the said city of Eureka, has been fulfilled and is performed to my satisfaction, as said street superintendent, and I have accepted the work contracted for, and that I have estimated upon the land, lots or portions of lots, within the said assessment district, described in said resolution of intention, and shown upon the diagram herewith attached, prepared by the city engineer and approved by the city council, the benefits arising from the work performed under said contract and to be received by each lot, portion of such lot, piece or subdivision of land within said district, in the manner provided by law, and as such street superintendent I do now hereby assess upon and against said lands in said assessment district the sum of three hundred twenty nine thousand and fifty-three and fifty-four one-hundred ($329,053.54) dollars, the same being the total amount of the costs and expenses on said work done on said contract and the sum due for the work performed and specified in said contract (including incidental expenses) to wit: The amount to be paid under said contract $303,823.54; and the amount of incidental expenses incurred as provided by law, $25,230.00, making a total of $329,053.54, * * * as follows: (Here follows in tabulated form itemized cost of the several classes of work.) And I do hereby assess such total sum of $329,053.54 upon the several pieces, parcels, lots, portions of lots and subdivisions of land in said district benefited thereby, to wit: Upon each respectively in proportion to said estimated benefits to be received by each of said several lots, portions of lots or subdivisions of land * * * as follows: (Here follows descriptions of some 13,000 parcels of land with a separate number opposite each description and the amount of assessment charged against each.)"

To this certificate and assessment is appended the signature of W. H. Colwell, street superintendent of the city of Eureka, dated Eureka, Cal., May 12, 1921. The assessment was duly recorded in the office of the superintendent of streets on May 12, 1921. On the same day the superintendent of streets signed a warrant to the assignee of the contractor to demand and receive the several assessments and recorded the same in his office.

The allegations of the several complaints are substantially in accord, and it is there averred:

"That said superintendent of streets did not upon or after the delivery to him of said diagram or any time make said assessment in conformity with the provisions of section 20, subdivision 10, of the said street improvement act of 1911 and the amendments thereto, but said assessment was previously made by one Larson and was delivered at the time and date of the delivery of said diagram to said superintendent of streets; that in making said assessment said Larson intruded upon and usurped the duties of said office of superintendent of streets of the city of Eureka, and in making said assessments said Larson did not consult, advise or co-operate with said Colwell, but at all times in making such assessment exercised his own judgment and discretion independent of and without the knowledge, consent or acquiescence of said Colwell; that all of said acts and proceedings were had and done by said Larson willfully, knowingly and perpetrated a fraud upon these plaintiffs and each one of them in that each plaintiff as the owner of land within said assessment district was and is entitled to have the official elected by the electors of said city of Eureka and as the official designated by law to use and exercise his judgment and discretion in making said assessments."

Pursuant to issue joined on the foregoing allegations and the affirmative averments of the answers of the defendants, the court found as follows:

"That on or about the 15th day of August, 1920, the superintendent of streets of said city of Eureka entered into a contract with Endicott & Larson, a copartnership, wherein and whereby the said Endicott & Larson agreed to do and perform the work of making up and furnishing an assessment roll of and for the aforesaid work, and to compute and estimate the assessment for the aforesaid work, on each lot, piece, parcel, and subdivision of land within the aforesaid assessment district. * * * That said diagram so prepared by said engineer as aforesaid was on the 3d day of May, 1921, duly approved by the council of the city of Eureka and certified by the city clerk of said city, and that the said diagram as the same was prepared by said city engineer, approved by said city council, and certified by said city clerk, was delivered to such superintendent of streets, and said Endicott & Larson * * * did proceed to compute and estimate, and did compute and estimate upon and against the lots, lands, portions of lots, pieces, parcels, and subdivisions of land within said assessment district as shown on said diagram, the benefits arising from the aforesaid work, and to be received by each such lot, piece, and parcel and subdivision of land, and in making up said assessment pursuant to said agreement did thereupon apportion upon and against said land in said assessment district, the total amount of the cost and expense of the aforesaid work, and in making up said assessment pursuant to said agreement did apportion the total cost and expense of the aforesaid work upon the several pieces, parcels, lots, portions of lots, and subdivisions of land in said assessment district benefited by the aforesaid work, to wit: Upon each respectively in proportion to the estimated benefits to be re-lots, and subdivisions of land. * * * That on ceived by each of said several lots, portions of the 12th day of May, 1921, such superintendent of streets, in his official capacity, did adopt the assessment so made by Endicott & Larson pursuant to said agreement as the assessment in said proceeding, and did sign said assessment in his official capacity and did attach thereto a warrant which warrant was in the form provided by said 'Improvement Act of 1911.' That said warrant was signed by the superintendent of streets and countersigned by the mayor of the city of Eureka and that said warrant, said diagram, and said assessment together with a certificate, prepared and signed by said city engineer, showing the quantity and character of the aforesaid work done, was on the 12th day of May, 1921, duly recorded in the office of the superintendent of streets of the city of Eureka. That in said assessment said W. H. Colwell as superintendent of streets of the city of Eureka did certify, pursuant to and in accordance with the Improvement Act of 1911, that the contract entered into between the Worswick Construction Company and W. H. Colwell as street superintendent of said city of Eureka, on the 25th day of July, 1919, for the work provided in said resolution of intention No. 113, had been fulfilled and performed to his satisfaction as such street superintendent, that he had accepted the work contracted for, that he had estimated upon the land, lots, or portions of lots within the said assessment district described in said resolution of intention and shown upon the diagram attached to said assessment prepared by the city engineer and approved by the city council, the benefits arising from the work performed under said contract and to be received by each lot, portion of such lot, pieces, or subdivisions of land within said district in the manner provided by law. In said assessment said W. H. Colwell as such street superintendent did declare that he did then and thereby assess upon and against such lands in said assessment district the total amount of the cost and expense on said work done on said contract, being the sum due for the work performed and specified in said contract including incidental expenses, and did further declare in said assessment that he did thereby assess such total sum upon the several pieces, parcels, lots, and subdivisions of land in said district benefited by said work, to wit, upon such respectively in proportion to the said designated benefits to be received by each of said several lots, portions, of lots or subdivisions of land. That it is not true that the said superintendent of streets did not upon, or after, the delivery to him of said diagram, or at any time make said assessment in conformity with the provisions of section 20, subdivision 10, of said Improvement Act of 1911, and the amendments thereto, nor that said assessment was previously made by one Larson or was delivered at the time or date of the delivery of said diagram to said superintendent of streets, nor that in making said assessment said Larson intruded upon and usurped the duties of said office of superintendent of streets of the said city of Eureka, nor that in making said assessment said Larson did not consult or advise or co-operate with said Colwell, or that at all times in making said assessment said Larson exercised his own judgment or discretion independent of, or without the knowledge, consent, or acquiescence of, said Colwell or that all or any of said acts or proceedings * * * perpetrated a, or any, fraud upon said plaintiffs, or each of them, or any of them. * * *

[1, 2] The foregoing findings were supported by the evidence. The testimony of the superintendent of streets was somewhat equivocal, but we are required on appeal to consider the evidence in its aspect most favorable to upholding the findings and judgment. Breese v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 31 P. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 P. 659; Estate of Hill, 167 Cal. 59, 138 P. 690. When so considered, his testimony was that when he signed the certificate and warrant he signed the same in his official capacity as superintendent of streets, that he knew the contents of the assessment roll and intended when he signed the certificate that the assessments therein provided for should be the assessments for the work described. This formal record of the official action of the superintendent of streets under the circumstances here shown was sufficient upon which to base the findings of the court.

[3, 4] It is earnestly insisted, however, that even the facts as found disclose an unlawful delegation of authority to Endicott & Larson by the superintendent of streets arising from the contract of employment. Numerous cases are cited wherein improvement proceedings have been held invalid because of an unlawful or unauthorized delegation of authority. It is deemed unnecessary to review them for the reason that in those cases discretionary power to act finally on the subject was placed or was attempted to be placed out of the hands of those in whom the law vested the power to act and into the hands of the person to whom the authority was delegated. Here the superintendent of streets actually exercised the power conferred upon him by the statute to make the assessment. While the correspondence between Endicott & Larson and the superintendent of streets shows that the former offered, among other things, "to make and record the assessment" for the stipulated price and the offer in that form was accepted by the superintendent of streets, it is plain from what was done under the agreement that it was intended by the parties that the work of Endicott & Larson was to "make up" or prepare an assessment for the assistance and advice of the superintendent of streets. No case has been cited which would operate to prevent the furnishing of assistance to the superintendent of streets in the performance of such work. It is apparent that the task of preparing the assessment here involved would have been impossible on the part of the respondent superintendent of streets without assistance. It is a matter of common knowledge that in large cities where street improvements are carried on extensively, the work here performed by Larson is done by an assistant skilled in the work in the office of the superintendent of streets or of the lawfully constituted board, commission, or officer exercising his functions. In such circumstances it has never been held, as far as we are aware, that the superintendent of streets or the board, commission, or officer acting lawfully in his stead has relinquished or delegated the statutory power to make the assessment when it appeared, as it does in this case, that the power to act officially was not delegated or relinquished and the act required to be done by the statutory officer was actually performed by him. When the superintendent of streets signed the certificate to the assessment roll, he adopted the work of Larson as his own. See Witter v. Bachman, 117 Cal. 318, 49 P. 202. And having made and authenticated the assessment in his official capacity, it would not be competent for the superintendent of streets to repudiate it. Hadley v. Dague, 130 Cal. 207, 215, 65 P. 500.

We entertain no doubt that it would be within the power of the Legislature to authorize the street superintendent to employ persons to assist him in preparing the assessment. Assuming that he did so in this case without express statutory authority, such action would be a mere irregularity which would not affect the jurisdiction of the council, already acquired, to order the improvement nor invalidate any assessment for the cost of the work, under section 26 of the Improvement Act, which provides that—

"No assessment * * * and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality, or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the council to do the work, has been actually published as herein provided, and said notices of improvement have been posted along the line of the work, as provided in section five of this act, before the passage of the resolution ordering the work to be done."

The constitutional and statutory requirements were complied with and the exclusive remedy of the appellants, in the absence of fraud, and none is here shown, was by appeal to the council as declared in section 82 of the act. Appeals were so taken by the appellants, and after hearings before the council extending over a period of approximately three weeks the objections of the appellants were overruled and the assessments confirmed. Said section 82 provides:

"This act shall be liberally construed to the end that its purposes may be effective. No error, irregularity, informality, and no neglect or omission of any officer of the city, in any procedure taken hereunder, which does not directly affect the jurisdiction of the city council to order the improvement, shall avoid or invalidate such proceeding or any assessment for the cost of work done thereunder. The exclusive remedy of any person affected or aggrieved thereby shall be by appeal to the city council as herein provided."

This is a most comprehensive curative provision. It is more than a curative act. A curative act is retrospective. Here the same statute which prescribed certain requirements provides that failure to comply with such requirements shall not avoid the assessment. It is competent to provide in the law itself that a disregard of the provisions not essential to confer jurisdiction on the council to order the work may in turn be disregarded. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81; Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irr. Dist., 173 Cal. 660, 161 P. 113; Bienfield v. Van Ness, 176 Cal. 585, 169 P. 225; Oakland Pav. Co. v. Whittell Realty Co., 185 Cal. 113, 195 P. 1058; City Street Imp. Co. v. Watson, 50 Cal. App. 687, 195 P. 967. See, also, Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 186 P. 753.

[5-7] It is contended that the assessments charged against the lands of the appellants are unjust, arbitrary, and discriminatory, and deprive them of their property without due process of law and deny to them the equal protection of the law. In this connection it is alleged that a plan of assessment was adopted not based upon the use, status, value, or location of the said lots and land as affected by the benefit received from said improvements; that the benefit plan as prescribed by the statute was not followed; that unimproved land, residential property, and land fronting on Fourth street and Broadway (except the land fronting on Fourth street between E and H streets and the land of the appellant railroad company) were overassessed and 26 blocks in the business district were underassessed "in pursuance of an unlawful and fraudulent scheme in order that credit might and should be given to the property within said business district." These allegations were denied by the answers, and the court found the allegations to be untrue. The appellants concede that it is well settled that when a proper official has exercised his discretion and made the assessment, and the council has on appeal confirmed the same, the matter is foreclosed in the absence of specific fraud on the part of the council. But it is urged that the law in such cases is confined to the consideration of isolated assessments where it is claimed on the part of the property owner appealing to the city council that the assessment upon his particular lot exceeds the benefit conferred upon that particular piece of land and that it does not apply to a case where, as it is claimed it appears in this case, a scheme of assessment was willfully and designedly adopted whereby an entire section of the district was preferred to the detriment of the balance of the district. The finding of the trial court was against the allegations and contentions of the appellants on this point, but notwithstanding such finding it is insisted that the assessment is so unequal on its face as to render it invalid. It is urged that the record herein brings the case within the ruling of Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 170 Cal. 31, 148 P. 217, L. R. A. 1918E, 197, wherein it was held that the assessment might be so manifestly and so grossly unjust upon its face as to justify the court in setting it aside despite the decision of the council on appeal. But in order to set aside an assessment on the authority of that case the record on its face must furnish clear and convincing evidence that under no conditions could the several parcels of land have been benefited in the proportion stated by the assessment. Cutting v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 151, 187 P. 19. The entire record is before us, including the assessment and diagram. It is voluminous and has been examined with care. An inspection thereof shows that certain properties in the so-called business district of the city were assessed at sums less than and greatly disproportionate to the assessment of property in other sections of the city, and at first glance it would seem that this property had been unduly favored in the making of the assessment. But counsel for the respondents has stated, and it is not denied by the appellants, that the portion of the district alleged to be so favored is adjacent to that part of Fourth street between E and H streets which had theretofore been graded and paved. This fact also appears on the face of the record and furnishes some explanation why the property in that particular vicinity was not assessed at a greater amount. No actual fraud is alleged, and it must be assumed that the city council exercised an honest discretion in determining the appeals. It will not be presumed that the evidence before the city council was not sufficient to support its conclusions. Rockbridge Place Co. v. City Council, 178 Cal. 58, 172 P. 1110. It is conceivable that the city council might have determined that the assessment as to the appellants' property and the assessment on said portion of the business district were not disproportionate as to benefits received for the reason that the business property in question had theretofore been assessed to pay the cost of the grading and paving on Fourth street between E and H streets. It must be conceded that reasonable minds might differ as to the extent of benefits received by the particular business property referred to, and that a much higher assessment on this property could have been made; but from an examination of the entire record and the circumstances as disclosed by the respondents, it cannot be said that there was no reasonable ground upon which the council might conclude that the assessments which were actually made were not unjust nor discriminatory.

[8] It is contended that the inclusion in the assessment of the item of $3,033.23 as the compensation of Endicott & Larson was an improper item and not chargeable to the assessment district, in that it would in effect constitute an increase in the salary of the superintendent of streets in violation of section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution. The amount referred to was the contract price at which Endicott & Larson performed their work and was included in the assessment as an incidental expense. The third paragraph of section 79 of the act defines "incidental expenses." Many items are included, among which is found "the expenses of making the assessment for any work authorized by this act." The statute contemplates that costs and expenses will accrue in addition to the contract price and makes provision for payment thereof. By the terms of section 42 of the act the superintendent of streets is authorized to employ inspectors to take charge and superintend the construction of the work and to report to him any departure from the requirements of the contract. Payment for such inspection and superintendence is provided for and included in the cost of the work as an incidental expense. Under the Improvement Act all work must be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets. It is his official duty to see that the work is so done and performed. Obviously it would be impossible in many instances for him to do so personally. In contemplation of that fact the statute provides for his assistance by the appointment of inspectors. It may not be said that payment for these services under such circumstances would operate in such manner as to increase the salary of the superintendent of streets in violation of section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution. Such a holding would in some instances render the act inoperative and defeat its purposes. The same reason would seem to apply to the employment of assistance in the preparation of the assessment roll. Section 18 of the act authorizes the superintendent of streets to enter into all written contracts provided for in the act and to do all other things that expressly or impliedly pertain to the street department under the act. Because of the magnitude of the task in preparing the assessment roll here involved, the need of assistance is apparent, and the employment of persons for that purpose would reasonably be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the act.

The appellants rely on the case of Forward v. County of San Diego, 189 Cal. 704, 209 P. 993, in support of the contention that the allowance of compensation to Endicott & Larson would be an increase in the compensation of the superintendent of streets in contravention of section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution. It was there held that section 4041b of the Political Code, enacted in 1919, and providing that a county board of supervisors in its discretion should have the power to appoint an advisory board to cooperate with the county assessor in making the annual assessment of real property and providing for the compensation of the members of the board from the county treasury was unconstitutional, in that the effect of the section would be to increase the compensation of the county assessor during his term of office. In that case emphasis was placed on the provisions of section 4290 of the Political Code, which provides that the salaries and fees fixed in the title of that Code of which section 4290 is a part shall be in full compensation for all services of any kind or description rendered by the officers named in said title either by the officers themselves or by their deputies or assistants. The title referred to is title 2 of part 4 of the Political Code and contains provision for compensation of county officers. Those provisions do not refer to nor are they applicable to city officers of whom the respondent superintendent of streets is one. One of the purposes of section 9 of article 11 was to prevent the possibility of an officer using the power and influence of his official position to obtain an increase of compensation after his election or during his term of office. Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 69, 82 P. 674. It may also be said that this section was designed to prevent unwarranted demands upon the public treasury resulting from a possible concert of action between public officers or expectant candidates for public office. But in a street proceeding such as the one with which we are here concerned the public funds are in no wise involved. The city acts merely as the agent of the property owners of the district and the city treasury is not required by the statute to bear any portion of the cost of the work. When a statute has imposed a special burden upon the superintendent of streets which is impossible of performance by him without assistance, it seems clear that it was contemplated that such assistance be available to him, especially when the cost thereof is not a charge upon the public funds. To hold that section 9 of article 11 would prohibit the employment of such assistance would not further the purpose of that section but would thwart the objects and purposes of the Improvement Act.

[9] On behalf of the appellant Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company, it is contended that it is a common carrier with a total track mileage of 640 miles; that it passes through the city of Eureka within the assessment district and has approximately four miles of main-line track lots, connected with depot grounds, freight and round houses, side tracks, etc., in the city, all used as a part of the general system. It is urged that there is no rational basis for an assessment upon the property within the district to the extent of $13,418.29, which was the amount of its assessment. It is declared in subdivision 11 of section 20 of the Improvement Act that—

"The terms, lot, lots, lands, piece or parcel of land wherever mentioned in this act shall be deemed to include and shall include property owned or controlled by any person, firm or corporation as a railroad, street or interurban railroad right of way, and whenever a railroad, street or interurban railroad right of way shall front on or about or parallel or be included within or divide * * * any district to be assessed for the cost of any improvement provided in this act, such railroad right of way (whether the same is owned in fee or as an easement) shall be included in the warrant, assessment and diagram and shall be assessed in the manner and with the same effect as other lots, lands or pieces or parcels of land are assessed as provided in this act."

The appellants rely upon the case of Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Road Improvement Dist., 256 U. S. 658, 41 S. Ct. 604, 65 L. Ed. 1151, involving an assessment of railroad property in a road improvement district. It was held in that case that the particular assessment under attack was invalid for the reason that the amount thereof was arrived at "apparently according to some vague speculation as to present worth and possible future increased receipts from freight and passengers which would enhance its value, considered as a component part of the system," and not according to area and position as other property in the district was assessed. It was further said that—

"Railroad property may not be burdened with local improvements on a basis so wholly different from that used for ascertaining the contribution demanded of individual owners as necessarily to produce manifest inequality."

But in the case at bar it does not appear that any different method was employed in arriving at the assessment of the railroad property from that adopted in assessing other lands in the district. The right of the Legislature to provide for the assessment of railroad property has been recognized (see McNeil v. South Pasadena, 166 Cal. 153, 135 P. 32, 48 L. R. A. [N. S.] 138), and such assessments have been upheld in other jurisdictions (Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 197 U. S. 430, 25 S. Ct. 466, 49 L. Ed. 819; Grand Rapids v. Railway System, 214 Mich. 1, 182 N. W. 424; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Seattle, 46 Wash. 674, 91 P. 244, 12 L. R. A. [N. S.] 121, 123 Am. St. Rep. 955; Des Moines City Ry. Co. v. City, 183 Iowa, 1261, 159 N. W. 450, 165 N. W. 398, L. R. A. 1918D, 839; Heman Constr. Co. v. Wabash R. R., 206 Mo. 172, 104 S. W. 67, 12 L. R. A. [N. S.] 112, 121 Am. St. Rep. 649, 12 Ann. Cas. 630; Superior v. Lake Superior T. & T. R. Co., 152 Wis. 389, 140 N. W. 26; Georgia Ry. & E. Co. v. Atlanta, 144 Ga. 722, 87 S. E. 1058; Chicago, M. & St. Paul R. Co. v. Milwaukee, 148 Wis. 39, 133 N. W. 1120). Full authority exists for the assessment of this railroad property and the objection to the assessments here complained of are not well taken.

[10, 11] Some of the appellants own or have an interest in certain lands in Clark's South Park addition, included within the assessment district, and which, prior to said Improvement proceeding and at all of the times involved therein, were registered under the Torrens Land Title Law (Stats. 1915, p. 1932). It is their contention that said assessment has never become effective and is void as to those lands because of the failure of the clerk of the council to file in the office of the registrar a notice of the passage of the resolution ordering the work within five days after the passage thereof. This contention is based on sections 94 and 95 of the Land Title Law. Section 94 provides:

"When in a city, town, or county, an ordinance, resolution, or order is passed or made, to lay out, establish, alter, widen, grade, regrade, relocate, or construct or repair a street, sidewalk, drain, or sewer, or to make any other public improvement, or to do any work, the whole or a portion of the expense for which assessments may be made upon real estate, if any registered land or any land included in an application for registration then pending is affected by the act or proceeding and liable to such assessment, the clerk of the board passing such ordinance, resolution, or order must, within five days after the passage of such ordinance, resolution, or order, file in the registrar's office a notice of the passage thereof, and a memorial must thereupon be noted on the register. In case of the repeal of such ordinance, resolution, or order, the clerk of said board, and in case of the satisfaction of any lien thereunder, the superintendent of streets or other officer required by law to collect and receive such assessments, must within five days thereafter, notify the registrar, in writing, who shall thereupon cancel such memorial."

The complaints allege that "no copy of said resolution of intention No. 113 was filed in the recorder's office" within five days after its passage as required by sections 94 and 95 of said act. It is not alleged that such a notice was not filed within five days after the passage of the resolution ordering the work. The appellants who are attacking the assessment on this ground evidently at first construed section 94 to require the filing of the notice within five days after the passage of the resolution of intention. But it is obvious from the wording of the section that the resolution ordering the work is the resolution referred to. While the issue tendered by these appellants on the question of the effect of want of notice of the passage of the resolution ordering the work is apparently insufficient, the respondents allege that in May, 1921, and prior to the making, issuing, or recording the assessment, warrant, and diagram, the clerk duly filed in the office of the registrar "a notice of the passage of the resolution or order to make the public improvement described in plaintiffs' complaint," and that said registrar did thereupon make the notation on the certificate of each of the several lots involved. The court found:

"That neither within five days after the passage by said city council of said resolution of intention No. 113, nor within five days after the passage of said resolution No. 1075 ordering said street work, did the clerk of said city council of the city of Eureka file in the said registrar's office a notice of the passage of said resolutions or either of them. That on the 7th day of May, 1921, and prior to the making, filing, and recording of the assessment, warrant, and diagram in said proceeding, and prior to the accrual of the lien of the assessments herein, the said clerk of said city council did file within the office of said registrar a notice of the passage of said resolutions and each of them. That on the 7th day of May, 1921, the said registrar noted on each of the registers of all the said properties in Clark's South Park addition to the city of Eureka a memorial of said notice."

Because of the allegations in the answers of the respondents and the finding of the court, the issue will be deemed sufficiently raised for the purpose of determining the point.

[12] It is the contention of these appellants that the filing of the notice by the clerk in the office of the registrar is jurisdictional and mandatory, especially in view of the language of section 95 of the act, which reads as follows:

"No statutory or other lien shall be deemed to affect the title to registered land until after a memorial thereof is entered upon the register, as herein provided."

It is to be noted that section 95 does not refer to the memorial of the passage of any ordinance, resolution, or order referred to in section 94, but only to the memorial of a statutory or other lien which shall not be deemed to affect the title to registered land until after a memorial thereof is entered as herein provided. The words last italicized cannot be said to refer to the memorial of the passage of the resolution either of intention or of ordering the work, for such a memorial would not refer to a statutory or other lien. No assessment lien has attached under the Improvement Act prior to the expiration of the five-day period and may never attach for numerous reasons arising during the course of the proceeding and prior to the recording of the assessment, warrant, and diagram in the office of the superintendent of streets. Until such recording takes place the lien does not attach under section 23 of the Improvement Act. Likewise, the words "as herein provided" do not refer to the entry of a memorial of a statutory or other lien provided for in said section 95 itself, for none is there provided for, but must refer only to the entry of a memorial of a statutory or other lien as elsewhere provided in the Land Title Act. A reference to other sections of the act shows what liens might be referred to. Section 59 provides for the registration of mortgages, leases, contracts to sell, and other instruments intended to create a lien. Section 91 provides how judgments, decrees, and other orders of court may become a lien. Section 92 provides how writs of attachment may become liens. Section 93 provides how mechanics' liens may become effective as to registered land. A careful reading of the act discloses that section 95 applies only to the memorial of statutory or other liens elsewhere mentioned in the act and does not apply to the memorial of the passage of the resolution in question which could not create a lien on property, either registered under the Land Title Law or not so registered.

[13, 14] Since section 95 has no reference to anything contained in section 94, what, then, was the effect of the failure of the clerk of the respondent city council to file in the office of the registrar a notice of the passage of the resolution ordering the work within five days after its passage? It cannot be assumed that in the enactment of the Land Title Law it was intended that the provisions of section 94 thereof should repeal or abrogate or affect in any way the declaration of section 7 of the Improvement Act to the effect that when certain steps had been taken, and which admittedly were all taken in the present proceeding, the council should be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the work. In fact, all of the constitutional requirements necessary to vest in the council jurisdiction to order the work have taken place before the adoption of the resolution ordering the work. The filing of the notice is therefore not jurisdictional. If the purpose of the filing was to apprise the owner of registered land that an assessment was about to become a charge upon his property, that purpose would be accomplished if the notice be filed before the recording of the assessment in the office of the superintendent of streets. The omission of the clerk here complained of was not an entire failure to file the notice, but a failure to file the same within the five-day period. There is no declaration in the section that its language is mandatory. The use of the word "must" is not necessarily determinative of its mandatory import. The words "shall" and "must" are frequently construed as directory terms. Cake v. City of Los Angeles, 164 Cal. 705, 130 P. 723; People ex rel. Thompson v. San Bernardino High School Dist., 62 Cal. App. 67, 216 P. 959. There are in the section no negative words forbidding the filing of the notice after the time fixed. Nor is there language importing an intention to withdraw power to enforce the assessment following a belated notice. Nor is any right of the property owner shown to be lost or impaired by the failure to file the notice in time. Under such circumstances, it is proper to construe the time requirement to be directory. Cake v. City of Los Angeles, supra. This conclusion is fortified by a consideration of other provisions of the Land Title Law. It is provided in section 34 that—

"The registered owner of any estate or interest in land brought under this act shall * * * hold the same subject only to such estates, mortgages, liens, charges, and interests as may be noted in the last certificate of title in the registrar's office, and free from all others, except: * * * (4) Any tax or special assessment for which a sale of the land has not been had at the date of the certificate of title."

None of the lands of the appellants has been sold to satisfy the assessment. The exception would indicate that even though a "tax or special assessment" which had not proceeded to sale be not noted on the last certificate of title in the registrar's office, the registered owner would hold the land subject to such tax or special assessment. But section 94 should be given the effect to which it is entitled when read in connection with the rest of the act. When this is done, its provisions are found to be directory only. It is concluded that the filing of the notice of the passage of the resolution ordering the work at the time and in the manner found by the trial court, that is to say, before the recording of the assessment, was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of that section.

[15] The appellants assign numerous specifications of error of the trial court relating to the admissibility and exclusion of evidence. It is urged that the court erred in overruling the objections of appellants to the admission of the assessment in evidence. It was proper to receive the assessment roll in evidence in order that the court might determine whether the assessments were so arbitrary and discriminatory on the face thereof as to amount to a constructive fraud on the appellants. It was admissible even on the appellants' theory of the case.

[16, 17] Evidence was tendered by the appellants as to the assessed value of certain of their properties and properties in the business district claimed to have been favored, for the declared purpose of proving inequality and discrimination in the assessments. In so far as such evidence might have a bearing on the question of benefits, the determination of the council was conclusive. Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 76 P. 661; Cutting v. Vaughn, supra. In so far as it related to the charge of constructive fraud, the conditions shown by the record or coming within judicial knowledge must furnish the basis of interference by the courts. Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, supra; Larsen v. San Francisco, 182 Cal. 1, 186 P. 757; Swall v. County of Los Angeles, 42 Cal. App. 758, 184 P. 406. There was no error in sustaining the objections to the proffered evidence.

The other alleged errors have been noted. It is deemed unnecessary to discuss them in detail. No serious objection appears to any of the rulings of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SEAWELL, J. The defendants, twenty-seven in number, were jointly accused by an indictment presented against them by the grand jury of the county of Los Angeles of the crime of violating the Criminal Syndicalism Act of this state. Stats. 1919, p. 281. The indictment contains two separate counts, the first of which is framed under section 2, subd. 4, of said act, and the second count charges a conspiracy, plan, and agreement to accomplish a change in industrial ownership and control in the existing economic and social system, and also to effect political changes in this state and in the United States of America by means and methods denounced by said act. Defendants were tried jointly, and separate verdicts of guilty were returned against each of them under both counts of the indictment. Judgments were pronounced against sixteen of said defendants on both counts (sentences to run concurrently), and against the remaining eleven on said second count only. The appeal is taken jointly from the judgments of conviction and the orders denying motions for new trials.

Defendants declined the aid of counsel at the trial, and elected to defend themselves. Each defendant took part in the conduct of his trial. Three or four of their number acted as general spokesmen for all, and, while none professed special training in the law or any knowledge of court procedure, they certainly displayed a degree of skill in the management of the trial, and a familiarity with the law of the case and with the general rules of evidence far exceeding that which the average layman might be expected to possess. The defendants requested and were supplied with a daily transcript of the proceedings and the motions subsequently made by them to strike out certain parts of the evidence which had been improperly admitted, and the pertinency of the instructions which they presented for the guidance of the jury in its deliberations clearly indicated that they had had the advantage of legal assistance from some source. Besides, the court accorded to them the fullest protection of the law, and assisted them upon many occasions in developing and presenting their several defenses. No complaint is made of unfairness on the part of the court in any respect or lack of opportunity to present the several defenses in the fullest possible manner.

[1, 2] One of the grounds of appeal involves the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgments of conviction. In considering this issue it must be borne in mind that we are a court of appeal, and, as such, we cannot usurp the functions of the triers of fact. It is a rule well settled by many of the decisions of this court that upon an appeal all intendments are in favor of the regularity of the action of the court below, and that error will not be presumed, but must affirmatively appear. If there is any substantial evidence in the case by which the verdict of the jury can be supported, it does not lie in our power to disturb the jury's findings on the ground of a failure of evidence to support the judgment. The rule is aptly stated in People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 326, 184 P. 389, 393, as follows:

"In passing upon this question [sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict] we will not attempt to determine the weight of the evidence, but will decide only whether upon the face of the evidence it can be held that sufficient facts could not have been found by the jury to warrant the inference of guilt. For it is the function of the jury in the first instance, and of the trial court after verdict, to determine what facts are established by the evidence, and, before the verdict of the jury, which has been approved by the trial court, can be set aside on appeal upon the ground we are discussing, it must be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below."

[3, 4] So in this case the jury reached a verdict upon the evidence presented. It was the province of the jury alone, subject to the control of the court and in subordination to the rules of evidence to judge of the credibility of the witnesses and the effect and value of the evidence addressed to them. Code Civ. Proc., § 2061. Evidence may be indirect as well as direct, and as such it may be sufficiently convincing to justify a verdict of conviction in a criminal action. In considering this appeal we are required to keep before us the jury's conclusion, and if it be supported by substantial evidence we are bound by it, and we are not to engage in surmises as to what the conclusions of others may have been had the issue been submitted to them.

The Criminal Syndicalism Act of this state provides as follows:

"Section 1. The term 'criminal syndicalism' as used in this act is hereby defined as any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change.

"Sec. 2. Any person who:

"1. By spoken or written words or personal conduct advocates, teaches or aids and abets criminal syndicalism or the duty, necessity or propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence or any unlawful method of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change; or

"2. Willfully and deliberately by spoken or written words justifies or attempts to justify criminal syndicalism or the commission or attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence or unlawful methods of terrorism with intent to approve, advocate or further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism; or

"3. Prints, publishes, edits, issues or circulates or publicly displays any book, paper, pamphlet, document, poster or written or printed matter in any other form, containing or carrying written or printed advocacy, teaching, or aid and abetment of, or advising, criminal syndicalism; or

"4. Organizes or assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of, any organization, society, group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism; or

"5. Willfully by personal act or conduct, practices or commits any act advised, advocated, taught or aided and abetted by the doctrine or precept of criminal syndicalism, with intent to accomplish a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change;

"Is guilty of a felony and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years."

The charging part of the first count of the indictment is substantially in the language of said section 2, subd. 4, of the act. The allegation is that the defendants, on or about April 18, 1923, in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, "did then and there, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously organize and assist in organizing and knowingly became and were members of an organization, society, group, and assemblage of persons known and designated as the Industrial Workers of the World, which Industrial Workers of the World * * * were then and there organized for the purpose of defending, advocating, teaching, and abetting criminal syndicalism, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism, as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control and effecting political changes, all of which is contrary to the form, force and effect of the statutes in such cases made and provided," etc.

[5] It is the well-settled rule of law, as restated in People v. Gusti, 113 Cal. 177, 45 P. 263, that:

"When a statute enunciates a series of acts, either of which separately or all together may constitute the offense, all of such acts may be charged in a single count, for the reason that notwithstanding each act may, by itself, constitute the offense, all of them together do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense."

See People v. Gossett, 93 Cal. 641, 29 P. 246; People v. Harrold, 84 Cal. 567, 24 P. 106; People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394; State v. Hennessy, 114 Wash. 351, 195 P. 211; State v. Laundry, 103 Or. 443, 204 P. 958, 206 P. 290. Therefore, if the evidence in the record sufficiently supports the sole allegation that the defendants were and remained members of the Industrial Workers of the World, as the evidence abundantly shows, and further, if the evidence justifies the jury's conclusion that the organization had for its aims and purposes and employed the means and methods for the accomplishment of said aims and purposes denounced by the statute, it would then become immaterial whether any other act or acts comprising the series of acts set out in the indictment had or had not been proved.

[6] Proof of any one of said acts would be sufficient to sustain the convictions. The proof offered to show that the defendants were and had been for a great while prior to the time named in the indictment members of the Industrial Workers of the World was overwhelming. This renders it unnecessary to determine whether knowledge of the unlawful purposes of the organization on the part of the defendants at the time each one became a member of said organization was a necessary ingredient of the offense, or whether the offense was complete upon his becoming a member without such knowledge. There is no ground for the claim that the defendants in this case did not have knowledge of the purposes, aims, and objects of the organization of which they were members. Each defendant was an officer under the seal of the organization, known as a delegate, and had been such officer for many months, and in some instances for a period of several years prior to the day named in the indictment. As such officer each was authorized to collect dues, initiate new members, solicit memberships, raise moneys for the defense fund and other funds by the sale of stamps, distribute literature of various kinds issued by the organization, and to expound by speech and other methods the purposes sought to be accomplished by the organization, and to carry forward its doctrines to universal conquest. Said delegates were in frequent communication with the head officers at Chicago, and with the secretaries of "branch unions" in various cities in this state and elsewhere, working for the accomplishment of a definite purpose. Close bonds of fellowship united all active members in a common cause. In view of the facts as disclosed by the evidence in this case, the jury would be justified by every rational rule of human experience in concluding that the defendants had knowledge of the purposes of the organization of which they had been active advocates and defenders for long periods of time. We do not understand that full knowledge of the aims and purposes of the organization and its fundamental principles was denied by any one of the defendants. It was admitted by the defendants at the trial that the organization and the members thereof advocated and endeavored to bring about a change in the industrial ownership and control of the production, consumption, distribution, and exchange of wealth, and also to effect a political change, but it was denied that either the organization or the defendants as members advocated any of the means of accomplishing the changes that are denounced by the Criminal Syndicalism Act. The purpose of the organization being admitted, the remaining question left for determination on this particular branch of the case is whether the evidence was sufficient to sustain the issue that the means and methods advocated to bring about the designed changes were unlawful within the meaning of said act. We will consider this subject at a later period of the discussion.

The material portions of the second count of the indictment under which all of the defendants were convicted, and to which objection is made, omitting the specific means and methods employed, are as follows:

"And for a further and separate cause of action against the said defendants * * * and being a different statement of the same offense as that charged in count I of this indictment, the said defendants are accused by the grand jury of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, by this indictment of a felony, to wit, criminal syndicalism committed at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, on or about the 18th day of April, 1923, * * * as follows, to wit: That the said defendants and each of them, * * * and the members of said Industrial Workers of the World, otherwise known as the I. W. W., and sometimes known as the Marine Transport Workers Industrial Union of the I. W. W., by joining and becoming members of said organization, agreed to enter and did enter into a conspiracy, scheme, plan, and agreement to bring about a change of industrial ownership and control, and effecting political changes in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and the United States of America, and, as a part of said conspiracy, scheme, plan, to use force and violence and unlawful methods of terrorism, sabotage, strikes, and boycotts to bring about such changes, and as a part of such plan, scheme, and agreement to teach, advocate, aid and abet, commit and attempt to commit criminal syndicalism, sabotage, violence, unlawful methods of terrorism, strikes, and boycotts, as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control and effecting political changes, by personal act and conduct of said organization, its members and the defendants herein did print, publish, edit, issue, distribute, and circulate and publicly display books, papers, pamphlets, documents, posters and other written and printed matter, to wit:" * * * (A list follows, enumerating books, booklets, pamphlets, documents, posters, and other written and printed matter which were issued, circulated, distributed and displayed by the organization and the defendants.)

[7] A number of excerpts taken from said books, papers, pamphlets, etc., which, it is claimed, taught, advocated, and defended criminal syndicalism, and which aided, advised, and abetted its commission, are set out at large. Both counts of the indictment are attacked as not being legally sufficient. The indictment follows the language of the act, and is sufficient. People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 203 P. 78; McDermott, In re, 180 Cal. 783, 183 P. 437; People v. Malley, 49 Cal. App. 597, 194 P. 48; State v. Laundry, 103 Or. 443, 204 P. 958, 966, 206 P. 290. The first count of the indictment is broader in terms than the language of subdivision 4, § 2, and alleges that the defendants did then and there, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously organize and assist in organizing and knowingly became and were members of an organization," etc. The italicized words, excepting the word "knowingly," which is taken out of the order in which it appears in the act and so placed as to qualify "became" as well as "were," are words supplied by the pleader, and the meaning of the reconstructed clause is equivalent to an allegation that the defendants "knowingly became and knowingly were" members of said organization. There can be no doubt but that the first count is sufficient. The second count charges the defendants with the offense of conspiracy. Doubtless the authority upon which the prosecution relied to support that count is section 954 of the Penal Code, which provides that:

"The indictment or information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts, and if two or more indictments or informations are filed in such cases the court may order them to be consolidated. * * *"

It is the claim of the learned counsel for appellants that the evidence failed to establish the crime of conspiracy. Section 182, Penal Code, provides that if two or more persons conspire to commit any crime they are guilty of a criminal conspiracy. Section 184, Penal Code, provides that:

"No agreement amounts to a conspiracy, unless some act, besides such agreement, be done within this state to effect the object thereof, by one or more of the parties to such agreement and the trial of cases of conspiracy may be had in any county in which any such act be done."

Much of the evidence introduced in the instant case is in character and substance practically the same as the evidence considered in People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 203 P. 78; People v. Taylor, 187 Cal. 378, 203 P. 85; People v. Wright et al. (Cal. App.) 226 P. 952; People v. La Rue, 62 Cal. App. 276, 216 P. 627; People v. Wagner et al. (Cal. App.) 225 P. 464; People v. Roe, 58 Cal. App. 690, 209 P. 381; People v. Malley, 49 Cal. App. 597, 194 P. 48. Three former members of the organization testified as to the means and methods employed by the organization to bring about a change in the industrial ownership and control, and effecting political changes, to wit, Coutts, Dymond, and Townsend. They were also witnesses in several of the cases above cited, if not in all of them. While it is true that no criminal conspiracy based upon a violation of the act was directly charged in a separate count, or at all, in any of said cases, so far as said decisions disclose, it is nevertheless said in the Steelik Case that the defendant was, under the provisions of section 2, subd. 4, guilty of a conspiracy to commit criminal syndicalism. It is there said:

"* * * There was thus evidence before the jury that the defendant had violated section 2, subd. 4, of the statute, that is, he knowingly belonged to a conspiracy to commit crimes, in furtherance of industrial and political control. * * *"

[8] To charge a person with being a member of an organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism is, in effect, to charge them with conspiring to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism. People v. Flanagan (Cal. App.) 223 P. 1014; People v. La Rue, supra; People v. Steelik, supra. If, therefore, there is any substantial evidence to show that the defendants acting in concert committed the acts denounced by the statute, the conspiracy charge would be established by a sufficiency of evidence.

It is claimed by appellants that practically all of the written and printed matter, literature, and propaganda printed, published, and circulated by the organization and its members prior to the adoption of the syndicalism act was destroyed upon the passage of said act, and nothing resembling it in character has since been printed or circulated. It is further claimed that the means and methods formerly advocated or practiced by the organization and its members for the accomplishment of its purposes, if such were in fact criminal, have been discontinued since said act was adopted. In other words, it is insisted by the defendants that there has been a complete change in the means and methods advocated and practiced by said organization in its effort and purpose to bring about said changes, and, if unlawful acts or methods were at any time advocated or resorted to prior to the year 1919, no act of a criminal character has since been countenanced, encouraged, advocated, or practiced by the organization or by any of the defendants as members of said organization or otherwise. This was an issue of fact for the jury's consideration.

[9] The transcript of testimony together with the clerk's transcript consists of more than 3,000 typewritten pages. Notwithstanding the massiveness of the record, we have examined it with care. A résumé of the many exhibits alone would fill a large portion of our printed reports. The defendants had upon their person or under their control at the time they were arrested in addition to their credentials, etc., the preamble and the constitution of the organization, and other printed matter in various forms advocating criminal syndicalism and promoting its doctrines, which they were using as propaganda at San Pedro in keeping alive a prolonged and tumultuous strike that was there being conducted by the Marine Transport Workers' Union, a branch of the Industrial Workers of the World, in 1922-1923. The indictment sets out in full the preamble of the organization and a number of excerpts taken from pamphlets, leaflets, papers, and other publications which were being distributed by the defendants.

The preamble contains the following declaration of the organization's purposes:

"The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace as long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few who make up the employing class have all the good things of life.

"Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production and abolish the wage system.

"We find that the centering of the management of the industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping to defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class has interests in common with their employers.

"These conditions can be changed and the interests of the working class upheld by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

"Instead of the conservative motto, 'a fair day's wage for a fair day's work,' we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, 'Abolition of the wage system.'

"It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown.

"By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old."

In making reference to a few of said articles, excerpts, publications, etc., whether the same were incorporated in the indictment or received as evidence in the case, we will refer only to so much of the publications, etc., or such parts of the same as will tend to fairly support the judgments. This is the rule on appeal. In so doing, we do not hold that all of the literature edited, issued, or circulated by the order comes within the ban of the act. Some of it is within the legitimate exercise of the right of liberty of speech and liberty of the press.

The indictment sets out a pamphlet called "The Revolutionary I. W. W.," from which we take the following passages:

"We are not satisfied with a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. Such a thing is impossible. Labor produces all wealth. Labor is therefore entitled to all wealth. We are going to do away with capitalism by taking possession of the land and the machinery of production. We don't intend to buy them either. The capitalist class took them because it had the power to control the muscle and brain of the working class in industry. Organized, we, the working class, will have the power. With that power we will take back what has been stolen from us. We will demand more and more wages from our employers. We will demand and enforce shorter and shorter hours. As we gain these demands we are diminishing the profits of the boss. We are taking away his power. We are gaining that power for ourselves. * * * We fold our arms. The mills close. Industry is at a standstill. We then make our proposition to our former masters. It is this: We, the workers, have labored long enough to support idlers. From now on, he who does not toil, neither shall he eat. We tear down to build up. The Industrial Workers of the World are laying the foundation of a new government.

"The Industrial Workers of the World is an international movement. We are 'patriotic' for our class, the working class. We realize that as workers we have no country. [Italics ours.] The flags and symbols which once meant great things to us have been seized by our employers. To-day they mean naught to us but oppression and tyranny. * * * The practice of some craft unions is to bar men because of nationality or race. Not so with the I. W. W. * * * In our organization the Caucasian, the Malay, the Mongolian, and the Negro are all on the same footing. All are workers and as such their interests are the same. An injury to them is an injury to us."

A pamphlet issued by the organization, entitled "The I. W. W., Its History, Structure and Methods," by Vincent St. John, revised in 1919, was taken from one of the defendants. It contained the following treatise:

"As a revolutionary organization the Industrial Workers of the World aims to use tactics that will get the results sought with the least expenditure of time and energy. The tactics used are determined by the power of the organization to make good in their use. No terms made with an employer are final. All peace so long as the wage system lasts is only a truce. At any favorable opportunity the struggle for more control is renewed.

"As the organization gains control in the industries, and the knowledge among the workers of their power, when properly applied within the industries, becomes more general, the long drawn out strike will be a relic of the past. * * *

"No part of the organization is allowed to enter into time contracts with the employer. Where strikes are used, it aims to paralyze all branches of the industry involved, when the employer can least afford a cessation of work during the busy season and when there are rush orders to be filled. * * *

"During strikes the works are closely picketed and every effort made to persuade workers from taking the place of the strikers. All supplies are shut off from strike-bound shops. All shipments are refused wherever possible. Strike breakers are also isolated. Illegal interference by the government is resented by open violation of the government's orders, going to jail en masse, causing expense to the taxpayers—which is but another name of the employing class. In short, the I. W. W. advocates the use of militant tactics to the full extent of its power to make good." (Italics ours.)

The foregoing excerpts contained in the indictment are from publications issued and circulated since 1919.

[10] Great quantities of printed matter consisting of sticketerettes, posters, pamphlets, booklets, books, songs, and pronouncements advocating the teachings of the organization, and which had formerly been circulated by it, were received in evidence. These publications differ in degree as to the directness of the means and methods advisable to be employed in a preconceived effort to supplant the existing form of government by a system of industrial communism. The system of sabotage, which was advocated and practiced in 1917, 1918, and in the early part of 1919, and the destruction of property in the farming, fruit-growing, and industrial areas of the state by fires produced by means of phosphorus compounds of slow combustion called "kitties," which were stealthily placed in inflammable materials and so timed as to give the user an opportunity to be several miles distant from the conflagration at the time the fires started; the nightly expeditions in which long sections of copper wires were cut from transmission poles and sold; threats of driving copper nails into fruit trees, unless Ford and Suhr, who were serving terms of imprisonment arising out of the Wheatland riots, were released; demands for the release of all "war prisoners"; warnings against the use of California canned fruits and vegetables by suggestions that much of the pack had been poisoned in its preparation and that it was dangerous to use it; plans and attempts to destroy railroad bridges and to blockade tunnels as a means of stopping transportation; the disabling of engines and machinery of all kinds by the use of emery dust—were again related by witnesses produced by the prosecution. Such evidence, although the alleged acts are placed prior to the adoption of the act, was received as tending to establish the character of the organization and was admissible under the authorities already cited.

As against the claim of appellants that the organization had abandoned the practices that had formerly obtained, the respondent offered evidence bearing upon the conduct of the defendants during the Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union I. W. W. strike at San Pedro. Some of the literature that defendants were circulating is the same as that which has been put into circulation by the organization and its members for several years past. There is evidence in the record to the effect that words and phrases were used in a cryptic sense to disguise the real meaning which was intended thereby to be conveyed. "Striking on the job," which means, primarily, to do as little work in a day as possible and to do it as inefficiently as possible, is also another way of encouraging the practice of sabotage, which is forbidden by the statute. That phrase, according to some of the witnesses, was not so well understood as the word sabotage. The picture of a black cat and a wooden shoe appears upon much of the literature and, according to testimony in the case, symbolizes sabotage.

As bearing upon the question whether or not a change had in fact been made by the organization in the means and methods formerly employed, there was placed before the jury a photographic copy of a letter written by the acting general secretary-treasurer under date of April 8, 1919, in reply to a resolution that was passed by the San Francisco branch of the general recruiting union. The justification for the adoption of the resolution was placed upon the ground of necessity "in view of the fact that laws covering 'criminal syndicalism,' aimed ostensibly at the Industrial Workers of the World, were being enacted in various states within the United States of America." The resolution denied that the organization at any time had advocated or practiced sabotage or violence, and expressly repudiated such imputation as being unjustly made, and apparently in good faith adopted the following paragraph:

"Be it also resolved, that if any literature containing any word, sentence or paragraph condoning or advocating violence, destruction of, or injury to life or property printed by the general organization or elsewhere, be in our possession for sale or distribution at any time in the future, we hereby order all such objectionable matter censored and taken out. * * *

The above paragraph is referred to in the reply as section 5. The disapproval of the general secretary-treasurer to this part of the resolution is in the following words:

"* * * In regard to the resolutions I am instructed by the general executive board to state that section 5 of the resolution should be struck out entirely, as no part of the organization can order any literature printed by the I. W. W. censored or stricken out or destroyed. That is a question for the whole organization to determine. No doubt there will be resolutions on this subject at the coming convention, but in the meantime if the intent of this resolution is to be placed on the wall of the halls in California as a camouflage by striking out the word sabotage wherever it occurs and cutting out paragraph 5 it would answer its purpose without placing a part of the organization in a position to do what the whole organization alone has a right to do. I am returning this resolution with those words marked out and 5 clause marked out which should be cut out. Trust the matter will be clear and you will understand the proposition or the need for the same."

[11] The observations made by the general secretary-treasurer were properly admitted as affecting the question of whether or not a change had been made in the means and methods of prosecuting the plans of the organization. The question of good faith was involved. The evidence was admissible and relevant to that issue.

The Industrial Worker, an official organ of the Industrial Workers of the World, recent copies of which were found in the possession of some of the defendants, in its issue of December 30, 1922, contained an article from which we quote in part:

"In Herrin, Illinois, the same game goes on. The coal miners of that little town were shot down by the mine guards imported from Chicago, quite in the good old Ludlow way. This business of imported thugs, mercenaries of the local capitalists killing strikers at their own sweet will received a set back. You can never tell just how far these meek American laborers can be pushed back. Sometimes they yield so often, submit as in Pennsylvania and a hundred other places to having their rights, their lives, their liberties taken away with force and violence, you would say labor is for peace at any place. And then again, you think they have raised the price; there is a Centralia, or a Herrin. The Herrin trial drags on. The prosecution and defense both recognize there is a class war. * * * Labor, conservative and radical, stands back of the Herrin defendants. The time has gone by when the American working class is afraid of bloodshed. In the three years since Centralia, the opinion of the workers of America has turned from a hasty belief in the capitalist side of a labor war in the Herrin sense, to a prejudice in favor of the defendants. Capitalism itself is to blame for this tendency toward violence. * * * There is flying loose enough resentment, enough bitterness, enough wasted rebellion, sporadic, blind, passionate, emotional, to blast capitalism into a dust cloud. Let us hope that in the immediate next few years, the delegates of the I. W. W. will succeed in gathering all these loose rebels into one strong army of revolutionary industrial unionism, turning this blind beating of fists at Herrin and West Virginia into a powerful shoulder to shoulder heave of the submerged masses that will wreck the edifice of capitalism. General strike.

"We have enough power, the question is to harness it. We have enough hate, the problem is to direct it. We have enough courage, the next thing is to think a little. There are enough revolutionists, what we need is organization. * * *

"San Pedro still hankers after a free speech fight. Well, give it to her. * * * There are a lot of pickets in Los Angeles, and more should be on the way. The G. E. B. calls for every foot-loose Wob to sail down to Pedro and wade in. The struggle was won there once, and papers were being sold openly on the streets. Then the Southern California Edison Company found that the picket line was choking off their supply of scabs, and orders have gone out to the San Pedro police to make trouble with the I. W. W. Give them lots of trouble. Flood the town with I. W. W.'s."

Again, as late as March, 1923, the same newspaper printed the following editorial, entitled, "I. W. W. and the Law":

"The laws are made by the capitalists, not by the workers. The capitalists try to make everybody think that the people make the laws. This is a lie. The people would not make laws like those that hold workmen in jail for stating their honest opinions and planning for social improvements. The lawmakers are those robbers that would lose the opportunity to exploit labor if they did not have special laws to protect themselves. These capitalists need the jails, courts, police, the army and navy to keep the workers from taking for themselves what the workers have produced.

"They need to have the people respect the laws and love their country, because even the police could not hold the workers in slavery if there was not this reverence and respect for the institutions of our master's government.

"So the capitalist class, that is the employers (in the Pacific Northwest, it means more than anything else the Lumber Trust), try to make laws that keep people in slavery and at the same time fool the people into believing that the people, the workers, make the laws. If it were not so, no one would respect the laws that protect private property, created by the public and no one would honor and protect these great robbers, the capitalists.

"The capitalists pretend a mighty reverence for the Constitution of the United States. Capitalists made it a long time ago, and as time goes on, they have had to break it in order to continue the robbery, for they dared not change it very much. To change it would make the people lose respect for it.

"The people, the workers, the producers, especially like the section of the constitution which says, 'The right of free speech shall not be abridged.' It also guarantees the rights of free assemblage and the rights of a free press.

"In order to keep such organizations and individuals as the Industrial Workers of the World from exposing the capitalist's game, from convincing the workers that they are being robbed, it is necessary for the capitalists to break the constitution, to deny the right of free speech, free press and right of assemblage. It is necessary to pass other unconstitutional laws, called criminal syndicalism laws and have the capitalistic courts declare them constitutional, and throw men into prison for long periods of time, because they dared to act according to the constitution which this capitalist class made itself, but which now, in some degree, is against the interests of the great robbers.

"In order to get convictions, it is necessary for these robbers to lie about the I. W. W. and to declare that they advocated the destruction of property, the killing of soldiers and all sorts of unsocial crimes. This paper represents the I. W. W. Let us tell you what the I. W. W. stands for.

"In the first place, even if the I. W. W. did destroy property, it would not be an immoral act, for the property belongs to the workers, they made it, and it is only stolen from them; they can do what they please with it.

"But it is just because this property does belong to the workers, because the workers expect to use the machinery and tools of production to continue their work after the capitalist class shall be forced to put on overalls too, it is just for this reason that the I. W. W. does not and never did advocate the destruction of property. At one time members of the organization did talk of 'sabotage.' By this they meant, 'striking on the job,' doing a short day's work for a short day's pay. Courts have hired special liars and professional witnesses to say that this word means 'destroying property,' so the I. W. W. has been forced to avoid using it. Nowadays we say, 'striking on the job' and nobody can understand that.

"Neither does the I. W. W. advocate an armed insurrection. Here again there would be no moral reason why we should not. If a thief takes your pay check, you have a right to shoot at him to get it back. If the thief also bribes the judge and jury and the legislature, to declare his act legal, he is not the less a thief, because he is a perjurer and a corrupter of public officials likewise.

"But it is not good tactics for a labor union to engage in armed insurrection, and it is not necessary. When we get the workers so well organized that they will say, 'The industries are ours', and refuse to work for bosses at all, there will be no need for revolution. If the CAPITALIST CLASS then attacks US with deadly weapons, that will be another matter.

"The I. W. W. method of taking back the products of the workers for the workers, is to organize industrially and win all we can while organizing. When we are strong enough, we will declare a great general strike and put the boss out of his job. Then the workers will run the industries themselves, hiring managers, as the capitalist does, if that is necessary. The workers will take all the profit for themselves.

"It just happens that we can do all this without breaking any laws. All we need is the right of free speech, guaranteed by the constitution. Therefore we do not break any laws.

"But if organized bandits like the capitalist class succeed in getting unconstitutional ordinances passed, depriving us of our right to free speech, free press and freedom of assemblage and organizing and striking, we must continue to do those things just the same."

The Industrial Solidarity published at Chicago, Illinois, and the official organ of the Industrial Workers of the World, on February 3, 1923, printed an open letter to all workers, entitled "On to San Pedro. A Call to Action," with the request that all labor papers copy, from which we take the following excerpt:

"Present one solid front to the enemy.

"If you are not craven and foot-loose, even though you might have to quit a job, this call is to you, whether you are an I. W. W., a S. L. P., a member of the Socialist party, a communist or an intelligent Craft Unionist.

"On to San Pedro, if you possibly can.

"On with your money, if you cannot come.

"We do not want your sympathy, if that is all.

"We need you.

"Come on, you lumber-workers. Let the camp shut down.

"Why should you care about the profits of the boss or the job he is loaning you, when the class struggle needs you.

"Leave your scrapers, your teams, your excavators you 310 men; 'on to San Pedro' is the slogan for you.

"Come on, you Socialists, and Communistic fellow-workers.

"Come on, you brave union men, whatever be the name."

The foregoing is an urgent call for large numbers of the Industrial Workers of the World to gather at a place of labor congestion and fermentation to affect by their presence or otherwise the result of a labor struggle. Whether the call for men to assemble at a place of trouble was for a lawful or unlawful purpose considered with reference to the hostility of the organization towards the economic and political system of this government was a question properly submitted to the jury. The call was heeded and men assembled in large numbers at San Pedro. Many arrests followed.

A book issued by the authority of the organization and containing I. W. W. songs, calculated to arouse its members to vigorous activity, forms a part of its general publicity plan. This book is entitled "Songs to Fan the Flames of Discontent," and has the express approval of the organization. The purpose of the songs seems to be well expressed by the title. The songs contained therein scoff at any pretense of loyalty on the part of citizens to their country and respect generally for the law. No institution escapes bitter denunciation. Belligerency and resistance to law are boldly encouraged. The red flag is exalted and the flag of the nation is depreciated. The Christian religion is blasphemed and its devotees are subjected to invective, satire, and ridicule. They are classed as cravens lacking the courage essential to make worthy members of the I. W. W. The songs carry with them a spirit of hatred for all the institutions that are a part of our national life. They are not written with a view of correcting or reforming laws, but with a desire to destroy the fabric of our national system.

[12] The purposes sought to be accomplished were proper matters for the consideration of the jury in determining the quality of the acts, which, it is claimed, bore a criminal color. The songbooks above referred to were found on one or two of the defendants. They contain the songs approved and published by the organization.

It was also competent for the jury to consider the fact that the organization anticipated collisions with the law as evidenced by the creation of a defense fund for which provision is liberally made. The constitution itself makes provision that the general secretary-treasurer (the executive head of the organization) does not forfeit his office by reason of "being in jail." Of course, the justification of the defense for this provision would be placed upon the ground that its members had been unjustly prosecuted and convicted. These, however, were all questions for the jury's consideration.

If the intent of bringing a multitude of men to San Pedro was to create a state of terrorism by designedly casting idle men in large numbers upon the public during a tumultuous or riotous situation, and with the agreement and understanding that general or local laws should be violated by them as a means of filling the jails to overflowing and creating a condition beyond the power of the law officers to cope with, and thereby obstructing the administrative arm of the law, as coercive methods (a means advocated in the literature of the organization) such acts would be in violation of the means and methods prohibited by the act. So, too, if a system of threats, intimidation, and molestation was agreed upon as a means of accomplishing the purpose of the organization, as defined in Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 P. 324, then both the means and purpose of the organization would be unlawful, and the rule laid down in Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, supra, Parkinson v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 P. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165, and other decisions of this state which justify the right of employees or laborers to strike and conduct a boycott (provided the means employed are not illegal) would not be applicable to their situation.

The strikes initiated by the Industrial Workers of the World differ on basic principles from the strikes resorted to by the ordinary craft union. No concession in wage disputes is sufficient to satisfy the former. The abolition of the wage system, as declared by the preamble, is a definite plan of the organization, and the strike is resorted to at opportune times as one of the means of bringing about the industrial, economic, and political changes which they advocate. One strike is to follow another until the employer is forced to retire. It is a part of a revolutionary plan looking to the accomplishment of the ultimate object.

[13] While it is not absolutely essential to a decision of the instant case that we should determine whether the statute makes it a necessary prerequisite for the prosecution upon the trial to prove, in addition to showing the act of joining the organization—becoming a member—that the defendants had actual knowledge of its character at the time they became members, yet in view of the fact that the point is made and discussed at considerable length, and, there being no decision of this court bearing directly on the question, it is proper to give it consideration. The constitutionality of the statute is a question foreclosed by the decisions of this state and many other states. The Legislature has absolute power to provide that knowledge of the criminal character of the act or acts prohibited shall be a necessary element of the offense defined, or it may dispense with such knowledge altogether.

Unquestionably the Legislature had the power to provide that any person who joins an organization organized for unlawful purposes, whether such person is or is not aware of the unlawful purpose, is guilty of an offense.

Section 7, subd. 1, of the Penal Code of this state, provides:

"The word 'willfully,' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act, or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate the law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage."

Subdivision 5, of the same section, defines knowingly, as follows:

"The word 'knowingly' imports only a knowledge that the facts exist which bring the act or omission within the provisions of this code. It does not require any knowledge of the unlawfulness of such act or omission. * * *"

[14] To make a person guilty of an offense it is not necessary in every instance that such person should have a specific intent to violate law; it is sufficient that he intentionally commits the forbidden act.

The commission of various acts are made punishable under our criminal procedure, even though the doer be ignorant of the fact that the doing of the act constitutes an offense. A mistake of fact, or a want of intent, is not in every case a sufficient defense for the violation of a criminal statute. Statutes enacted for the protection of public morals, public health, and the public peace and safety are apt illustrations of the rule just announced. People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 46 P. 915; People v. Griffin, 117 Cal. 583, 49 P. 711, 59 Am. St. Rep. 216; People v. Sheffield, 9 Cal. App. 130, 98 P. 67; State v. Hennessy, 114 Wash. 351, 195 P. 211, and cases cited. The latter case quotes the following extract from 8 R. C. L. p. 62, as a correct statement of law:

"The maxim, actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea, does not always apply to crimes created by statute, and therefore, if a criminal intent is not an essential element of a statutory crime, it is not necessary to prove any intent in order to justify a conviction. Whether a criminal intent or guilty knowledge is a necessary element of a statutory offense is a matter of construction to be determined from the language of the statute, in view of its manifest purpose and design. There are many instances in recent times where the Legislature in the exercise of the police power has prohibited, under penalty, the performance of a specific act. The doing of the inhibited act constitutes the crime, and the moral turpitude or purity of the motive by which it was prompted and knowledge or ignorance of its criminal character are immaterial circumstances on the question of guilt. The only fact to be determined in these cases is whether the defendant did the act. In the interest of the public the burden is placed upon the actor of ascertaining at his peril whether his deed is within the prohibition of any criminal statute."

See, also, 7 Cal. Jur. 852; In re Ahart, 172 Cal. 762, 159 P. 160; People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 P. 45; 16 C. J. 76.

There is much force in the observation made by Mr. Presiding Justice Finch in the case of People v. Flanagan, supra, to the effect that the average man does not ordinarily become affiliated with political or industrial organizations which may affect national welfare without informing himself as to the cardinal principles of such organization. Political and economic experiences justify the observation. The general principles and primary purposes of all organization, whether political, industrial, benevolent, fraternal, or social, are quite generally known to the public. We agree with what was said in the Flanagan case that:

"The intent of the defendants must be determined from their voluntary connection with the conspiracy, viewed in the light of the circumstances which they knew or ought to have known. It must be held that the evidence is sufficient to justify the inference that the defendants had knowledge of the purposes of the organization."

Section 4, the emergency provision of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, is of itself a persuasive argument in favor of a literal interpretation. It provides:

"Inasmuch as this act concerns and is necessary to the immediate preservation of the public peace and safety, for the reason that at the present time large numbers of persons are going from place to place in this state advocating, teaching and practicing criminal syndicalism, this act shall take effect upon approval by the Governor."

The section sounds a note of apprehension from which it may be argued that the Legislature was of the opinion that immediate and somewhat drastic steps were necessary to check a menace that was threatening public peace and safety.

[15] A consideration of the entire subject leads us to the conclusion that proof of the act of joining an organization shown to be such as the statute denounces is a sufficient showing of knowledge of the purposes of the organization. An accused may meet this showing by proof that he was ignorant of its criminal purposes, or that he was induced by false or fraudulent representations to become a member of said organization, and was ignorant of its purposes. Of course, if he remained a member and became active in teaching and advocating its doctrines, as was done in the instant case, such conduct would itself be evidence of knowledge of its evil purposes.

[16] Objection is made to the statute on the ground that it is based on a false and arbitrary classification. This objection is fully answered in the case of State v. Hennessy, supra, in considering the syndicalism law of the state of Washington, in which the same objection was made. It was there pertinently said:

"The Legislature has power to pass all needful police regulations, and, so long as such regulations bear with equal weight upon all in like situation or of the same class, they are upheld by the courts. State v. Fraternal Knights & Ladies, 35 Wash. 338, 77 Pac. 500; State v. Nichols, 28 Wash. 628, 69 Pac. 372; State v. Nicolls, 61 Wash. 142, 112 Pac. 269, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1088. The act is general in its terms and provides that 'whoever' shall do the things there prohibited shall be guilty of a felony. Under this language any one, no matter what his business association or professional calling might be, who did the things prohibited by the act, would be subject to its provisions."

See, also, People v. Wagner et al. (Cal. App.) 225 P. 464; State v. Dingham, 37 Idaho, 253, 219 P. 760.

[17] F. W. Kelly, a former special agent of the department of justice, was a witness for the prosecution, and was permitted to testify against the objection of the defendants as to the dynamiting of the Governor's mansion, which occurred on December 19, 1917. In this connection he testified that he visited the Governor's mansion a few days thereafter and it bore the appearance of having been injured by an explosion. He arrested more than a hundred members of the I. W. W. organization. He testified that a box of dynamite was discovered in the possession of three members of the organization. On cross-examination it developed that his testimony as to dynamite having been found in the possession of said members was hearsay on his part. A motion to strike out all reference made by this witness as to dynamite having been found in the possession of the members above referred to was made and granted. A sufficient admonition was given by the court to the jury to wholly disregard that portion of his testimony. A motion, somewhat informal, was made to strike out all of the witness's testimony which in anywise referred to the Governor's mansion. This motion was denied. The motion was quite sweeping, but waiving all technical objections that might be made as to the form of the motion, and conceding that error was committed in refusing to grant it, we cannot say that the verdict of the jury would have been different had the motion been granted. The record is somewhat replete with alleged acts of violence, including the use of dynamite. The evidence objected to was merely cumulative, and could not have produced prejudicial error in the light of the other evidence which was properly admitted.

[18] In our consideration of the case we have treated the defendants as a group without making an exception as to any one of them. This was done for the sake of convenience. The defendant, J. C. Robinson, a member of the organization, was arrested several days after the indictment was found, and no evidence was produced to show that he was within the state on the day the offense is alleged to have been committed, or that he had any connection with the conspiracy in this state prior to the day of his arrest. The judgment and order as to him must be and is reversed. As to the other defendants, the judgments and orders appealed from are affirmed.

LAWLOR, J. I concur. But assuming without concluding that by the word "knowingly," as it appears in subdivision 4, § 2, of the act, "any person who * * * knowingly becomes a member of" the organization is meant guilty knowledge of its purposes at the time membership is acquired, and that it is a necessary ingredient in that offense, I concur in the affirmation of the judgment and the order so far as that part of the decision is concerned solely upon the ground that it cannot be maintained that the evidence before the jury including the proof of membership was not sufficient as matter of law to support the implied finding of such guilty knowledge.

STATE v. TAGAMI et al. (L. A. 7881.)

1. Treaties ⇐7—Treaties between friendly powers to be given liberal interpretation.

Treaties between friendly powers are to be given liberal interpretation so that, where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it, the other and favorable interpretation is to be preferred.

2. Treaties ⇐8—Treaty of commerce and navigation with Japan to be construed liberally.

Treaty with Japan Feb. 21, 1911 (37 Stat. U. S. 1504), being treaty of commerce and navigation for the purpose of strengthening relations of amity and good understanding, is such a treaty as requires liberality of construction.

3. Treaties ⇐8—"Trade" and "commerce" within scope of treaty defined.

The words "trade" and "commerce," when used in juxtaposition as in Treaty with Japan Feb. 21, 1911 (37 Stat. U. S. 1504), impart to each other enlarged signification, so as to include practically every business occupation carried on for subsistence or profit, and into which the elements of bargain and sale, barter, exchange, or traffic, enter; "commerce" and "commercial" usually being given the larger signification as embracing those dealings in general which arise and are conducted in the course of business and social intercourse between individuals and peoples.

4. Treaties ⇐8—Lease to conduct sanitarium held for purposes of trade and commerce within treaty.

Lease of seashore land to conduct sanitarium, by Japanese alien, held for purposes of trade and commerce within Treaty with Japan Feb. 21, 1911 (37 Stat. U. S. 1504), Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the State of California against Tojuero Tagami and another. Judgment for defendants, and the State appeals. Affirmed.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is prosecuted by the state of California, as plaintiff, from a judgment in favor of the defendants after an order sustaining their demurrer to the complaint; the plaintiff declining to amend. The action is one instituted by the state at the instance of the Attorney General, seeking to have an escheat declared and enforced as to a certain leasehold interest in certain lands and premises described in its said complaint. The basic facts upon which the action is predicated, as averred in the complaint, are these: On and prior to the 1st day of September, 1918, the defendant Ramon D. Sepulveda was the owner in fee and in possession of a parcel of land at a place along the coast of southern California known as "Fish Camp," lying adjacent to the line of ordinary high tide, being 200 feet long by 98 feet wide, and consisting in area of something less than half an acre of land. On said last-mentioned date Sepulveda executed a lease in writing of said tract of land to his codefendant, Tagami, for the term of three years, with certain options for additional periods not exceeding nine years, and for the express purpose of having said land occupied and improved by said lessee for use as a health resort and sanitarium. The complaint proceeds to allege that under and in pursuance of said lease Tagami entered into possession of said lands and premises, and has since used and is now using and occupying the same for the purpose of a health resort and sanitarium and for no other use or purpose; that said Tagami was and is an alien, a native and subject of the Empire of Japan, and, as such, ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States; that by virtue of the foregoing facts the leasehold interest of Tagami is being held by him in violation of the laws of California and particularly of the statute of 1913 relating to the disability of certain aliens, and to escheats, and of the acts amendatory thereof; and that in consequence thereof said leasehold interest has escheated to the state of California. Wherefore the plaintiff prays for a decree establishing such escheat of said leasehold interest in said land, determining the value thereof and decreeing that the same be sold in conformity with the provisions of section 1271 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and for general relief. The trial court sustained the demurrer of the defendants to the complaint upon the ground that the same did not state a cause of action, and thereafter entered its judgment in the defendants' favor, from which judgment this appeal has been taken.

It is the appellant's contention that an escheat of said leasehold interest exists by virtue of the facts averred in its complaint as above set forth. It is obvious that such escheat, if the same has occurred, has not arisen or been created through any violation of those provisions of the so-called "alien land laws" of California, which forbid the acquiring, leasing, or use of lands in the state of California for agricultural purposes, and which declare escheats and other penalties for the acquisition, possession, or use by ineligible aliens of such lands. The complaint herein expressly avers that the lands held by Tagami under and by virtue of said lease are being held, possessed, and used by him solely for the uses and purposes of a health resort and sanitarium, and it follows that if an escheat has thereby been created it must have come into being by virtue of other inhibitions in the statutes of California than those affecting agricultural lands. The appellant contends that such escheat has come into being by virtue of the provisions of the statute of 1913, which is entitled:

"An act relating to the rights of aliens," etc., "with respect to property in this state, providing for escheats in certain cases, prescribing the procedure therein, and repealing all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict herewith." Stats. 1913, p. 206.

Sections 1 and 2 of said act provide as follows:

"Section 1. All aliens eligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States may acquire, possess, enjoy, transmit and inherit real property, or any interest therein, in this state, in the same manner and to the same extent as citizens of the United States, except as otherwise provided by the laws of this state.

"Sec. 2. All aliens other than those mentioned in section one of this act may acquire, possess, enjoy and transfer real property, or any interest therein, in this state, in the manner and to the extent and for the purposes prescribed by any treaty now existing between the government of the United States and the nation or country of which such alien is a citizen or subject, and not otherwise, and may in addition thereto lease lands in this state for agricultural purposes for a term not exceeding three years."

Section 6 of the act provides:

"Sec. 6. Any leasehold or other interest in real property less than the fee, hereafter acquired in violation of the provisions of this act by any alien mentioned in section two of this act, or by any company, association or corporation mentioned in section three of this act, shall escheat to the state of California. The Attorney-General shall institute proceedings to have such escheat adjudged and enforced as provided in section five of this act. In such proceedings the court shall determine and adjudge the value of such leasehold, or other interest in such real property, and enter judgment for the state for the amount thereof together with costs. Thereupon the court shall order a sale of the real property covered by such leasehold, or other interest, in the manner provided by section 1271 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Out of the proceeds arising from such sale, the amount of the judgment rendered for the state shall be paid into the state treasury and the balance shall be deposited with and distributed by the court in accordance with the interest of the parties therein."

It will be seen from a reading of the foregoing provisions of said statute that by the terms of section 2 aliens ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States may nevertheless acquire, possess, enjoy, and transfer real property or any interest therein in this state in the manner and to the extent and for the purposes prescribed in whatever treaty exists between the government of the United States and the nation or country of which such alien is a citizen or subject, with the added proviso as it stood in said statute at the date of its adoption that such ineligible alien might in addition thereto lease lands for agricultural purposes for a term not exceeding three years. By its later legislation, and particularly by the initiative measure adopted by the people of California at the general election held in November, 1920 (Stats. 1921, p. lxxxiii), and amended by the act of the Legislature in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 1020), the permission above granted to ineligible aliens to hold leases of agricultural lands for a period not exceeding three years was withdrawn, but otherwise the provisions of sections 2 and 6 of the statute of 1913 remain unchanged so far as the issues involved in the instant case are concerned. It follows that, if any escheat of the leasehold interest acquired and held by the defendant Tagami in the lands in question has arisen, it could only have occurred by virtue of a violation on his part of the provisions, permissions, and limitations of whatever treaty was in existence at the time of his entering into said lease or at any time thereafter and during his occupation of said premises thereunder and for the uses and purposes specified therein. This much the appellant practically concedes by basing its argument of this appeal upon the proposition that the particular leasehold involved in this proceeding was not such a lease of land as was or is embraced within the provisions and permissions of the treaty between the government of the United States and the Empire of Japan entered into in the year 1911 (37 Stat. p. 1504), and which has ever since been and still is in full force and effect. It is the contention of the appellant that under the provisions of article I of said treaty the citizens and subjects of each of the high contracting parties thereto are granted liberty and permission to enter the territory of the other for certain limited purposes as set forth therein; that among these is the grant of liberty and permission to lease lands for "residential and commercial purposes" only; and that the leasehold under consideration in the instant proceeding is not one which may be brought within either of the foregoing purposes for which leases by aliens in the respective countries of either of the contracting powers may be entered into. The precise provisions of the first paragraph of said article I of the treaty read as follows:

"The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses and shops, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established."

[1] In determining the interpretation to be given to this provision of the treaty, the language and scope of the entire document is, of course, to be considered, and at the outset of such consideration those certain principles which have been with a fair degree of uniformity applied, at least by our own government, to the interpretation of treaties between ourselves and other friendly powers are of first importance. Among these is the doctrine that treaties entered into between friendly powers are, as a general rule, to be given a liberal interpretation. This principle was given apt expression by Mr. Justice Field in the case of De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 10 S. Ct. 295, 33 L. Ed. 642, wherein that learned Justice says:

"It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed, so as to carry out the apparent intention of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them. As they are contracts between independent nations, in their construction, words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning, as understood in the public law of nations, and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended. And it has been held by this court that, where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it, and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred."

[2] Looking to the treaty here under consideration, taken as a whole, it will be observed that its opening paragraphs expressly declare that it is to be a treaty between friendly powers, entered into with the mutual desire and purpose of strengthening "the relations of amity and good understanding which happily exists between the two nations," and having for its object "the fixation in a manner clear and positive of the rules which are hereafter to govern the commercial intercourse between their respective countries." The treaty is termed: "A treaty of commerce and navigation" for the foregoing purposes. Its first article provides that:

"The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall receive, in the territories of the other, the most constant protection and security for their persons and property, and shall enjoy in this respect the same rights and privileges as are or may be granted to native citizens or subjects, on their submitting themselves to the conditions imposed upon the native citizens or subjects."

In certain other clauses of said treaty the citizens or subjects of the respective contracting powers are to enjoy as to particular rights and privileges the equality accorded to native citizens or subjects and to occupy the status of those of "the most favored nation." It would seem to be obvious that to such a treaty the foregoing principle as to liberality in its interpretation with a view to achieving its expressed purposes as above outlined should be adopted and applied. The opening sentence of the first article of the treaty as above quoted provides that—

"The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other to carry on trade, wholesale and retail."

In order that the foregoing liberties and privileges may be exercised, the citizens or subjects of the respective parties to the treaty are by the succeeding clause in said section accorded the right "to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses and shops"; and are also permitted "to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade." The question in this case turns upon the meaning to be given to the term "commercial purposes" as used in the foregoing clause of article I of said treaty. Looking to its immediate context in said article, this phrase would seem to be intimately linked up with the term "trade," as twice employed in said article in defining the liberties and activities of those persons, the citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties, for whose benefit the treaty was made.

[3] The words "trade" and "commerce" are frequently found in conjunction or juxtaposition in treaties between nations and in those constitutions and laws which define and regulate the scope and purposes of such international engagements. They are also often employed by lexicographers in defining each other. When so employed, and particularly when so used in the conjunctive, they are held to impart to each other an enlarged signification which would include practically every business occupation carried on for the purpose of procuring subsistence or profit and into which, or any material part of which, the elements of bargain and sale, barter, exchange, or traffic enter. Each of these terms has sometimes been subjected to two limitations which would distinguish them from unskilled labor and even from agricultural employments on the one hand and from professional employments and the exercise of the fine arts on the other. See Standard Dictionary "Trade." Of these two phrases the term "commerce" and "commercial" are usually given the larger signification as embracing those dealings in general which arise and are conducted in the course of business and social intercourse between individuals and peoples. See Standard Dictionary "Commerce." This enlarged signification was early in our national history imparted to the term "commerce" by Chief Justice Marshall, in the leading case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. Ed. 23, when, in defining the term as employed in our federal Constitution, he said:

"Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more—it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse."

This enlarged meaning of the term "commerce" has been adopted and carried down through a long line of later decisions of both federal and state tribunals, and has been applied to many and varied occupations. In the case of Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 280, 23 L. Ed. 347, the Supreme Court said:

"Commerce is a term of the largest import. It comprehends intercourse for the purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of our country and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between the citizens of different states."

In the case of Preston v. Finley (C. C.) 72 F. 850, it was held that, within the comprehensive definition of the term "commerce" given by the Supreme Court in the foregoing cases, a newspaper was the subject of commercial intercourse and sale between state and state like any other article in which the right of traffic exists. In the case of In re Radke Co. (D. C.) 193 F. 735, it was decided that the term "commercial corporation" as used in the National Bankruptcy Act included a corporation which, owning its own property, was engaged in leasing it and collecting rents therefor. "It was transacting business," says the court. In the quite recent case of Asakura v. City of Seattle, 265 U. S. 332, 44 S. Ct. 515, 68 L. Ed. 1041, it was decided that a Japanese alien, engaged in the business of a pawnbroker, was engaged in "trade," within the language of article I of the treaty here under review. In so deciding Mr. Justice Butler said:

"Treaties are to be construed in a broad and liberal spirit, and, when two constructions are possible, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it, and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred. Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, 487, 25 L. Ed. 628; Geofroy v. Riggs, supra, 271 (10 Sup. Ct. 295); Tucker v. Alexandroff, 183 U. S. 424, 437, 22 Sup. Ct. 195, 46 L. Ed. 264. The ordinance defines 'pawnbroker' to 'mean and include every person whose business or occupation it is to take and receive by way of pledge, pawn, or exchange, goods, wares, or merchandise, or any kind of personal property whatever, for the repayment or security of any money loaned thereon, or to loan money on deposit or personal property,' and defines 'pawnshop' to 'mean and include every place at which the business of pawnbroker is carried on.' The language of the treaty is comprehensive. The phrase 'to carry on trade' is broad. That it is not to be given a restricted meaning is plain. The clauses, 'to * * * own or lease * * * shops, * * * to lease land * * * for * * * commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade,' and 'shall receive * * * the most constant protection and security of their * * * property, * * *' all go to show the intention of the parties that the citizens or subjects of either shall have liberty in the territory of the other to engage in all kinds and classes of business that are or reasonably may be embraced within the meaning of the word 'trade' as used in the treaty."

[4] In the light of the foregoing views as to the enlarged and liberal interpretation to be given to the words "trade," "commerce," and "commercial," as employed in the terms of the treaty under consideration, we approach the immediate question as to whether the expressed purpose for which the lease in question here was entered into and the leasehold interest in the lands and premises described therein acquired by the respondent Tagami was such a "commercial" purpose as to come fairly within the intentment of the treaty makers in the use of said terms. The expressed purpose for which said respondent took said lease and admittedly proceeded to operate thereunder was that of conducting a "health resort and sanitarium." It is a matter of common knowledge that health resorts and sanitariums have been and are being established and operated in various parts of the state of California, wherever climatic and other conditions are or are supposed to be favorable, and that these establishments are usually, if not universally, conducted for profit. It is also a matter of common knowledge that the conduct of such institutions involve business transactions, including the equipment and supplying of the institution with the varied and often extensive accessories to its successful operation and the continuing purchase of merchandise and other articles of daily consumption essential to its upkeep. That the establishment and proper conduct of such institutions as aids to public health should be encouraged is beyond question; and that persons of alien extraction, even though ineligible to citizenship under our laws, should be permitted to establish and maintain them in the interest of health, cleanliness, and comfort, even of their own alien race, should be equally beyond controversy. No nice distinction can or should be drawn between a business venture of this character and the many others in which aliens of this particular race, as a matter of common knowledge are and for many past years have been engaged in the state of California, such as the keeping of hotels, lodging houses, tea houses, and eating places of various sorts, the conduct of drug stores, bath houses, barber shops, book stores, theaters, and other places of amusement or recreation. Most if not all of these activities are in more or less modified form either necessary or incidental to the conduct of health resorts. To distinguish between a health resort and sanitarium conducted for profit and any or all of these forms of business or commercial activity would be to create a rule of exclusion which would be practically without limit and to shut aliens of this race out of most if not all of the many and varied occupations in which they have heretofore preferred or been permitted to engage, and would not only have this effect, but would by necessary reaction and sequence foreclose the citizens of our own country from engaging in like pursuits within the Empire of Japan.

The appellant herein, in support of the interpretation it would have us place upon the foregoing clause of this treaty, makes the further contention that, in interpreting the treaty in the form in which it has been phrased since its execution in 1911, we should consider those matters of public and official history which preceded and attended the adoption of the treaty in its present form as disclosing an intention on the part of the framers of the treaty to impart to it a restricted meaning which would exclude the sort of occupation or business for which the leasehold here in question was to be utilized. Our attention is directed to the fact that the Circuit Court of the United States, in the case of Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197, 44 S. Ct. 15, 68 L. Ed. 255, recites that, in the draft of the treaty presented by the imperial government of Japan, the article therein corresponding to article I of the present treaty contained a clause permitting the citizens or subjects of each of the contracting powers "to lease land for residential, commercial, industrial, manufacturing and other lawful purposes," and that in the ensuing correspondence between the then Secretary of State and the representative of the imperial government objection was made to the use of the phrases "industrial and other lawful purposes," and that as a consequence these phrases were eliminated from the final and adopted draft of said treaty, and it was executed and approved in its present form. The appellant herein deduces from this recital by said court of the foregoing undoubted facts attending the formation and final adoption of the treaty the conclusion that the more restricted meaning for which it is contending should be given to the words which were permitted to remain therein. But we do not find such a conclusion deducible either from the correspondence between the representatives of the respective powers proposing to enter into treaty relations, nor from the language of said circuit court in reciting and interpreting the same, since it clearly appears from such correspondence, as pointed out in said case, that the sole object in view on the part of the representative of our government in suggesting the omission of the objectionable phrases was that of eliminating from the draft of said treaty a phrasing which might be held to go beyond the desire of our nation to prevent the leasing to said aliens of agricultural lands, and that this was due to the then existing condition of the California statute inhibiting the leasing of lands for agricultural purposes for a term in excess of three years. It would not be going beyond the boundaries of well-known public history to recall the fact that there was at that very time a growing agitation in California looking toward the adoption of the statute which was in fact enacted in 1913 and to its later enlargement by the terms of which the leasing of lands to alien Japanese for agricultural purposes was altogether inhibited. If it had been the intention of the framers of said treaty to create a more drastic inhibition against the leasing of lands by aliens of this race than that which is referred to in their correspondence and embraced within the terms of said treaty, it would have been a simple matter to have done so. If, as the appellant insists, the proper interpretation of the express terms of said treaty would render it susceptible of the restrictive meaning which it would have us assign to it, there would have been no impediment in the way of a more drastic statute than that which has been enacted in our alien land law. That such was not the intention of either the treaty makers or the framers of our alien land legislation seems to us clear.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Partnership ⇨55—Evidence held to justify finding defendants partners.

In action for services, use of automobile, and moneys paid out for defendants' benefit, evidence held to justify finding that defendants were partners.

2. Partnership ⇨213(1)—Allegation of partnership unnecessary for recovery on partnership theory.

In action against partners as joint debtors, allegation of partnership is unnecessary to support recovery on theory of partnership.

3. Appeal and error ⇨928(4)—Instruction as to requisites to justify verdict for plaintiff presumed given at request of defendant.

Instruction that, to justify verdict for plaintiff, partnership must be proved by preponderance of evidence, will be presumed on defendant's appeal to have been given at request of defendant, where record does not show at whose request instruction was given.

4. Trial ⇨251(4)—Instruction as to necessity of proof of partnership, which was not pleaded, held proper.

In action against two defendants on alleged indebtedness, instruction, that partnership must be proved by preponderance of evidence, defining term, and stating liabilities of partners, held proper, although pleadings raised no issue as to partnership obligation, where recovery was sought on that theory.

5. Witnesses ⇨379(2)—Rebuttal relative to admission of partner, not in presence of other, held proper for purpose of impeachment.

In action against defendants claimed to be partners, where one defendant was cross-examined as to an admission not made in presence of other, and court, on request for instruction that such defendant was not bound, said that it could be offered at proper time and would be given, there was no error in admitting rebuttal testimony that admission had been made for purpose of impeachment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by R. H. Shannon against George M. Calmus and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Elsie P. Betts appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Taylor and E. W. Forgy, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Guy Knupp, of Porterville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant Elsie P. Betts has appealed from the judgment herein given against the defendants jointly.

The complaint states five separate causes of action: The first, for moneys paid out and expended for the use and benefit of defendants; the second, for services performed by plaintiff; the third, for the reasonable value of the use of plaintiff's automobile in the performance of such services; the fourth and fifth for services performed by other persons, the claims for which were duly assigned to plaintiff—all at the special instance and request of defendants. The complaint does not allege that the defendants were partners or state the relation between them which would make them jointly liable. The plaintiff introduced evidence at the trial tending to show that the defendants were in fact partners. The defendants, who filed separate answers denying the allegations of the complaint, testified that Mrs. Betts was not a partner of Calmus or interested in the enterprise in which he was engaged, but that she was merely his secretary, employed by him at a salary of $75 a month.

[1] Calmus was engaged in the promotion of an enterprise to prospect for oil, and for that purpose, through the efforts of plaintiff and others, leases were secured on more than 20,000 acres of land. Mrs. Betts was the owner of lands within the area to be prospected. There is evidence that she put large sums of money into the enterprise. One witness testified that both defendants stated:

"That they were interested in the proposition equally, she was furnishing the money, all the cash except some I got hold of, and some other money she wanted to borrow, and asked me if I would go see about borrowing some for her. * * * They asked me if I would go down to Los Angeles and ask somebody to loan them $25,000 on her ranch to carry these operations on. * * * I went to various places to try to borrow money. * * * I introduced Mr. Walker to the two of them. * * * He made arrangements with Mrs. Betts to come out to her house and look the property over, which he did, with several other men. * * * As I understand it, he loaned her $10,000 or $15,000 on the ranch; I don't know which the amount was, $10,000 or $15,000."

The plaintiff testified:

"Mr. Calmus told me that Mrs. Betts—in Mrs. Betts' presence—that Mrs. Betts had an interest with him in this proposition. * * * And in the event of his death or if anything should happen to him, that Mrs. Betts was able to go right on with the plans, and he had so arranged things that there wouldn't be any interruption at all. * * * Mrs. Betts was very active in helping him secure leases, and driving her car, and entertaining the guests that would come up from the South at her residence, and the loaning of her tools and other equipment she had on her ranch, in the actual operations."

Another witness, who had furnished a considerable sum of money to be used in the enterprise, testified:

"George M. Calmus frequently stated in the presence of Elsie P. Betts that she, Elsie P. Betts, was a partner in the oil leases * * * and had been with him in the work from the beginning."

Funds used in the enterprise were deposited in her name and paid out on her personal checks. There was other evidence tending to show that Mrs. Betts was interested with Calmus in the enterprise, but enough has been stated to justify a finding that the defendants were partners.

[2] The principal ground urged for a reversal is that because the complaint failed to allege that the defendants were partners, the plaintiff was not entitled to a recovery against appellant on the theory that she and Calmus were partners. In overruling a similar objection in Pike v. Zadig, 171 Cal. 273, 277, 152 P. 923, 925, the court said:

"It is urged that * * * the pleading contains no allegation of any such partnership. 'In an action against partners upon a partnership obligation, it is not necessary to allege a partnership between the defendants, but they may be declared against as any joint debtors.' (15 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 920, and cases cited.) Indeed, a denial of the partnership, where it is alleged, does not raise a material issue. (Hunter v. Martin, 57 Cal. 365.)"

[3, 4] Exception is taken to several instructions given by the court, stating in effect that to justify a verdict against Mrs. Betts it must be shown by a preponderance of the evidence that she and Calmus were partners, defining the term "partnership," and stating the liabilities of partners. It is contended that the pleadings do not raise any issue as to a partnership obligation. The record does not show at whose request the instructions were given, and the presumption, therefore, is that they were given at appellant's request. Gray v. Eschen, 125 Cal. 1, 5, 57 P. 664; Sutter Butte C. Co. v. American R. & A. Co., 182 Cal. 549, 189 P. 277. Disregarding this defect in the record, however, it is clear from what has been said that the instructions were properly given.

[5] Complaint is made of the admission in evidence of a certain declaration made by Calmus when Mrs. Betts was not present. He testified that she had no interest in the oil enterprise, but that he borrowed $5,000 from her which he deposited "to the credit of Mrs. Betts to check off, * * * she being my secretary and carrying on my work," and that she had borrowed this $5,000 from her father. Counsel for plaintiff, evidently for purposes of impeachment, examined Calmus as follows:

"Q. Do you remember having a conversation with Mr. Shannon at the time when he and you were on the road to Visalia or Tulare, in an automobile, relative to some money that Mr. Post was giving his daughter, to put into this enterprise? * * * A. No, sir.

"Q. Didn't you tell Mr. Shannon on this occasion Mr. Post had given his daughter, Mrs. Betts, $5,000 to put into this enterprise?

"Mr. De Laney (Counsel for defendants): As to Mrs. Betts, if such a conversation as that took place, * * * I will ask that the court instruct the jury that she is not bound by any statements they make.

"The Court: Proper instructions can be brought in at the proper time; I will give the jury those instructions. Of course, if she were not present she is not bound by the conversation. * * * A. No, sir."

In rebuttal the plaintiff was permitted to testify, over defendants' objection, that Calmus said, at the time and place referred to in his cross-examination, that Mr. Post was giving Mrs. Betts $5,000 to invest "in the oil proposition." Manifestly there was no error in the ruling.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte CLARK. (Cr. 1201.)

1. Criminal law ☞1001—Court without authority to suspend sentence without admitting defendant to probation.

Court is without authority to suspend execution of a sentence without admitting defendant to probation.

2. Criminal law ☞1001—Suspension of sentence, except as incident to probation, unauthorized.

Pen. Code, § 1203, conferring on court authority to place defendant on probation, does not authorize suspension of execution of sentence, except as an incident to granting of probation.

3. Criminal law ☞1001—Order suspending sentence held void, where application for probation denied.

Order suspending execution of sentence in burglary prosecution held void, in view of Pen. Code, § 1203, and hence judgment was not satisfied by expiration of period of suspension, where order stated that application for probation was denied and remanded defendant to custody of sheriff for work on roads.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by C. V. Clark directed against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure his release from custody on a commitment issued on revocation of suspension of sentence. Prisoner remanded.

W. W. Judd, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and A. D. Orme, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In his petition for the issuance of this writ the applicant alleged that he was restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of Los Angeles county, and that his detention was illegal by reason of certain facts. These facts were that immediately after applicant had been convicted in the superior court of Los Angeles county of the crime of burglary in the second degree, and sentence had been pronounced, the court suspended the execution of the sentence for the period of six months, under certain stated circumstances, which appellant contends amounted to an admission to probation for said period of six months; that thereafter said superior court caused applicant to be arrested and held on a commitment under said judgment for the purpose of causing him to be imprisoned in the state prison, as provided by said judgment. Appellant contends that, because the order of suspension of judgment was not revoked within the said period of six months, the court lost its authority to proceed further in execution of the judgment.

The return shows that on February 8, 1924, after Clark had duly entered his plea of guilty of the crime of burglary in the second degree, he was duly sentenced to be punished by imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin for the term prescribed by law. At the same time, as shown by a minute order of the court, the court directed a stay of execution of the judgment against the defendant and his codefendant as follows:

"The application for probation is denied; and, no legal cause appearing why judgment should not be pronounced, the court pronounces judgment and sentence as entered in the minutes. * * * (San Quentin.) Execution of sentence is stayed for a period of six months, and both defendants are remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county, during which time they shall be permitted to work on the public highways of Los Angeles county to be returned into court at the end of the six months' period."

The said judgment is the same judgment which came before this court for review in the case of People v. Clark et al. (Cal. App.) 231 P. 590. In that case the defendant had been convicted of the crime of escape while in the custody of the sheriff at the county road camp. We reversed that judgment upon the ground that the court had no authority to order imprisonment of the defendant in the county jail or road camp. That being so, it was held that the defendant was not guilty of the crime of escape when he left that place of confinement.

In People v. Clark, supra, it was assumed by counsel and by the court that the judgment was free from any legal defect other than that it attempted to impose an unauthorized imprisonment by way of substitution for the substantial part of the judgment which directed that defendant be imprisoned in the state prison. We did not there consider, and we were not asked to consider, any question challenging the authority of the court to suspend the execution of judgment in the manner there attempted; that is to say, without admitting the defendant to probation.

As we said in our former decision above noted:

"Undoubtedly the court had in mind, in pronouncing this judgment, subdivision (a) of section 1203 of the Penal Code, providing for the suspending of sentence."

According to the record which was before us at that time, the judgment itself, at the end thereof, stated that execution of sentence was suspended, "defendant to be remanded to the custody of the sheriff to work at the county road camp." Following the construction of section 1203 as found in People v. Mendosa, 178 Cal. 509, 511, 173 P. 998, we held that "the trial court upon a suspension of a sentence of imprisonment is without authority to further restrain or confine the defendant."

[1] Although this court, perhaps inadvertently, in People v. Clark, supra, assumed that the court below had authority to suspend execution of sentence without admitting the defendant to probation, we consider that subject open for consideration now. And we are of the opinion that such authority does not exist. In the Mendosa Case the Supreme Court said:

"If the court desires to suspend the execution of the sentence, the only way in which it can legally do so is by proceeding under section 1203 of the Penal Code, and that section expressly provides that in the event of such suspension 'the court shall place such person on probation and under the charge and supervision of the probation officer of said court, during such suspension.' The section clearly contemplates that the defendant, while on probation and conforming to the terms thereof, shall be at large and not in confinement."

[2, 3] Section 1203 of the Penal Code first confers upon the court authority, in the cases to which it applies, "to place the defendant upon probation as hereinafter provided." The subdivision relating to suspension of imposing of sentence, or of execution thereof, is a part of the process of admitting to probation as authorized by the general provisions of the section. It does not purport and should not be construed to authorize suspension of execution of the sentence except as an incident to the granting of probation, for by implication it declares the opposite intention. Therefore, in order to reach the conclusion that the suspension was within the authority of the court, it must be determined first that the order was, in effect, an order admitting to probation. But in the present case this cannot be so determined for the two sufficient reasons: First, that the order itself states that the application for probation is denied; and, second, because it attempts to retain the defendant in actual custody. We hold, therefore, that the order suspending execution of judgment in the principal case was void, and that the judgment itself has not been satisfied by the expiration of a term of probation. This being so, there appears to be no reason why the defendant may not be taken into custody and compelled to submit to imprisonment in the state prison as required by the terms of the judgment.

The return herein further shows that at the time when the court made its order suspending execution of the judgment this was done virtually at the request of the defendant, who promised that, if the court would make said order, he would remain at the road camp as provided therein. There was no appeal taken from the judgment. In People v. Walker, 6 Cal. Unrep. 472, 61 P. 800 (not published in the official reports), the Supreme Court had before it an appeal from an order vacating a stay of execution and committing the defendant to imprisonment in execution of the judgment. The court affirmed that order, saying:

"It would be strange if, under such circumstances, the court had no power to enforce the sentence. If the contention of defendant is correct, the court, after having, at defendant's request, stayed proceedings until the full expiration of his time to appeal or make a motion for a new trial, would be powerless to carry the judgment into effect. The law does not contemplate any such absurdity."

The prisoner is remanded to custody.

PEOPLE v. KELLY. (Cr. 1136; Cr. 2768.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞707—Evidence held to warrant finding of public highway.

In prosecution for violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 112, evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that street intersection at which accident occurred was public highway.

2. Homicide ☞74—Killing by driving automobile while intoxicated, held manslaughter.

Evidence that accused, while driving his automobile under influence of liquor, collided with pedestrian, resulting in injuries causing her death, was sufficient to support verdict of manslaughter regardless of speed at which he was traveling.

3. Criminal law ☞406(4)—Corpus delicti may be proved by accused's testimony in court.

Though corpus delicti cannot be proved by extrajudicial admissions of accused alone, it may be proved by his testimony in open court tending to prove corpus delicti, where he voluntarily becomes witness.

4. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 234(1)—Accused's testimony held to prove death by driving automobile at unlawful speed.

Accused's testimony in open court held sufficient to prove that he was driving his automobile at unlawful speed when he collided with pedestrian at street intersection, making pedestrian's death resulting therefrom manslaughter.

5. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 340(2)—Accused convicted of manslaughter may not complain of instruction on murder.

Accused found guilty of manslaughter could not complain that instruction, correctly stating law on manslaughter, erroneously stated law applicable to murder.

6. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 309(1)—Instruction on manslaughter by unlawful act held proper.

Instruction that person committing act in manner forbidden by statute, thereby causing death, may be convicted of manslaughter, held not erroneous, in view of Pen. Code, § 192, defining involuntary manslaughter.

7. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 822(1)—Instructions considered as whole.

Instructions must be considered as whole, and, if law is fairly stated, judgment will not be reversed merely because one or more of them standing alone are subject to criticism.

On Petition for Hearing in Supreme Court.

8. Homicide $\hookrightarrow$ 74—Violation of statute by automobile driver must be cause of killing.

Violation of Motor Vehicle Act, § 113, or section 121, by automobile driver who collided and killed pedestrian, would not warrant conviction for murder or manslaughter, unless it caused accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

J. J. Kelly was convicted of manslaughter, and of violating Motor Vehicle Act, § 112, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ford, Bodkin, Watt & Herlihy, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Hamish B. Eddie, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for the People.

CURTIS, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of murder and, in a second count of the indictment, with the violation of section 112 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) in driving his automobile upon the public highway while under the influence of liquor. He was found guilty of manslaughter and also of violating the Motor Vehicle Act as charged in the second count of the indictment.

[1] The only point raised by the appellant against the judgment rendered under the second count of the indictment is that there was no evidence tending to show that West Sixteenth street at its intersection with South Ardmore street in the city of Los Angeles was a public highway. The evidence shows that Sixteenth street at its intersection with Ardmore street is used by the public as one of the regular avenues of travel in that vicinity of the city; that it is curbed and lighted with street lights; that it has cement sidewalks; that it has fronting upon it dwelling houses, a garage, and other buildings. These two streets, at their intersection with each other, are referred to by witnesses as well-known and well-defined highways. We think this evidence is sufficient to justify the implied finding of the jury that Sixteenth street at its intersection with Ardmore street is a public highway.

[2-4] As to the verdict against the defendant finding him guilty of manslaughter, appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support such a verdict. In support of this contention appellant claims that there was no proof introduced by the prosecution, aside from his own extrajudicial admissions, as to the rate of speed appellant was traveling at the time of and just prior to the collision. Conceding for the present that the only evidence as to the speed appellant was traveling was that furnished by his own extrajudicial admissions, yet there was evidence tending to prove that appellant, at and just prior to the collision, was driving his car while under the influence of liquor, and that, while so driving his car, he collided with Mrs. Sarah Joy, and from such collision she sustained injuries which caused her death. This evidence was sufficient to support the verdict of manslaughter independent of any evidence as to the speed at which appellant was driving his car at the time he struck the deceased. Referring again, however, to appellant's contention that there was no evidence produced by the prosecution as to the speed at which appellant was driving at the time of the collision, aside from his extrajudicial admissions, and that therefore the corpus delicti had not been proven, we find that appellant is possibly correct in this contention, but, after the prosecution had closed its case, the defendant took the stand in his own behalf, and testified that he was going "18 or 20 miles, about 20 miles at the outside." This statement made by the defendant in open court, and, while testifying as a witness in the case, was sufficient to prove the fact testified to by him, and, if this fact was necessary to make up the required proof of the corpus delicti, it was competent and material for that purpose. While the corpus delicti cannot be proven by the extrajudicial admissions of the defendant alone, yet we know of no authority holding that it cannot be proven by the testimony of the defendant himself when he voluntarily becomes a witness in the case and testifies to facts which tend to prove the corpus delicti. There was evidence in the case showing that the maximum rate of speed permitted at the intersection of Sixteenth and Ardmore streets was 15 miles per hour. The defendant testified that he was exceeding this rate of speed in crossing this intersection. This evidence tended to prove that the defendant, at the time he struck the deceased, was committing an unlawful act not amounting to a felony, and, if in committing such unlawful act, he caused the death of another he was guilty of manslaughter.

[5-7] Certain instructions are excepted to by the appellant. In one of these the court, after setting out in full section 121 and portions of section 113 of the Motor Vehicle Act applicable to the facts in this case, and informing the jury that the violation of either of these provisions of the law was a misdemeanor, stated to the jury as follows:

"If in the operation of a motor vehicle the driver violates either of these provisions, and while so driving contrary to the law strikes another, and as a result of the injuries the victim dies, the driver is guilty of either murder or manslaughter, dependent on the surrounding circumstances."

In considering this instruction we can do so upon this appeal only in so far as it applies to the charge of manslaughter. As the verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty of manslaughter was an acquittal of him upon the charge of murder, he cannot complain of the instruction if it correctly stated the law as to the crime of manslaughter, even if it did erroneously state the law applicable to the charge of murder. Appellant contends, however, that in the giving of this instruction the court told the jury that, if a person driving a car unlawfully strikes and kills another, he is guilty of manslaughter, regardless of whether or not there was any causal connection between the illegal act of driving and the striking of the deceased. Involuntary manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being without malice, in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to felony. Pen. Code, § 192. The instruction complained of is no broader than the section of the Code defining involuntary manslaughter. The court in effect told the jury that, if the driver, while unlawfully operating his automobile, strikes and kills another, he would be guilty of involuntary manslaughter. The only possible difference between this instruction and the code section defining manslaughter is between the phrase "while unlawfully operating his automobile" and the phrase "in the commission of an unlawful act." From a legal standpoint this difference is so slight that we do not believe that the jury could have been misled thereby. Especially is this so when we find that in instruction No. 38, as well as in others, the court told the jury that, if one perform an act in a manner expressly forbidden by statute, and thereby cause the death of another, he might be convicted of manslaughter. Here the jury were in effect instructed by the court that the injury sustained by the deceased must be caused by the unlawful act of the defendant before he could be found guilty of manslaughter. The instruction to which the defendant objects must be considered in connection with instruction 38 and all other instructions given by the court bearing upon the same legal proposition in order to determine whether the court has correctly instructed the jury. People v. Glover, 141 Cal. 233, 242, 74 P. 745. If the law is fairly stated in the instructions as a whole, the judgment will not be reversed merely because one or more of the instructions standing alone are subject to criticism. People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 317, 339, 20 P. 719; People v. Anderson, 105 Cal. 32, 38 P. 513.

Practically the same objection is made to a portion of instruction No. 42, but in our opinion this objection is without merit, for the same reasons we have given regarding the objection to the first instruction considered above. In our opinion the instructions given by the court as a whole fairly state the law applicable to the facts in this case, and the defendant was in no way prejudiced by the giving of such instructions.

The judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; HOUSER, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. Appellant's petition to have the above-entitled cause heard and determined by this court, after judgment in the District Court of Appeal, is denied.

[8] In denying the petition, we withhold our approval from that portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal relating to the instructions to the jury to the effect that a person, who is violating any portion of section 113 or section 121 of the Motor Vehicle Act, and, while thus driving his car unlawfully, strikes and kills another person, may be found guilty of murder or manslaughter, dependent on the surrounding circumstances, regardless of any causal connection between the alleged act of thus driving the car and the injury to the deceased person. Such an instruction would be clearly erroneous, in the absence of other instructions rendering essential such causal connection. The record in this case discloses that other instructions were given to the extent that the jury was not misled as to the law requiring a causal connection to be shown.

KOFOID v. BECKNER et al. (Civ. 2856.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 16, 1925.)

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 253(7)—Instruction directing verdict must embody all essential elements showing legal liability and warranting conclusions contained in instruction.

An instruction directing a verdict for one party in event jury finds certain facts to be true must embrace all elements necessary to show legal liability and warrant conclusion contained in instruction.

2. Negligence $\hookrightarrow$ 117—Contributory negligence must be pleaded.

Contributory negligence is matter of defense, and must be specifically pleaded by defendant.

3. Highways $\hookrightarrow$ 173(2) — Pedestrians have right to use of highway and chargeable only with ordinary care as prudent persons would ordinarily exercise.

Pedestrians have right to the use of highways and are chargeable only with such ordinary care for their own safety as prudent persons would ordinarily exercise, and are not bound to assume that drivers of cars will act otherwise than in a careful manner.

4. Highways $\hookrightarrow$ 177—Duty of automobile driver when paved highway is obstructed to drive along right-hand half of pavement at speed not endangering others.

While the law does not require an automobile driver to drive on the right side of paved portion of highway at all times, when opposite portion is obstructed, he must drive along his right-hand half of pavement at such rate of speed as not to endanger others.

5. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1033(5)—Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 253(7)—Court held to have properly omitted question of contributory negligence in instruction in nature of directed verdict for plaintiff, and later inconsistent instructions on contributory negligence were not prejudicial to defendants.

Where defendants' pleading did not properly tender issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence, and evidence did not show that plaintiff was contributorily negligent, court did not err in omitting question of contributory negligence in an instruction in nature of directed verdict for plaintiff, and fact that court afterwards gave inconsistent instructions relating to contributory negligence was not prejudicial to defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by H. C. Kofoid against O. L. Beckner and another, copartners doing business under the name of Beckner Bros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. Croop, of Merced, and Jos. T. O'Connor, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Johnston & Jones, of Fresno, and Hugh K. Landram, of Merced, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendants in the court below in an action prosecuted by him for and on account of personal injuries sustained in being run down by an automobile belonging to the defendants, and driven by one of the defendants at the time of the injury. From this judgment the defendants appeal. The incident resulting in the injury of the plaintiff occurred on the state highway a short distance south of Athlone, in the county of Merced, at about 7:30 o'clock p. m., February 19, 1922. Prior to the accident rain had fallen and the paved portion of the highway was more or less slippery. At the time of the occurrence no rain was falling, but the evening was misty, and vision through windshields of automobiles appears to have been somewhat obscured. The highway at the place where the injury was received is a straight-away for a number of miles to the south. Just prior to the circumstances giving rise to this action it appears two automobiles, one a Dodge car and the other a Hupmobile, had gotten off the highway and were stuck in the mud. These cars were headed toward the south. A Cadillac car had stopped, or rather had returned to the place of the accident, to assist in extricating the Hupmobile and Dodge cars from the mud and back onto the paved portion of the highway. The plaintiff and three other persons came along at this juncture, asked if they could be of any assistance, were told that they could, and thereupon drove their car southward on the highway a distance of 75 or 100 yards, and parked it alongside the paved portion of the highway. All four of the automobiles just mentioned were headed southward, and the headlights of all the cars were lighted. It appears that the Hupmobile was in the ditch on one side of the road and the Dodge car was off the highway on the opposite side of the road. The plaintiff and his companions assisted in getting the Hupmobile car back on the highway, and this car was driven southward to a position a short distance in the rear of the Dodge car, in which the plaintiff and his companions had been riding, and there parked alongside the highway and its headlights left burning. Thereupon the plaintiff and his companions walked back to where the Cadillac car had been standing on the west side of the highway for the purpose of assisting in pulling the Dodge car, before mentioned, back onto the highway. As the plaintiff and his companions were walking back to the Cadillac car, they occupied the westerly portion of the pavement, and were passed by two cars going northward. These cars slowed down somewhat. One of them slowed down so that it passed by but little faster than one would ordinarily walk. After these cars had passed by and the plaintiff and his companions had reached a point, variously estimated at from 8 to 12 feet south of the Cadillac car, the defendants' car approached, traveling at a speed variously estimated at from 25 to 30 miles an hour. The defendant, who was driving the car, testified that he was running at about 25 miles an hour. No sound or warning of the approach of the defendants' car appears to have been given. The defendants' car had not slowed down before it reached a point some 30 or 40 feet from where the injury upon the plaintiff was inflicted. The defendants' car had passed the Dodge car in which the plaintiff and his party had ridden, and also the Hupmobile, which we have mentioned, parked alongside of the roadway, but the defendants appear not to have noticed whether they were actually standing still or moving slowly. The lights of the other cars, which we have mentioned, were also observed by the defendants, but it does not appear that they sensed any trouble on the highway, as the momentum of their car was not lessened until after they reached the point before stated. At about this instant of time the plaintiff became aware of the approach of the defendants' car by observing the lights, and glancing sideways saw that the car was approaching toward him, and moved a short distance westward on the highway, but was not able to escape the approaching car, and was run down and injured. Whether the plaintiff was standing or actually moving at the instant of time before he observed the approach of the defendants' car is not exactly clear, but the weight of the testimony would indicate that he had stopped walking and then moved again in an effort to get off the highway, when he observed that the defendants' car was headed toward him. At the time the plaintiff was run down he was a few feet west of the center line of the highway. It appears also from the testimony that, if the defendants' car had remained on the right-hand side of the highway, where it would ordinarily be entitled to move on its course northward, there was sufficient clear space to pass without injuring any one. Two cars had just passed by, as we have before stated, but these cars, apparently observing conditions, slackened speed. When the defendants' car reached the point, which we have noted, some 30 or 40 feet from the plaintiff, it would appear that the driver threw on the brakes, or, at least, did something, which caused his car to skid and head directly toward the plaintiff and his companions. In these movements of the car the plaintiff and one other person were knocked down and injured.

The appellants in this case concede the negligence of the defendants, and it could not very well do otherwise in view of the testimony of one of the defendants, who was driving the car, that, after observing the lights, as we have before stated, he did not slow down, but kept running along on a wet pavement at the rate of 25 miles an hour. The following question and answer show the disregard of conditions manifested by the driver of the defendants' car:

"Q. So, then, just trusting to blind luck and without knowing whether they were moving or not, you just kept going along at 25 miles an hour, even after you found out the Dodge car was standing still? A. Yes."

Admitting the negligence on the part of the defendants and the negligence of the driver of the car, which fixes such responsibility, the appellants contend that the injuries received by the plaintiff were due to his own contributory negligence, and that the court, in one of its instructions, erroneously took from the jury the question of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. In a number of instructions the court did state to the jury that if the injuries received by the plaintiff were due to his own negligence, and also that, if the plaintiff was equally negligent with the defendants, and also, if the plaintiff was not acting with due regard to his own welfare and exercising ordinary care, etc., then, and in that case, the plaintiff could not recover; also that a pedestrian must make reasonable use of his senses of sight and hearing, must give heed to ordinary indications of danger, and must not walk blindly into danger, unless he expects to stand the consequences, and that he should look and listen and observe if vehicles are approaching. The instruction complained of is as follows:

"The defendants were bound to use ordinary care in operating their automobile along the public highway, to avoid collision with other persons or vehicles, and, if you find from the evidence that they failed to use such ordinary care, and that the accident was the proximate result of the failure of the defendants to use such ordinary care, your verdict must be for the plaintiff."

[1, 2] The rule is well settled in this state that an instruction directing a verdict for a party in the event the jury finds certain facts to be true must embrace all the elements necessary to show legal liability and to warrant the directions or conclusion contained in the instruction in relation to the verdict. Measured by this rule, if contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was pleaded in the defendants' answer, and supported by any substantial testimony, or, if the testimony, of the plaintiff showed contributory negligence, then, and in that case, the instruction before referred to was clearly erroneous. But, if the question of contributory negligence was not properly before the jury, then, and in that case, the instruction is correct, and the fact that the court elsewhere and afterwards, in its instructions, did give to the jury the law relating to contributory negligence, and instructed them that if they believed the plaintiff to be negligent, or equally negligent, or that his negligence contributed to the injury, the plaintiff could not recover, though inconsistent with the instruction which we have just set out, were against the plaintiff, and therefore not prejudicial to the rights of the defendants. Contributory negligence is a matter of defense and, as a pleading, must be specially set forth by the defendant. In the answer filed by the defendants, it appears that, coupled with a paragraph denying negligence on the part of the defendants, there are these words, "and, by way of further and separate defense, allege that the injury and collision in said complaint described, if any there was, was solely and proximately caused by the fault and negligence of the plaintiff, himself, and without any fault on the part of said defendant, or either of them." The rule in pleading new matter is clearly stated by Pomeroy in his work on Code Remedies, § 690, p. 756, to wit:

"It is elementary that a defense of new matter should be pleaded, and, as new matter must of necessity be a distinct defense from a denial, it follows that it cannot properly be associated or mingled up with denials, general or special, in one paragraph or plea. For the same reason, such defense of new matter must necessarily be complete and single, as much so as each cause of action, and should be separately stated in a plea by itself."

Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel Gold Min. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 505, 143 P. 714; Hughes v. Warman Steel, etc., Co., 174 Cal. 556, 562, 163 P. 885, and a number of other cases might be cited, but these establish the rule in relation to pleading contributory negligence.

In answer to this rule that the pleadings do not properly tender the issue of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, the appellants reply that the rule has no application when contributory negligence is shown by the plaintiff's evidence. Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone & Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 P. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094; Kenny v. Kennedy, 9 Cal. App. 350, 99 P. 384. This rule also seems to be well established. Basing their contention upon this rule, the appellants insist that the plaintiff's own testimony shows contributory negligence, and therefore that the instruction, which we have quoted, constitutes prejudicial error. With this contention we do not agree. The testimony upon which the appellants base their contention of contributory negligence is as follows:

"Mr. Jones: Q. How far down the pavement was the Beckner [defendants'] car, within the best of your judgment, when you noticed it coming? A. Perhaps 30 feet.

"Q. Could you give any judgment as to its speed? A. It was coming very rapidly towards me. * * *

"Q. I will ask you, then, to just state how it appeared to you, when you were standing there, when the Beckner car came, from the time that you first saw it until it struck you. A. Well, when I first saw it, it was coming right in the center of the highway and, considering myself safe, then I started for the running board of the Cadillac, and the Beckner car veered a little towards the west, that is, turned a little bit towards the west side of the highway; it seemed to take right after me; I made up my mind I had better get off the highway, and I was getting off the highway, when it caught me with the front end of the car. * * *

"Q. And what was your position with reference to the center of the paved portion of the highway? A. I was west of the center.

"Q. Could you state how far west of the center, Mr. Kofoid? A. No, sir; I cannot say; past a few feet, maybe only a foot or two.

"Q. You cannot say you were more than one foot or two to the west of the center of the paved portion of the highway? A. My best judgment is, perhaps I was more than that though, perhaps 3 or 4 feet west of the center. * * *

"Q. That car [viz, the last car that passed by before defendants' car] was very close to you then before you saw it? A. Yes, sir; well, I would say it was, it may have been 40 or 50 feet probably.

"Q. You were walking then in a northerly direction towards the Cadillac? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you turn around or did you just glance out from the side? A. No, sir; the rays of light as they came on me; I noticed it coming.

"Q. Then, you did not turn around at all. A. No, sir; I don't believe I did.

"Q. You did not at all look in a southerly direction down the highway at that time to see if there were any other cars approaching from a distance? A. I might have; but I do not remember.

"Q. You do not remember of having done so? A. No, sir; I do not remember.

"Q. Then, after this Ford car had passed, you continued to your position which you finally took, namely, 6 or 8 feet in front of the Cadillac car? A. Yes; I had reached about that point when I was struck; I had not come to any stop that I know of; I don't know; we were just going back there to do this work; I don't think we had come to any standing position.

"Q. You think you were still in a position of walking towards the Cadillac? A. I think we were; yes. * * *

"Q. Now, about how far was the Beckner car, that is the defendants' car from you at the time you first saw it? A. I don't know the distance; what I would give you, would be an approximation, I should say something like 30 or 40 feet. * * *

"Q. Do you know what attracted your attention to the car? A. No, sir; I do not, unless it was the light.

"Q. You don't remember of having heard anybody say 'a car is coming' or anything of that kind? A. No, sir; I did not hear any one say that.

"Q. Then your impression is, now, that the first thing that attracted your attention to the Beckner car was the approaching light? A. I think so.

"Q. And what was the first thing you did, Mr. Kofoid? A. My first thing was to make a move towards the Cadillac car; you see I could not get out of the way that way; I started to get off the pavement on the west side in the mud, but he got me before I got off.

"Q. Did you turn around as the Beckner car approached? A. I turned, yes; I turned sideways to watch it.

"Q. You turned sideways? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And started to move in which direction? A. I first started or tried to move, but did not move very far; I started towards the Cadillac car. I saw him coming right towards me and I started to run off the pavement, but he was so close and he got me before I could get out of the way of the car."

[3-5] The cases relied upon by appellants in relation to contributory negligence being shown by the testimony of the plaintiff so as to make it an issue in the case irrespective of the pleading, in stating the rule, are particular to mention the fact that there must be some substantial testimony, upon which the jury can base a finding of contributory negligence. In other words, whether presented by the pleadings, or by the testimony introduced by the plaintiff, there must be some substantial testimony showing contributory negligence before the court would be justified in holding that the instruction complained of by the appellants was either inapplicable to the instant case or constituted prejudicial error. If these elements are both wanting, the instruction is correct under the circumstances of this case. The testimony of the plaintiff, which we have set forth, is not changed or altered in any respect, or modified by the testimony of other witnesses other than, as we have stated, that the weight of the testimony would lead to the conclusion that the plaintiff had stopped walking an instant or so before he was struck down, but the testimony all shows the facts just as we have stated, and that the plaintiff was in a position where, if the defendants' car had been guided along the highway where it should have been driven, no injury would have resulted to the plaintiff. At the time of the injury, the testimony of the plaintiff and of all of his witnesses show that he was on the westerly half of the paved portion of the highway; that the course the defendants' car should have followed was along the easterly portion of the highway; and that cars had immediately passed along that portion of the highway without injury to any one. The testimony leads irresistibly to the conclusion that the defendants' car was being driven at an excessive rate of speed under the circumstances, upon a slippery highway, that the presence of the lights of four automobiles standing still was not heeded, the speed of the on-coming car was not slackened until within immediate proximity of where the plaintiff and his companions were, and then, either by an improper application of the brakes or "a loss of his head," as one of the witnesses testified the driver stated, the defendants' car was deflected in its course over and upon the westerly half of the highway, and the plaintiff and one of his companions run down. Notwithstanding the fact that the number of reckless drivers have rendered the paved portion of our highways a danger zone, pedestrians have a right to the use thereof, and are chargeable only with such ordinary and reasonable care for their own safety as a prudent person would ordinarily exercise, and they are not bound to assume that drivers of cars will act otherwise than in a careful and prudent manner, and while the law does not require an automobile driver to, at all times, drive on what to him is the right side of the paved portion of the highway, when the opposite portion of the paved highway is obstructed, it does become his duty to propel his car along his right-hand half of the pavement, and at such a rate of speed as not to endanger the life or property of others. There seems to us no question that the conditions which we have recited in this case and the testimony which we have set forth show that the injury to the plaintiff was occasioned solely and exclusively by the improper and reckless driving on the part of the driver of the car occupied and being driven by the defendants, and therefore that the instruction complained of by the appellants was correct, and that the inconsistent instructions, in relation to contributory negligence, afterwards given by the court, were in nowise prejudicial to the rights of the defendants.

The order and judgment of the trial court are hereby affirmed.

STATE COMPENSATION INSURANCE FUND v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5048.)

Insurance — 435—Employer's policy held not to cover vice president.

Where clause in employer's policy specifically exempted liability for injury to person having title of vice president, injury to vice president of typographical union, although acting at time as member of active committee, held not covered so as to justify award against insurance carrier.

Certiorari on petition of the State Compensation Insurance Fund against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and others, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, awarding compensation for injuries. Award annulled.

Frank J. Creede and John J. Taheny, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

Heidelberg & Murasky, of San Francisco, for respondent San Francisco Typographical Union No. 21.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a writ to review the award of the Industrial Accident Commission, requiring petitioner to pay compensation to respondent Thomas S. Black.

No dispute arises over the right of Black to receive compensation for injuries suffered by him; the controversy is narrowed down to a question of whether the respondent San Francisco Typographical Union No. 21, the employer, should be held liable, or whether it was insured against such liability by the petitioner, as insurance carrier.

There is no conflict in the evidence about the facts. Thomas S. Black was the vice president of the San Francisco Typographical Union. As such officer he had few active duties to perform. The policy of insurance upon which the award of the Industrial Accident Commission is predicated contains a statement of "Risks not Covered," including among such risks the following:

"If the insured be a corporation, any work or duties performed by any person having the title of (see indorsement attached) or a combination of any such titles with or without other titles."

The "indorsement attached," which elucidates the foregoing, is as follows:

"Anything in this policy to the contrary notwithstanding, it is understood and agreed that lines 20 and 21 (the lines above quoted) of the policy are changed to read: 'If the insured be an association, any work or duties performed by any person having the title of vice president or a combination of any such titles with or without other titles.'"

The construction of these clauses of the policy is the only matter before us. Thomas S. Black, the vice president, was appointed to serve upon a committee to gather information regarding the cost of living. While so serving, he was injured when attempting to board a street car. Was his injury one of the excepted risks? We think the plain language of the policy excludes it. Any work or duties performed by any person having the title of vice president, even though at the time he may hold such title in combination with another title (such as member of an active committee) is expressly and plainly excluded.

It is not for the courts to change the contract of the parties. This contract is unambiguous and leaves no room for judicial construction. The insured purchased only the protection afforded by the terms of this policy. It might have paid a larger premium and "covered" its vice president, as well as its president and secretary, who were expressly "covered." When insured has chosen to make and pay for a contract expressly "covering" injury to two of its officers, and excluding a third, regardless of what work he may be engaged in doing, there is no rule of law by which this court may save it from the legal consequences of the same.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is annulled.

GARDINER v. FREDERICKSON, Police Judge. (Civ. 4648.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 22, 1925.)

1. Mandamus  29—Does not lie to compel police judge to order delivery to petitioner of property taken on illegal search.

Mandamus is not maintainable to compel police judge to direct return of property alleged to have been taken from petitioner's residence by certain officers on unlawful search, where the judge has no control over the seized property, especially as possession of such officers cannot be divested in a proceeding to which they are not parties, but petitioner's remedy is by means of direct proceeding against such officers.

2. Mandamus  154(2)—Allegation that certain officers "held" certain property mere conclusion of law.

In mandamus to compel police judge to direct return of property alleged to have been unlawfully taken from petitioner's residence by certain officers, an allegation that property is "held" by prosecutor and chief of police, is a mere conclusion of law, and, where there is no allegation that officers were acting under direction of prosecutor, or chief, or that property was delivered to them, petition fails to show that they have possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by N. J. Gardiner against William F. Frederickson, Police Judge. Judgment for respondent, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Fisk & Randall, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. M. Friedlander, City Prosecutor, and A. T. Folsom, Deputy City Prosecutor, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate, made to the superior court. A demurrer to the petition was sustained and judgment went accordingly. Petitioner appeals.

The petition alleges that on a certain day there was filed in the police court of the city of Los Angeles, of which respondent is one of the judges, a criminal complaint against petitioner, and that on the same day petitioner pleaded not guilty thereto; that at all times mentioned in the petition, and now, a certain person was chief of police of the city of Los Angeles, two certain persons were police officers thereof and a certain person was city prosecutor thereof; that two days before the filing of the criminal complaint the two police officers entered petitioner's place of residence without a search warrant and took therefrom certain specified articles of personal property; that "the said property is now being unlawfully and improperly held by the said city prosecutor, chief of police, and police officers in violation of the rights of this petitioner under the Constitution of the state of California; that the said city prosecutor, chief of police, and police officers purpose, and each of them purposes, to use the said property, or some or all thereof upon the trial" of the criminal cause, "and that by reason thereof, and of the facts above set forth, the petitioner's rights as aforesaid, under the Constitution of the state of California, have been and will be violated, unless the court order the return of said property as prayed"; and "that if the said chief of police, police officers, and city prosecutor are permitted to retain possession of the above-described property until the time of the trial of the aforesaid cause, the said officers or some or all of them, may, and your petitioner verily believes that they will, offer the said property so unlawfully seized as aforesaid, or some part thereof, as evidence upon the trial of the said cause, and the said judge may, and petitioner verily believes that he will, admit the same in evidence, and thereby the constitutional rights of your petitioner are now, and will be hereafter, violated, and your petitioner will be without remedy." There are other allegations of the petition, but the foregoing are all that are material to the present inquiry. The pleading closes with a prayer that a writ of mandate issue "commanding" respondent police judge, the sole respondent in the proceeding, "to make and enter an order directed to" the chief of police, the city prosecutor, and the two police officers, "commanding them, and each of them, to release, surrender, and deliver to the defendant all of the aforesaid personal property so unlawfully seized and held by them, or any of them. * * *

[1] It is manifest that the petition is insufficient. No facts are alleged showing that respondent has any control over the seized property, nor, in fact, is it sought to compel him to deliver it up. Appellant would have him order the officers named in the petition to make delivery of it. If, as the petition alleges, the property is held by the officers, the possession by them cannot be divested in a proceeding to which they are not parties. Appellant's remedy, if any he has under the allegations of the petition, could be sought only by means of a direct action or proceeding, by claim and delivery or otherwise, against the officers.

[2] It is to be observed, in passing, that the allegation that the property is "held" by the prosecutor and the chief of police is a mere conclusion of law. There is no allegation that, in making the seizure, the police officers were acting under the direction or orders of either the prosecutor or the chief, or that, after making it, the property was delivered to them or to either of them. In making the seizure, for aught that is alleged in the petition, the officers may have been acting in a private capacity and under a claim of ownership of the articles seized.

Appellant would justify his pleading under People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 237, 205 P. 435, 24 A. L. R. 1383, and Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 34 S. Ct. 341, 58 L. Ed. 652, L. R. A. 1915B, 834, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1177, but there is nothing in either case which breathes the breath of life into it.

Judgment affirmed.

MacDONALD v. KUHN. (Civ. 2876.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 22, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ☞907(3)—Findings assumed to be supported by evidence where appeal on judgment roll alone.

Where appeal is before appellate court on judgment roll alone, it must be assumed that findings are supported by the evidence.

2. Partnership ☞262—Written agreement terminating partnership held not to terminate all matters in controversy between partners.

Written agreement terminating partnership as then carried on held not to terminate all matters in controversy between partners as to partnership transactions theretofore had, where it made no reference to amount of indebtedness, and did not purport to adjust same or apportion amounts which each should pay.

3. Partnership ☞327(5)—Amendment of complaint where defendant asked for "full accounting" held not erroneous, though increased amount thereby asked.

In action between copartners in which defendant filed a cross-complaint for a full accounting, amendment of complaint, under permission of court, to correspond with facts shown by such accounting, held not erroneous though increased amount was thereby asked; "full accounting" meaning an accounting of all transactions had by copartners.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by R. O. MacDonald against M. A. Kuhn, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Chase, of Visalia, for appellant.

Russell & Heid, of Tulare, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action for an accounting. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals.

[1] On or about the 19th day of June, 1919, the plaintiff and defendant formed a copartnership for the purpose of packing fruit and vegetables. This partnership was evidenced by a written agreement, and the parties continued in such partnership, under such agreement, until about the 20th of November, 1919, when the written agreement hereinbefore referred to was terminated by the execution of another written instrument. After this date, it appears that the parties continued to do business as partners under an oral agreement. After the final dissolution of the partnership, it appears that the plaintiff paid a certain promissory note which had been executed by the partnership, and in his complaint alleged the payment of the whole of said note out of his own funds, and instituted this action in the first instance to recover from the defendant one-half thereof. Thereupon the defendant and appellant herein by answer and cross-complaint demanded an accounting of the entire partnership; the prayer of the complaint of appellant being that plaintiff be required "to bring all of the books of the copartnership and a full, complete, and correct accounting be made of all the business of said copartnership," etc. An accounting was had, the matter was referred to a referee, testimony was taken, report and findings made by the referee, which report and findings were adopted by the trial court. By these findings the trial court ascertained and determined that there was due from the defendant to the plaintiff on account of said copartnership the sum of $853.54, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant accordingly. The matter is before this court upon the judgment roll alone, and it must therefore be assumed that the findings are supported by the evidence. After the testimony had all been taken, the plaintiff was permitted by the trial court to file an amended complaint asking an accounting, the same as had been prayed for by the defendant, and which accounting had been made, and setting forth in said complaint an additional sum as the amount due the plaintiff from the defendant to correspond with the proofs.

[2] The first contention made by the appellant is that the referee and the court erred in not finding that the written agreement dated November 20, 1919, executed by the parties hereto, finally fixed and terminated all matters in controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant as to partnership transactions theretofore had. That this contention is without merit is apparent from a reading of the agreement itself. That agreement is as follows:

"Lindsay, Cal., Nov. 20, 1919.

"It is hereby agreed and understood that a certain operating agreement of June 19, 1919, or thereabouts signed by the undersigned be hereby terminated and at an end, and the rights of each of the undersigned under the said agreement hereby terminate. It is definitely understood and agreed that all mutual obligations incurred by the undersigned be paid off at the earliest possible date.

"[Signed] M. A. Kuhn.

"R. O. MacDonald."

This agreement makes no reference to the amount of the indebtedness, does not purport to settle and adjust the same, or apportion between the copartners the respective amount which each should pay in order to liquidate the partnership indebtedness.

The next contention of the appellant is likewise without any merit. It is set forth as follows:

"Although counsel for appellant made a motion to refer the case to the referee on all matters at issue, the court refused to do so and specifically ordered the matter to go 'to the referee for a full accounting.'"

This is the statement in appellant's brief. The record bearing the certificate of the clerk sets forth the proceeding in this language:

"Counsel for appellant then moved the court for an order referring the matters at issue back to the referee, D. E. Perkins, Esq., for a further and full account, * * * the court being fully advised doth order that the matter be referred to the referee for a full accounting, each party to produce all books, papers, checks, receipts, etc., necessary for the referee to make such account."

Further comment upon this objection seems unnecessary.

[3] It is further urged that the court erred in allowing the plaintiff to file an amended complaint. This objection seems to be based upon the fact that the amount appellant asks for judgment is in an increased sum. This court, in Stohlman v. Martin, 28 Cal. App. 338, 152 P. 319, has decided contrary to appellant's contention in this particular. See, also, Born v. Castle, 22 Cal. App. 282, 134 P. 347. The appellant, in his cross-complaint, asked for a full accounting. The plaintiff simply concurred therein and amended his pleadings, under the permission of the court, to correspond with the facts shown by such accounting. We do not need to cite authorities to the effect that when a full accounting is ordered, it means an accounting of all the transactions had by the copartners. No accounting, as we have said, was had of the partnership as it existed under the written agreement, and therefore the only accounting that could be had to settle all matters between the plaintiff and the defendant was one which included all transactions had between them covering the period of their partnership as it existed both under the written and oral agreements.

There being no bill of exceptions and no statement presented in this case, the appeal must be determined by what is disclosed in the judgment roll alone; and there being nothing of merit in appellant's contentions, and no reason having been suggested why the judgment of the trial court should not be affirmed, it is hereby ordered that the judgment of the trial court be and the same is hereby affirmed.

BROADY v. JENNINGS. (Civ. 4146.)

1. Prohibition ☞10(1)—Lies where court assumes to act without jurisdiction.

Where a court is about to enter upon the discharge of some function of which it has no jurisdiction, prohibition is the proper remedy.

2. Animals ☞49—County ordinance prohibiting running at large held not unconstitutional.

County ordinance prohibiting owners from permitting their animals to run at large held not in conflict with Const. art. 11, § 11, providing that any county, etc., may make such regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, in view of the Estray Act, restoring common-law rule requiring owners of animals to keep them from their neighbors' lands.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Petition by J. C. Broady for writ of prohibition against Lacy D. Jennings. From order denying writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Praul, of San Diego, for appellant.

Chester C. Kempley, Dist. Atty., and A. J. Lee, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court denying a writ of prohibition.

The substance of the facts underlying the matter appear to be that the board of supervisors of San Diego county duly passed an ordinance making it a misdemeanor "for the owner * * * of any domestic animal or animals to permit the same to run at large in or upon any land owned by * * * any person, * * * other than the owner of such animal or animals, unless the consent of the owner of such land and premises is first obtained," etc.

By a complaint filed in the justice court, one J. C. Broady (appellant herein) was charged with a violation of said ordinance. His demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, the justice caused the case to be set for trial. Thereupon said Broady applied to the superior court of San Diego county for a writ of prohibition directed to the said justice court and to Lacy D. Jennings, as justice of the peace (respondent herein), restraining and prohibiting said court and said justice from the trial of said action. The writ was denied, and thereupon this appeal was taken from such order.

[1] It is contended by respondent that prohibition will not lie for the reason that, assuming no jurisdiction in the justice court, defendant therein had the right of appeal to the superior court, and that such remedy was plain, speedy, and adequate. While the decisions of this state touching the question are not entirely harmonious, the weight of authority is that where a court is about to enter upon the discharge of some function of which the court has no jurisdiction, prohibition is the proper remedy. Terrill v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. Unrep. 398, 60 P. 38; Green v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 556; Arfsten v. Superior Court, 20 Cal. App. 269, 128 P. 949; People v. Palermo L. & W. Co., 4 Cal. App. 717, 89 P. 723; Ophir Silver Min. Co. v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 467, 82 P. 70, 3 Ann. Cas. 340.

[2] Appellant contends that the ordinance adopted by the board of supervisors is unconstitutional, in that it is in conflict with section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides that—

"Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

It is urged that the ordinance in question is in conflict with the "general laws." By the common law the owners of cattle were required to keep them confined "to their own close." But by early statutes of this state (Stats. 1850, p. 131; 1851, p. 299) such general law was abrogated; and it is upon such statutes and others of a similar character that appellant relies. In 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 636) a statute was enacted, known as the "Estray Act," which affects all the counties of the state with the exception of six counties of which San Diego is not one. By that act the common-law rule requiring the owner of animals to keep them from his neighbor's lands was restored as to all counties affected by the act. Montezuma Improvement Co. v. Simmerly, 181 Cal. 722, 189 P. 100; Moran v. Freeman, 48 Cal. App. 514, 192 P. 155; Huffman v. Coulter, 55 Cal. App. 173, 203 P. 125.

As is said in Montezuma Improvement Co. v. Simmerly, supra, the statute of 1915 "by the very force of its terms" repealed all "fence laws" in all the counties of this state excepting in the six counties specified in the act. By subdivision 14 of section 4041 of the Political Code, boards of supervisors are given power to " * * * fix the limits within which animals shall not run at large."

It thus appears that the board of supervisors of San Diego county, in adopting the ordinance in question, was acting within its powers, and that the superior court was right in denying petitioner's application for the writ.

The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by M. A. Careaga against Mary Theresa Moore, individually and as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Thomas W. Moore, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Richards, Heaney & Price, of Santa Barbara (A. C. Postel, of Santa Barbara, of counsel), for appellant.

Harry W. T. Ross, of Santa Barbara, Frank L. Rabe, of Los Angeles, and Wm. G. Griffith, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. The purpose of the action herein involved is to obtain a decree of court setting aside as fraudulent and void, first, a deed to certain real property comprising 268 acres of land, made by one Thomas W. Moore to his wife, Mary Theresa Moore, who is one of the defendants; secondly, a deed covering the same property, made by said Mary Theresa Moore to defendants Fox; thirdly, a mortgage likewise conveying the same property, executed by defendants Fox to Santa Barbara Trust & Savings Bank and assigned to the defendant Commercial Trust & Savings Bank; and, finally, to have said property declared a part of the assets of the estate of Thomas W. Moore, deceased, so that it may be used in payment of plaintiff's allowed claim of $12,209.25 against said estate.

The property in question was formerly a part of a much larger tract of land belonging to Thomas Hope, now deceased, and who was the father of defendant Mary Theresa Moore and her brother James C. Hope. On the death of Thomas Hope, defendant Mary Theresa Moore and James C. Hope each succeeded to an undivided one-twelfth interest in the estate of the father, Thomas Hope. On May 19, 1890, James C. Hope, who had succeeded to the title to the land here in question, conveyed it to Thomas W. Moore (husband of defendant Mary Theresa Moore) for a consideration of approximately $20,000, which consideration was wholly paid by defendant Mary Theresa Moore.

On July 17, 1894, Thomas W. Moore conveyed the property to Mary Theresa Moore, and thereafter, to wit, on June 17, 1897, following Mr. Moore's discharge in bankruptcy proceedings on the preceding day, Mrs. Moore reconveyed the property to Mr. Moore. Approximately nine months later, that is to say, on March 24, 1898, Mr. Moore again conveyed the property to Mrs. Moore. It is the last-named instrument which plaintiff here seeks primarily to have set aside.

On March 22, 1911, Thomas W. Moore and Mary Theresa Moore gave a mortgage on the property to the Central Bank of Santa Barbara to secure a loan and future advances, which mortgage was later foreclosed. On October 13, 1917, which was within the time allowed by law for the redemption of the property from the foreclosure sale, the property was redeemed by Mary Theresa Moore with money obtained by her from the sale of the property to defendants Basil Fox and Thomas Fox, who procured the money necessary for the purpose by remortgaging the property to the Santa Barbara Savings & Loan Bank, which is the predecessor in interest of the Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, one of the defendants herein. The deed given by Mrs. Moore to defendants Fox, and the mortgage given by defendants Fox to the Santa Barbara Savings & Loan Bank are also the subject of plaintiff's attack.

Plaintiff's cause of action is based upon a claim allowed him in the probate proceedings in the matter of the estate of Thomas W. Moore deceased, which claim arose from an alleged indebtedness created by Thomas W. Moore in favor of plaintiff in 1914, or approximately 16 years after the deed in question was given by said Moore to his wife, Mary Theresa Moore, defendant herein. The deed was not recorded until shortly before the death of Mr. Moore and not until after his indebtedness to plaintiff was incurred. The evidence, however shows that in extending credit to Mr. Moore, plaintiff placed no reliance in Moore's apparent record ownership of the property. Plaintiff testified, among other things: "I didn't make an investigation to see who owned the ranch. I was not interested in it."

On the trial of the action, among other facts, the court found that "it is not true that said Thomas W. Moore was in straitened circumstances or heavily or at all indebted at the time he executed said deed of grant to the defendant Mary Theresa Moore." The court further found that said defendant Mary Theresa Moore was without knowledge of any fraudulent intention of the said Thomas W. Moore in executing said deed and did not participate in any fraud, but accepted said deed in good faith, and that said deed was not made with the intention to injure or delay or defraud Moore's creditors. Furthermore, that the instrument of conveyance of said real property from Mary Theresa Moore to defendants Fox was not made or accepted by said defendants or by either of them with knowledge of the facts alleged in the complaint. Also, that it was not true that at the time of the execution of said last-mentioned conveyance said defendants Fox had actual or any knowledge of a certain action involving issues similar to those presented in the instant case, brought by George W. Southwick against Mary Theresa Moore, or of the fact that said conveyance from Moore to his wife was fraudulent, and that neither of said defendants knew of the pendency of said action brought by Southwick. In addition thereto, the court found that it was not true that at the time of the making or the delivery of the promissory note and mortgage from the defendants Fox to the Santa Barbara Savings & Loan Bank any officer of said bank had actual or any knowledge of the said action brought by said Southwick, or of the alleged fraudulent nature of the conveyance from Moore to his wife, or had actual or any knowledge that the conveyance from Mary Theresa Moore to the defendants Fox was made or accepted by said defendants with knowledge of the alleged fraudulent nature of said conveyance from said Thomas W. Moore. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, and it is from such judgment that the appeal herein is taken.

Appellant urges that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the court to which reference has been had that:

"It is not true that said Thomas W. Moore was in straitened circumstances or heavily or at all indebted at the time he executed said deed of grant to the defendant Mary Theresa Moore."

The bringing of the action was authorized by the provisions of section 1589 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is supplemented by the rule set forth in section 3439 of the Civil Code, and which declares in effect, among other things, that any transfer of property with intent to delay or defraud any creditor of his demand is void.

The complaint contains an allegation that "while said Thomas W. Moore was in straitened circumstances and heavily indebted said Thomas W. Moore, * * * without valuable consideration therefor and with intention to injure, delay and defraud his creditors and particularly this plaintiff, voluntarily conveyed to the defendant Mary Theresa Moore" the property in question.

For the purpose of sustaining such allegation of the complaint, certain evidence was introduced by plaintiff which tended to establish the fact that Thomas W. Moore was insolvent at the time he executed the deed of the property to defendant Mary Theresa Moore. The evidence to which attention has been directed is neither of the quantity nor quality which might be expected for the purpose of establishing so important a fact. One witness testified that subsequent to the transfer Mr. Moore had said that "he wanted to sell the ranch and hadn't been able to sell it, and wanted some money because he owed some money, and he wanted to pay his creditors." Other witnesses testified regarding certain alleged debts which were owing by Mr. Moore, but none of such witnesses was specific as to the time other than that it was in the years "1898 and 1899." There was, however, evidence that in 1896 the property in question had been sold to the state for delinquent payment of taxes and had not been redeemed until 1900; that about six months after the deed to Mrs. Moore was executed, Mr. Moore transferred certain leases to secure certain debts; that certain mortgages were executed by Mr. and Mrs. Moore on the property, some of them before and some of them after the date of the execution of the deed in question, and that during all such times Mr. Moore had no special business or occupation.

Considering such evidence, it is manifest that any person, however great his assets were, might be desirous of selling some property, or even all his property, if it were contained in one parcel and more salable or capable of inducing a higher price by reason of that fact, for the purpose of paying pressing debts, but which obligations in their entirety might be insignificant in amount as compared with the total value of his estate. It is likewise apparent that in these days when speculation is rife any man who is not extremely cautious or conservative may be led into making so-called "investments," with the result that to-day he may be in comfortable financial circumstances and within a week or a month hence may be utterly bankrupt. As is said in the similar case of Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 621, 28 P. 557, 558:

"In these pushing, busy times fluctuations in a man's financial condition are probably the general rule."

So that considering the fact that only nine months before the execution of the questioned deed Thomas W. Moore was discharged in bankruptcy proceedings, statements by witnesses made many years after the happening of the event, fixing the dates so loosely as "during the years 1898 and 1899" when Thomas W. Moore was "heavily indebted," are too speculative in their nature and leave too much room for conjecture. The fact that the taxes on the property were allowed to go delinquent in 1896 and not paid until 1900, while possibly indicating financial distress on the part of the owner of the property involved, is not conclusive; but, to the contrary, may be attributed to, and is readily explainable as, having occurred through mistake or oversight. With reference to the assignment of leases and the several mortgages given by the Moores on the property (some of which occurred before, and some after, the date of the deed in question), it need only be said that such transactions are at least of daily occurrence and are generally not thought necessarily to indicate financial difficulties to the extent of showing an intention to defraud creditors. The circumstance that Mr. Moore "had no special business or occupation," to say the least, is not a compelling reason for adjudging him guilty of fraud.

On the other hand, the evidence of Mr. Moore's lack of intention to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, if any, was also of a weak and unsatisfactory character. With relation thereto, Mrs. Moore testified in substance that, at the time the deed was made, she and her husband were living on the ranch; that she had invested money in blooded stock, and that Mr. Moore was looking after the business for her; that she did not hear him say whether he was indebted or not; that she knew he was solvent, explaining that she did not know that he owed any debts; and that he had income from the ranch in 1898. In part, she testified: "At that time I had money, but I don't know about Mr. Moore, because sometimes he would make sales and have money, and other times he would ask me for money." It also appeared in evidence that the property in question covered but 268 acres of land, but that in the month of March, 1898 (being the month and the year in which the deed in question was executed), Moore was assessed with 450 acres of the Hope ranch, besides furniture, wagons, harness, and horses—of what value, either as assessed or actual, not being disclosed—nor is there testimony as to the actual ownership of the property assessed.

[1] It thus appears that the total evidence regarding the pivotal point in the case was unreliable, not from a standpoint of lack of integrity in the several witnesses, but solely because of their failure to be specific or definite. The burden of establishing the fact rested upon plaintiff. The allegation contained in plaintiff's complaint, in substance that the conveyance was made by Moore "with the intention to injure, delay, and defraud his creditors," demanded that the evidence tending to establish that fact, or those facts, at least preponderate over the evidence or the presumption to the contrary. It is said in the case of Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 671, 42 P. 303, 305:

"If such a conveyance be made with intent to defraud creditors, it is void as against the creditors; but the intent is a question of fact, and must be averred and proved. A voluntary conveyance is not prima facie fraudulent, and a fraudulent intent is not to be arrived at as a presumption of law. Civ. Code, § 3442; Threlkel v. Scott, 89 Cal. 351, 26 Pac. 879; Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. 557; Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873."

[2-5] The allegation to which attention has been directed, if not involving criminal intent, is analogous thereto. The rule of the criminal law would forbid any presumption of guilt. To the contrary, at the outset the innocence of the act in question would be presumed and such presumption would continue until the guilty intent had been established beyond a reasonable doubt; and while the same degree of proof as to a criminal tendency would not prevail in a civil action grounded on fraud, the rule requiring that where fraud is alleged it must be clearly proven to the satisfaction of the court should obtain. In any event, in the instant case the effect and the value of the evidence was for determination by the judge of the trial court; and where the evidence is conflicting, the decision of the issue involved rests within the discretion and sound judgment of such judge and cannot be disturbed, except where it manifestly appears that such discretion has been abused. The question of the alleged fraudulent intent of Moore in making the conveyance not having been clearly shown by reason of his insolvency at or about the time the conveyance was made, or by reason of any other fact adduced in evidence, and there being some evidence, however slight, from which his solvency at such time might be inferred, it follows that the conclusion reached by the trial court that "it is not true that said Thomas W. Moore was in straitened circumstances or heavily or at all indebted at the time he executed said deed of grant to the defendant Mary Theresa Moore, * * * and that said deed was not made with the intention to injure or delay or defraud Moore's creditors," is supported by the evidence, and appellant's contention to the contrary cannot be sustained.

Certain other findings of the court are also attacked by appellant. They relate either to knowledge on the part of each of the several defendants of the alleged fraudulent intention of Thomas W. Moore in executing the deed to the property, or to knowledge or notice, actual or constructive of defendants Fox and Santa Barbara Trust & Savings Bank at the time or times when the deed and mortgage in which such defendants were interested were executed, of the pendency of a certain action involving issues similar in all respects to the issue raised in the instant case. The record contains substantial evidence to justify the court in its several conclusions with reference to each of such findings, and, as hereinbefore indicated, the findings of the trial court are conclusive. In addition thereto, assuming that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the main finding, which is determinative of the case, that no fraud was practiced by Thomas W. Moore in making the deed to Mary Theresa Moore, the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the other findings would become immaterial.

Other points for reversal, such as the estoppel of Mary Theresa Moore, the legal effect of the knowledge and notice of all the defendants regarding the alleged fraudulent nature of the conveyance in question, as well as constructive notice to several of them with reference thereto, as obtained from the pendency of the action referred to in the findings and to which attention has been directed, are all likewise dependent upon appellant's claim of error in the main finding by the court to the effect that Moore had no fraudulent intent in making the conveyance of the property to defendant Mary Theresa Moore. The legality of such finding having been determined as against appellant's contention in that regard, each and all of the several legal questions predicated upon a state of fact thus found to not exist are unnecessary of determination by this court.

It is contended by appellant that certain errors of law were committed by the trial court in the reception or the rejection of evidence and which errors prejudicially affected the decision of the case in favor of the defendants.

[6] The first alleged error has to do with the refusal of the court to permit evidence relative to an interpretation requested of a witness of the terms of a real estate business partnership agreement which had existed between the witness and Moore by which "sales, rentals, leases, or other transactions" respecting the property owned by either party to the agreement were to be excluded from the partnership business. The witness was asked the question: "Do you know what property the party of the first part (Moore) referred to in that agreement?" An objection that the question was "an attempt to vary a written instrument by parol" was sustained. Counsel for appellant admits that "the question may possibly have been vulnerable to objection on other grounds." Assuming that appellant's suggestion is correct (of which we entertain no doubt), no error was committed by the trial court in sustaining the objection. Spottiswood v. Weir, 80 Cal. 448, 22 P. 289; People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 261; Miller v. Van Tassel, 24 Cal. 459. In People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 261, 266, it is said:

"If the court decides correctly in rejecting the testimony, it is not important whether the best objection was made, or whether any objection was made."

[7] It is next urged that the court erred in denying plaintiff's motion to strike out certain testimony on the ground that it was not responsive to the question which had been asked. An examination of the record discloses the fact that the matter to which objection was made was a continuation of the answer of the witness to a previous question, in which answer the witness had been interrupted by a later question asked for the apparent purpose of explaining a part of the answer already made. In such circumstances appellant should not be heard to complain.

[8, 9] Appellant's final specification of error on the part of the court consists in the granting of a motion to strike out certain testimony. One of the attorneys representing the defendants had been called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff and had been asked certain questions regarding an option which he had given to purchase the property in question. His evidence showed that he had given the option in his individual capacity and without any authority to bind either or all of the defendants. It appeared, however, that in some other minor matters he had represented the defendants or some of them in dealing with the property. From such considerations, aside from the question of the materiality of the transaction (which is neither explained by counsel for appellant, nor apparent to this court), no sufficient foundation was laid for the introduction of any evidence relating to the option. Besides, even though the evidence had been permitted to remain in the case, it would not have affected the one vital question as to whether or not the deed from Thomas W. Moore to Mary Theresa Moore was made for the purpose of injuring, delaying, or defrauding the creditors of Thomas W. Moore. As a consequence, no error was committed by the court.

The judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Application by J. E. Birch for writ of mandate against J. W. Monroe, Auditor of Glenn County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, for appellant.

Duard F. Geis, of Willows, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from the judgment herein denying plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandate.

The plaintiff was a teacher in the Willows union school district during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. The board of trustees of the district issued to him an order for the payment of his last month's salary in the sum of $191.66, payable out of the teachers' salary fund. The county superintendent duly examined and approved the demand, but the defendant county auditor refused to allow the same. Plaintiff alleged that there was in the funds of the district "a sufficient sum not otherwise appropriated and which sums are applicable to the payment of the claim of your petitioner." The answer affirmatively alleges:

"That a balance in excess of $191.66 remains in the salary fund of the Willows union school district for the fiscal year 1921-22. That * * * said defendant has no means of knowing that all of the claims against said salary fund for said fiscal year have been met and extinguished, or that claims against said fund evidenced by requisitions drawn by the board of trustees of said school district, examined and approved by said superintendent of schools, do not remain outstanding and unpaid."

The court found that at the time of the demand upon the auditor there was in the teachers' salary fund of the district "for the year ending June 30, 1922, the sum of $1,424.84, and there was in said fund for the year ending June 30, 1923, the sum of $7.21, both of which funds were made up of the school moneys provided for the payment of teachers' salaries."

[1, 2] It seems clear that the foregoing affirmative allegation of the answer did not present any issue. Affirmative allegations should be made positively or on information and belief. The allegation here in question does not even state that the auditor believed that there were outstanding claims against the salary fund of the preceding year. It must be presumed that the auditor knew whether there were any such outstanding claims. The salary fund is made up of the money provided by the state and 60 per cent. of that provided by the county. Article 9, § 6, of the Constitution provides:

"The entire amount of money provided by the state, and not less than sixty per cent. of the amount of money provided by county, or city and county, school taxes shall be applied exclusively to the payment of public school teachers' salaries."

Section 1696 of the Political Code provides:

"Every teacher in the public school must: * * * Second. Before taking charge of a school, and one week before closing a term of school, notify the county superintendent of such fact, naming the day of opening or closing. * * * Sixth. Make an annual report to the county superintendent at the time and in the manner and on the blanks prescribed by the superintendent of public instruction. Any teacher who shall end any school term before the close of the school year, shall make a report to the county superintendent immediately after the close of such term; and any teacher who may be teaching any school at the end of the school year shall, in his or her annual report, include all statistics for the entire school year, notwithstanding any previous report for a part of the year. The superintendent of schools shall in no case draw a requisition for the salary of any teacher for the last month of the school term, until the report required by this subdivision has been filed, and by him approved."

Section 1543, subdivision 15, makes it the duty of the superintendent of schools "to preserve carefully all reports of school officers and teachers." Section 1700 provides:

"No warrant must be drawn in favor of any teacher, unless the officer whose duty it is to draw such warrant is satisfied that the teacher has faithfully performed all the duties prescribed in section sixteen hundred and ninety-six."

It is to be presumed that the auditor discharged the official duty required of him by section 1700, and if he did he knows whether the teachers employed during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, have been paid their salaries for that year. All trustees' orders for teachers' salaries—and they must pass through the auditor's hands—are required to state the monthly salaries of the teachers in whose favor they are drawn and the months for which such salaries are due. Section 1543, subd. 3. The auditor's own books must show what warrants have been drawn in favor of teachers and the amounts thereof. Since the teachers' salary fund can be used only for the payment of teachers' salaries and all the foregoing facts are presumptively within the knowledge of the auditor, his allegation that he has no means of knowing whether there are outstanding claims against that fund states no defense. It is true that the answer denies that there is a sufficient sum in the teachers' salary fund of the district not otherwise appropriated which is applicable to the payment of plaintiff's claim, but this is followed by the allegation that there is a balance in such salary fund of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, in excess of the amount of such claim, but that the "defendant has no means of knowing that all of the claims against said salary fund for said fiscal year have been met and extinguished." It is thus apparent from the answer, as well as from respondent's argument on appeal, that the only defense relied upon is that the defendant had no means of knowing whether there were outstanding claims against the fund of the previous year. The defense here relied upon is unlike that in the case of Bilby v. McKenzie, 112 Cal. 143, 44 P. 341, cited by respondent. In that case it was alleged in the answer and proved at the trial that there was an outstanding claim against the fund of the previous year, which was in litigation and which, if determined to be valid, would exhaust such fund.

Respondent's contention is based upon the provisions of article 11, § 18, of the Constitution, which provides:

"No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district, shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose."

[3] Respondent argues that, "as a corollary" to such inhibition, the balance in the fund of a preceding year cannot be used for any purpose other than the payment of liabilities incurred during that year until such liabilities have been extinguished; that the auditor has no means of knowing whether there are any such outstanding liabilities until the same have become barred by the statute of limitations; and that therefore the balance in such fund, except as to liabilities incurred during the year in which the fund was raised, must be held in cold storage for four years, until all possible claims of that year against the same are barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If this course were pursued, there would at all times remain in the treasury frozen balances of four fiscal years. Such a construction should not be given to the constitutional inhibition unless imperatively required. This constitutional provision has been held applicable only to contractual obligations. City of Long Beach v. Lisenby, 180 Cal. 52, 57, 179 P. 198. It is not to be presumed that public officers so inefficiently conduct the public business as to render it difficult or impracticable, on issues properly framed, to determine at any time the amount of outstanding contractual obligations. Particularly in a case such as this, where the fund in question is limited to one specified use and claims against the fund must be based upon contracts, the terms of which, as stated, are presumptively within the knowledge of the auditor, it would be a simple matter to establish whether or not there were any outstanding claims. There is no pretense that there are any such claims, but only that the auditor has no means of ascertaining whether there are any.

[4] Respondent contends that it was the duty of the superintendent of schools to transfer 80 per cent. of the balance in the funds of the previous year to the unapportioned county school fund. Section 1543, subd. 2, of the Political Code, provides:

"If at the beginning of any school year any school district shall have an unincumbered balance in its maintenance funds which combined with its total estimated income to be received for maintenance purposes from all sources other than district taxes during the current year shall exceed a sum of money sufficient to maintain and conduct the schools of the district during the current year, then the county superintendent of schools shall in the month of August of that school year transfer a sum of money from the maintenance funds of that district to the unapportioned school funds of the county, or city and county, equal to eighty per cent. of the excess estimated as herein provided."

The evidence shows that on the 1st day of July, 1922, there was a balance on hand in the maintenance funds, including the teachers' salary fund, of the district of $3,312.46. The estimated receipts from the state for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, amounted to $11,910, and from the county, $13,176, making a total of $28,398.46. The estimated outstanding indebtedness at the same time was the sum of $400. The estimated expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, amounted to $34,100, including payment of the outstanding indebtedness of $400. It was therefore necessary to levy a special tax amounting to $5,701.54. The estimated receipts of the teachers' salary fund, computed upon the foregoing sums, amounted to a total of $21,240.44, including the balance of $1,424.84. The estimated salaries of teachers, then employed for the year ending June 30, 1923, amounted to $23,500. In view of the foregoing, it is too clear to admit of controversy that the superintendent of schools was not authorized to transfer any part of the balance on hand on the 1st day of July, 1922, to the unapportioned county school fund. There was no excess of estimated receipts over disbursements to transfer.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment for plaintiff as prayed for by him.

In re SCOTT. (Motion No. 4743.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 23, 1925.)

Attorney and client — 10—Practice in sister state held insufficient for admission to bar.

That attorney in sister state had practiced for 1 year and 10 months, and then removed to California, whence he claimed to have continued his practice by correspondence, held not sufficient showing of actual practice for 3 out of 7 years preceding application for admission to bar, required by Code Civ. Proc. § 279, to entitle him to admission.

Application by John Gardner Scott for admission to the bar as attorney and counselor at law, after adverse recommendation of State Board of Bar Examiners. Petition denied.

Arthur Lasher, of Los Angeles, and John Gardner Scott, of Prescott, Ariz., for petitioner.

WORKS, J. On April 21, 1924, petitioner filed his application for admission to the bar; the application being grounded upon a former admission and practice in the state of Arizona. The state board of bar examiners, after due investigation, recommended that petitioner be not admitted, and he asks that we now order his admission, notwithstanding the adverse recommendation.

The only question to be determined is whether petitioner's case as shown by affidavits filed in his behalf, is within the provisions of section 279 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads, in part:

"Any citizen * * * who has been admitted to practice law in the highest court of a sister state, * * * and who, after such admission, has been engaged in actual practice of law in such state * * * for a period of at least three years within the period of seven years immediately preceding the filing of his application, may be admitted to practice in all the courts of this state, * * * upon the production of his license, and satisfactory evidence that his license has not * * * been revoked and * * * that he has been so engaged in actual practice in such state, * * * as above provided. * * *

Without question, petitioner was admitted to practice by the highest court of Arizona on November 6, 1920, and, equally without question, his license to practice in that state has never been revoked. Has he been engaged in the "actual practice" of law there, however, for "at least 3 years within the period of 7 years immediately preceding the filing of his application," on April 21, 1924, here?

At the date of his admission in Arizona petitioner was a resident of that state. He continued to live there until September 17, 1922, covering a period of a little more than 1 year and 10 months, when he came to California. Everything shown by him or on his behalf concerning his practice in Arizona is as follows: It is averred in an affidavit made by petitioner and on file in this proceeding that immediately after his admission in Arizona "he engaged in the practice of law and opened offices for such purpose * * * at Prescott, * * * Arizona, and ever since has continued to be a member in good standing of the bar of Arizona and as subject to the orders of the courts of said state"; that "ever since his said admission * * * he has held himself out as a practicing attorney of said state, and in the course of his practice as such, he appeared as attorney of record for plaintiffs, or defendants, in numerous cases before the superior court in and for Yavapai county, and in other courts of said state, and conducted the prosecution, or defense, thereof"; that "from the day of his admission until on or about the 17th day of September, 1922, he remained in person, within the state of Arizona, but that, at the time last mentioned, he came to California for the purpose and with the intent to organize a certain fraternal association," and that "he did organize such association"; that "affiant is retained by said association as its attorney for the state of Arizona, and also as its chief counsel, to supervise and control its legal department, and any litigation it may become interested in, in any state, or place, whatsoever"; and that "such legal matters in Arizona as needed his attention, affiant has attended to by correspondence for the reason that, in his (affiant's) opinion, such course was more practical and economical than to have made numerous trips between California and Arizona which would have been necessary under the existing circumstances had affiant done otherwise." In a second affidavit made by petitioner in this proceeding it is averred that "the principal intent and purpose of his coming to California" on September 17, 1922, was "that it was necessary to have a personal interview with a client who had moved to California, in connection with a certain litigation then pending in the superior court of Yavapai county, Ariz., * * * before taking any further action therein"; that "at the time of coming to California affiant fully intended to, and in a short time, return to Arizona, has retained his law offices there and held himself ready so to do should the interests of his clients demand his personal presence"; that "before being admitted to practice in Arizona, affiant became interested in a corporation, * * * that after being admitted he did the legal work of said corporation and appeared as attorney of record in one or two cases therefor, but that said law work was the only such work in which he had an interest personal to himself; that affiant cannot recall all the work he did, during this time, in the course of his practice, but says that in the course he secured the acquittal of a young man charged with forgery upon trial; * * * that a client having been fined by the recorder's court upon a misdemeanor charge, he appealed and secured a verdict of not guilty before a jury in the superior court; that he foreclosed a mechanic's lien, probated an estate, foreclosed a mortgage, secured judgment against a bank in damages, secured a dismissal in a United States case"; and that, "after being admitted to practice law in Arizona, and those courts of the United States to which he is admitted [for he has a license to practice in the United States courts], he has at all times held himself out, as a practicing attorney of said courts, duly empowered and authorized to practice in said several courts." An Arizona trial judge writes a letter dated March 21, 1924, in which he says that petitioner "is a practicing attorney at the bar of this court, and has tried numerous cases before the writer as presiding judge." An affidavit of a practicing lawyer of Arizona contains the statement that petitioner "is an attorney at law, and has been a duly authorized attorney at law in the state of Arizona since November 6, 1920, and that he has been practicing in the town of Prescott, state of Arizona, since that date." An affidavit made by an individual at Prescott, Ariz., contains an averment that petitioner "has continuously had law offices in * * * Prescott, Ariz., from November 6, 1920, to [August 2, 1924], and that I have received law opinions from him in the last several months mailed to me here in Prescott, Ariz."

We can perceive in the record no showing that petitioner has engaged in the "actual practice" of law in Arizona, as that term is employed in our statute, since September, 1922, when he came to California, if we grant that his showing is sufficient as to such "actual practice" during the year and 10 months of his residence in Arizona after his admission there. His holding himself out as an Arizona lawyer and his maintenance of an office in that state since he has been in California amount, in our view, is no evidence that he "has been engaged" in practice in the sister state. There are general statements in one or two of the affidavits made by others than himself which might in some degree be helpful to him were it not for the showing made by the affidavits signed by himself. These latter affidavits apparently convey the idea that he has never been in Arizona since September, 1922. Certainly they do not show affirmatively that he has ever been there since that date. The showing as to his practice by mail, granting for the sake of argument that it can be considered as all, amounts in substance to nothing. On the whole, the showing as to an "actual practice" in Arizona since September, 1922, is negligible to the extent that it is practically imaginary.

Petition denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Michael Degnen was convicted of assault and of attempt to commit rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

Le Compte Davis, Wm. M. Bowen, and McDonald & Thompson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was tried under an indictment in two counts. The first count, shortened by the omission of mere formal statements, reads that defendant "is accused * * * of a felony, to wit, assault with intent to murder, committed at and in the county of Los Angeles * * * as follows, to wit: That, on or about the 30th day of July, 1923, * * * the said defendant did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously and with malice aforethought by means of a certain deadly weapon, to wit, a certain cord capable of strangling and killing, and with his hands, feet, and body, make an assault upon the person of" the complaining witness, "with the intent then and there, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought, to kill and murder the said" complaining witness. The second count, similarly shortened, is to the effect that defendant, "for a further and separate cause of action, being a different offense of the same class of crimes and offenses as that set forth in count 1 hereof, * * * is accused * * * of a felony, to wit, rape, committed at and in" the same county " * * * as follows, to wit: That on or about" the same date " * * * the said defendant did then and there, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, and with force and violence have and accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with and upon the" complaining witness, "without the consent and against the will of the" complaining witness, "and she, the" complaining witness, " * * * then and there resisted the accomplishment of such act of sexual intercourse." Under the first count of the indictment defendant was convicted of an assault. Under the second count he was convicted of an attempt to commit rape. Defendant appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant contends that the trial court erred in overruling his demurrer to the indictment. One of the grounds of demurrer was that "more than one offense is attempted to be charged in the said indictment, except as provided in section 954 of the Penal Code, * * * in this, * * * that the said indictment charges, or attempts to charge, two different offenses which do not appear from the said indictment to be connected together in their commission, and which do not appear from the said indictment to be different statements of the same offense, and which appear from the said indictment not to be different offenses of the same class of crimes." Section 954, so far as it is material to the points presented under the demurrer, reads:

"The indictment or information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts. * * *"

[1-3] The integrity of the indictment is sought to be upheld under that portion of section 954 which allows the setting up in separate counts of "different statements of the same offense," but the effort is based upon the evidence in the cause, instead of upon the face of the pleading, to which alone we may look in determining its effect when tested by the demurrer. We search the indictment in vain for any language which indicates that the pleader attempted by it to state two versions of the same occurrence. Under the allegations of the pleading the events stated in the two counts may well have been far apart, both as to time and place. They may have occurred at opposite ends of the twenty-four hours constituting the day mentioned in each count, and, by force of that fact, they may have transpired at opposite corners of the county named in each count. Some time after section 954 was first put into a shape similar to its present form an information was before the court in which it was alleged in a second count that the defendant committed the offense therein denounced "as a part of the same act, transaction or event alleged in the first count" (People v. Piner, 11 Cal. App. 542, 105 P. 780), the pleader who framed the information thus apparently evincing a correct understanding of the import of the section. In truth, under an earlier form of the enactment which allowed a statement of the same offense "in different forms under different counts," the Supreme Court had positively decided that "this must be done in such a way as to show clearly upon the face of the indictment or information that the matters and things set forth in the different counts are descriptive of one and the same offense." People v. Garcia, 58 Cal. 102. In another case, decided when section 954 stood somewhat as it does at present, an information was before the court in which it was alleged in a second count, as appears from parts of the record not referred to in the report, but which we have examined, that the offense in that count denounced was "a second, separate, and different statement of the same act, transaction, and event" mentioned in a first count. The court said: "Both counts in stating the offense with which defendant was charged related to and were predicated upon the same act and transaction, and, hence, the information was not subject to demurrer upon the ground" that it stated more than one offense (People v. Danford, 14 Cal. App. 442, 112 P. 474), leaving it logically to be inferred that the pleading would have been demurrable had it not contained the quoted allegation. It was said in a later case that in "charging under this section [954] it is of course necessary that care be taken to make it clearly appear that the offense set forth relates to but one act, transaction or event." People v. Miles, 19 Cal. App. 223, 125 P. 250. Finally, it was said by the Supreme Court:

"Where it is sought to charge in one indictment or information different offenses all relating to the same act, transaction, or event, as is now permitted by section 954 of the Penal Code, we are of the opinion that, under our practice where one of the grounds of demurrer provided by law is that more than one offense is charged except as provided in section 954 (Pen. Code, § 1004, subd. 3), the pleading should fairly show on its face that the offenses so charged do all relate to the same act, transaction, or event" (People v. Plath, 166 Cal. 227).

The transmutations in the form of section 954 have not been such as to render these cases now inapplicable in principle. We are satisfied that the indictment now before us cannot be upheld as showing in separate counts "different statements of the same offense."

We are equally convinced of the failure of the indictment when tested by that part of section 954 which allows a statement of "two or more different offenses connected together in their commission." The cases cited in the last preceding paragraph are surely authority for the statement that an indictment based upon the clause just quoted must show upon its face that the various crimes charged in its several counts were coincident or connected in their perpetration. In the present instance the possibility of such a connection is left entirely to the imagination.

[4, 5] We turn, then, to the clause of the section which permits a statement in separate counts of "two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses." Notwithstanding the attempt of the Attorney General to sustain the indictment under another clause of the statute, it is evident that he who draughted the pleading intended it to stand under the language of the section which has just been quoted. He says in his pleading that the crime denounced in the second count is "a different offense of the same class of crimes and offenses as that set forth" in the first count. Can the indictment be upheld upon the score thus selected by the pleader? We think it can. True, it may appear at first glance that assault with intent to murder and rape cannot belong to the same class, whatever scheme of classification the Legislature may have had in mind when the present section 954 was enacted. A closer scrutiny, however, creates doubts as to the validity of this appearance. The crime first mentioned is an assault, and every rape not only originates in, but itself includes, an assault. Then, the Supreme Court, in People v. Jailles, 146 Cal. 301, 79 P. 965, when dealing with another phase of section 954, has justified a close inspection of the indictment before us in order, unrestricted by too close rules of interpretation, to ascertain the intent and purpose of its draughtsman as conveyed to appellant. In that case the pleader had joined a count upon rape by force and violence with one upon rape because of the nonage of the victim; both acts being alleged to have been committed upon the same day and upon the person of the same female. The court said:

"It must be conceded that it would be preferable for the pleader endeavoring to set forth one offense in different forms under different counts to expressly state in the information that the matters and things so set forth are descriptive of one and the same offense. Such a statement would obviate all question as to the intention of the pleader. We think, however, that, despite the absence of such a statement in the information before us, it is manifest that it was sought to charge but one offense—viz., one rape committed on Maria Tampo on May 10, 1903. The nature of the allegations in the two counts shows this very clearly. The only difference between the allegations of the two counts is that force, violence, and resistance are alleged in one without allegation as to age, while in the other is the allegation as to age without any allegation as to force, violence, and resistance. The allegations of each show the offense of rape, committed on the same person on the same day, and indicate that the district attorney was simply endeavoring to set forth the same transaction in different ways. * * *

This conclusion as to the effect of the information against Jailles, although it had to do primarily with the element of time, an element with which we are not here greatly concerned, inspires these views concerning the indictment now in question: It is alleged in the first count that the attempt to murder was essayed by means of a certain cord used for the purpose of causing death by strangulation. The second count opens with the allegation that the crime about to be charged therein was of the same class with the one charged in the first count; this significant language being followed by a charge of rape with force and violence. Taking the entire pleading together, why may it not be said that appellant was sufficiently notified by it that the two crimes, each involving an assault, as it did, were attempted to be committed by the same or similar means—a means specifically described in the first count but not described in the second—a means through which, in the one instance, appellant sought to deprive the complaining witness of her life, while in the other he actually deprived her of her virtue? We think it may. It appears to us, on the whole, that the indictment, when considered under the clause of section 954 now under consideration, was not obnoxious to the demurrer. As it alleged two offenses, both in the nature of assaults, as having been committed on the same day, in the same county, and upon the body of the same person, we think the section was satisfied. The only cases we have found which bear upon the portion of the section relating to offenses of the same class are People v. Murnahan, 32 Cal. App. 211, 162 P. 422; People v. MacDonald, 53 Cal. App. 488, 200 P. 491, and People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 237, 205 P. 435, 24 A. L. R. 1383. They have not been of material assistance, however, in determining the present question.

[6] Appellant argues with great vigor that his conviction of the lesser charge of an assault under the first count was tantamount to an acquittal of the charge embraced in the second count, and, more especially, of the charge of which he was actually convicted under the second count. This point is made, of course, from the basis upon which respective counsel have argued the question arising upon the demurrer to the indictment. As that pleading cannot be upheld as containing different statements of the same offense, but only as an attempt to plead separately committed crimes of the same class, it is possible that we might justify ourselves in a disposition of the present point upon that consideration. We have concluded, however, to determine the point now under discussion from the standpoint of the evidence, not from that of the indictment, as the evidence indisputably shows that appellant was convicted of two crimes which either arose from the same transactions or events or which were connected in their commission. This state of the evidence is so plain that the remark cannot be forborne that the draughtsman of the indictment must not have made it a statement of separate crimes of the same class. We take up, then, the point made by appellant. The contention that his conviction of the lesser offense was an acquittal of the greater is predicated of several decisions. These are, mentioning only California cases, People v. Ny Sam Chung, 94 Cal. 304, 29 P. 642, 28 Am. St. Rep. 129; People v. Defoor, 100 Cal. 150, 34 P. 642; and People v. McDaniels, 137 Cal. 192, 69 P. 1006, 59 L. R. A. 578, 92 Am. St. Rep. 81. Authorities from other jurisdictions are also relied upon, but, as they are to the same import as the cases decided by our own courts, it will not be necessary further specifically to mention them. The cases upon which appellant places reliance are all to the effect that, when a defendant has been acquitted or convicted of a particular offense, and he is subsequently and in another trial attempted to be prosecuted for another offense against the same property right or against the same person, both offenses arising upon the same facts and one being or constituting a necessary element in the other, the second prosecution must fail for the reason that the defendant has been once in jeopardy. In a case of that character it is not incorrect to say that the jeopardy of the defendant at the first trial substantially amounts to an acquittal of the offense for which it is sought to try him at the second, but this is not such a case. Here defendant was tried at one and the same time and upon the same evidence under both of the charges against him, and the verdict as to each offense was returned at the same time. Appellant's point is apparently made to depend upon the fact that the verdict finding him guilty of an assault was read by the clerk, after the two were handed to him by the foreman of the jury, before the reading of the verdict finding him guilty of an attempt to commit rape, but this circumstance surely cannot make available the cases cited by him. One of the verdicts must necessarily have been read by the clerk before the other was read, just as the first word of each verdict must have been read before its last word. Doubtless the verdicts were read as they were for the reason that the one first read was responsive to the first count of the indictment, while the one last read responded to the second. This was the logical course for the clerk to take in the reading, but the reading in that order, or, in fact, a reading in what may be termed an inverse order, cannot change the indubitable fact that there was but one trial, with two verdicts rendered at the same time pursuant to the trial.

pellant is thus seen to be utterly devoid of merit. Whether one of the verdicts must fall on the ground that one of the offenses of which appellant was found guilty is included within the other, both having been found after one trial and at the same time, granting that one offense is included within the other, is a question not specifically presented. It is probable, however, that we should consider that the point is sufficiently made, within the broad lines of appellant's argument, that the verdict under the second count, finding appellant guilty on the more serious charge, should fall under the circumstances which actually exist in the cause. This specific point is also without merit. Although section 954 of the Penal Code allows the joinder in one indictment of two or more charges under different counts, where the defendant by his one act or through one transaction violates two or more sections of that Code, and permits as many verdicts as there are counts, it is possible that the accused is punishable upon but one of the charges, under the provisions of section 654 of that Code. By this it is not meant, however, that, where, as here, a defendant is convicted upon two charges made under section 954, he is to be punished only for the commission of the lesser offense of which he is found guilty. It was said in a quotation found in People v. Defoor, supra, a case, it will be remembered, in which a second separate prosecution against the defendant was attempted, "the prosecutor may carve as large an offense out of it [a single transaction] as he can, but it is said 'he must cut only once.'" If we grant without deciding that, because of section 954, no punishment may be imposed under one of the verdicts in the present case, and that a jury, like a prosecutor, can cut effectively but once when it carves out of the facts of a single transaction, it must be true that, like the prosecutor again, the jury may carve as large an offense as it can. It seems obvious that, if appellant must go unpunished under either of the verdicts, it must be under the one finding him guilty of the lesser offense, not the one convicting him of the greater. We do not decide, however, that either verdict must fall, for the reason that, as we shall now point out, we are of the opinion that both were erroneously arrived at.

The trial judge limited counsel for appellant in his cross-examination of the complaining witness, and appellant contends that the barrier thus supervened was so injurious to his substantial rights that a reversal must follow from the action of the judge in erecting it. It is also insisted that the judge was guilty of prejudicial conduct in certain remarks which he made in the presence of the jury, in connection with the rulings by means of which he limited the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness. The two points may well be considered together.

The prosecuting witness, a married woman living apart from her husband, and whom we shall henceforth designate as E. C., had known appellant for a period of nearly four months preceding the happening of the events upon which the indictment was based. He had frequently visited her at her home, and had often driven her about in his car. He had an office or laboratory in a certain business building, and E. C. had gone with him to that place in the evenings, sometimes as often as three or four times each week, where, as she herself testified, she often spent several hours with him. On these occasions, she said, she witnessed the conduct by him of certain laboratory experiments in which she, a woman of considerable mental endowment, judging from the evidence, was much interested. The residence of E. C. was in that part of Los Angeles known as Hollywood, while appellant's laboratory was in the business portion of the city proper. In their joint excursions into the field of experimentation E. C. and appellant became desirous of subjecting a photographic camera to certain tests, and they determined, according to E. C., that these tests could best be made at San Diego. They accordingly arranged a trip thither. E. C. says it was planned that she should go to San Diego by railroad train, and that appellant should proceed to that city in his automobile, that they should meet there, and that they should also be met by a married couple who were to act as chaperons during the trip for the benefit of E. C. The latter says that the journey was taken as contemplated, but that when she met appellant in the lobby of a hotel at San Diego he informed her that through some misunderstanding the married couple would not be able to enact the roles assigned to them in the preparations made for the sojourn in the southern city. E. C. says that she was dissatisfied with this outcome, and insisted upon returning immediately to Los Angeles. Appellant then offered to drive her to that city. She accepted the offer, and the return journey was commenced in the manner indicated. However, according to E. C., appellant became ill before La Jolla was reached, so ill that they both agreed that the journey could not at once be completed, and they stopped at the Cabrillo Hotel at La Jolla to await the recovery of appellant. They remained at the hotel that night. At noon the next day appellant told E. C. that he had received a telephone message from the married couple to the effect that they would arrive in San Diego from Los Angeles on the evening train of that day. E. C. and appellant accordingly remained at La Jolla a second night, and drove to San Diego the next morning. Their friends were again not in evidence, and E. C. says she told appellant the situation looked strange, and insisted upon driving at once to Los Angeles. The journey was undertaken, and the two reached Los Angeles that evening. E. C. testified that her railroad trip to

San Diego was on a given Saturday, and that she and appellant reached Los Angeles on the return trip on the following Monday. It is to be understood that in narrating the events of the San Diego trip we have stated the version of E. C. throughout. Considering now for a moment the facts more immediately touching the charge against appellant, the alleged crimes having been committed in E. C.'s residence at Hollywood, E. C. testified that she and appellant had never indulged together in the sexual relation; that she resisted his attack upon her on the date named in the indictment; and that she succeeded in preventing the accomplishment by him of the final act which it was his purpose to perform.

A consideration of the two points presented by appellant involves the necessity of making copious quotation from the record. When the direct examination of E. C. was about to be concluded an argument took place, but no showing is made by the record as to what precipitated it. At the conclusion of the argument the trial judge said in the presence of the jury:

"I am familiar with the cases; they relate entirely to alleged immorality by the prosecuting witness occurring prior. * * * If it was a case where there was consent, the consent becomes material. Supposing the defense should be that the defendant did not do it and was not there at all, and, of course, inquiry into the moral character of the prosecutrix would be absolutely futile and immaterial from every standpoint; and the court is going to permit you to inquire point-blank as to any claimed immorality you may claim existed prior to that time between the defendant and this witness, or, for that matter, any other witness, but it will have to confine itself to a short inquiry because we are not trying the witness, we are trying the defendant as to what took place on a certain date. * * * You are not getting anywhere in this trial by going into evidence going into everything that every person did in their whole life and all those matters. As I understand the decisions they relate point-blank to the proposition that it would tend to prove a consent if there are previous immoralities of the prosecutrix, and that is all. If there are any alleged immoralities, the court will permit you until it appears to the court to be entirely immaterial to inquire whether there was such immorality, but I am not going to inquire into the proposition of where people went, whether they went by stage or rail or some other way, and where they stayed and what they said on the way and all those things. This case has to be cut shorter than that. It is entirely improper to get outside of the main case which concerns what happened on a certain evening in Hollywood."

After a few questions addressed to E. C. on further direct examination, the cross-examination then proceeded. It appeared that a friend of E. C.'s had asked permission to bring appellant to her home, and it was in this manner that the meeting of the two came about. It was the custom of E. C. to deliver lectures at her home frequently in the evenings, and on one of these occasions, on April 6, 1923, appellant first appeared at her place of residence with the friend. On the next Sunday evening succeeding that date appellant called upon E. C. at her home and some days afterward—she testified she could not say whether it was as much as a week later or whether it was not—she made the first visit to his laboratory. With this preface we quote from the record:

"Q. By Mr. Davis [counsel for appellant]: I will ask you this— * * * you say you went to the laboratory to perform some work. State what was done, any work that took you three hours to do or any longer time.

"Mr. Burke: Objected to, not material to the issues in this case.

"The Court: Sustained.

"Q. * * * Isn't it a fact that you went there and stayed with Mr. Degnen until about a quarter after 1 o'clock, and that there was no experiment of any kind conducted by you or him at that time? A. That is not true.

"Q. Well, then, please tell us what the experiment was."

Upon objection being made to this question the following occurred:

"Mr. Davis: I think we have a right to go into that.

"The Court: No;—in regard to previous actions that relate to some cleancut immoral nature or— All others are entirely immaterial, and we are not going to investigate.

"Mr. Davis: Except to get at what she says was done at that time. This testimony was all introduced for the purpose of showing one thing—we realize that as between these two people—

"The Court: I do not care what you realize, unless they amount to immorality. You can ask anything of immorality, and I will permit that, but we are not going over her whole life. * * * It is utterly out of the question to attempt to go into everything that has happened between these people during an acquaintance of two or three years— * * * If you think and believe it is going to be material to prove that an act of adulterous intercourse took place on this occasion mentioned in the information, that it was with the consent of the prosecuting witness, you have a right to show previous acts of immorality, but if it did not turn out that way, the question of consent is not material, of course. As soon as that time arises, the court would cut off any further inquiry, but the court would not anticipate your defense, and will assume, if any situation is going to arise which would permit the introduction of testimony of that kind and therefore allow you to ask whether or not she has been guilty of any immoral act with the defendant, and possibly even beyond that, but the court is not going to go over in detail everything that has been said and done with this witness in her whole life, with the defendant or anybody else.

"Mr. Davis: I am not going to go over the lady's life—I want that portion of her life that she has given to the jury—I want this because everybody, and yourself and all of us, must realize that this man is charged with two of the most serious offenses known to the law, * * * and I must rely upon circumstances to establish his defense, or upon the breaking down of her testimony by showing it was improbable in this instance. The very largest latitude is allowed, and * * * we will ask your honor, in view of the seriousness of this charge, in view of the jeopardy in which this defendant now stands * * * to give us an opportunity to lay before your honor authorities upon that subject, and in order that it might not come before the jury we would ask that they be sent out until this matter can be heard. Your honor must realize that this man's liberty is worth something, his reputation is worth something. * * * We will take only a short time. * * * It is going to arise and going to be more insistently urged on our part when it comes to this matter your honor is speaking of, with reference to the San Diego trip. It is of most vital importance, and around it hinges the circumstances upon which we hope to establish the innocence of this man. * * *

"The Court: It makes no difference if she might be guilty of some immorality, much less would it be material if she was given to some indiscretion, or if she did something some more prudent woman would not have done—but here is the case—we are trying the proposition of an alleged rape and assault with intent to commit murder that occurred on a certain day. There must be an end to all things, and we cannot go into everything in the world. I desire to be fair with the defendant and give him every opportunity, but you must remember there is a reason why the law does not permit a person to be cross-examined with respect to many things, and the reason is this: In the first place no one's memory is perfect, and no witness can be presumed to remember with precision everything that has happened in his or her life, so that it is utterly impossible. If you should cross-examine a witness over her entire life or over years of her life and not find some point where her memory would be bad, you would say she is not telling the truth and committing perjury; the law does not permit that inference, her recollection is supposed to be connected with respect to things material, and she is supposed to be able to correctly remember them and to testify to them, but you cannot go into a great mass of conversation covering years—it is unreasonable as to the witness and unreasonable as to the court and to the public, who have a right to expect there will be a reasonable dispatch of business; if it arises in the course of the case that the intercourse between the plaintiff and defendant upon the night in question was with her consent and not as a result of force, then the defendant is permitted to show by any competent testimony that the woman in the case is an immoral woman, solely for the reason of showing the probability it was with her consent. That is the only element in the case upon which any question can be raised as to previous conduct of the prosecuting witness. If it is not for that one thing, the testimony would be limited absolutely to what took place that night, and the corroboration, if any. It is for that reason, I say, we are absolutely precluded, both by common sense and by the law, from going into details, into every conversation which ever took place between these people months before, perhaps years before—both for the reason that it was improbable, that being immaterial that it was implanted on her memory at the time, and therefore not proper to expect a person to remember, and would therefore not be valuable for the purpose of cross-examination to test her recollection or truthfulness. If anything arises, a serious question as to whether or not the intercourse had upon that occasion was by the consent of the prosecuting witness, then for the first time there will arise the query as to whether her past character was or was not such as to warrant the inference she consented to it, and with respect to that we cannot try every instance it is claimed there was some immoral act. We can only touch upon it lightly. The principal case, we must stay with that, and cling tightly to that as possible, only touching upon the other issues quickly and to the extent that it is important to find out whether true or false, if there was some immorality, and this question of conversation is bound to be futile, unless there was some immoral act. It is only to find if there was some adulterous intercourse prior to that time that will raise the consent upon the occasion in question.

"Mr. Davis: * * * I have recently looked up this matter, and your honor's theory that you cannot show other acts of adultery or other acts of sexual intercourse except where the party admits that he was guilty of the act he was charged with and says it was with the consent, we have the authorities in abundance that a man who is charged with sexual intercourse upon a minor under age, and he stands denying it every minute, we can show that the court says that the prosecution may show that at various other times prior to that time he had sexual intercourse with that girl. He may, because it is material to show, he may show that she did.

"The Court: I admit that you can show that.

"Mr. Davis: It is not with consent, because consent did not avail him anything. It does not have to be shown that he had sexual intercourse with her consent, but it goes down to the jury that she must establish it beyond a reasonable doubt before we are entitled to put in any evidence, or before we are called upon to put in any testimony, and the jury are entitled to have all the circumstances leading up to this alleged act before them, and to determine before they hear one word from him as to whether or not her story is the truth, and whether or not there was any such thing as that occurred. Now, that is what I am trying to get. * * *

"The Court: I agree with you entirely on that. The only question is, I am not going to permit every little episode in their lives to be threshed out separately. If there is any time you can bring to the attention of this witness where you claim she was guilty of some immoral act with the defendant, with somebody else—

"Mr. Davis: It must be apparent to your honor that she would not say that she was; it must be apparent * * * if I ask her and she said no, I am bound and I could not put on a witness to disprove it. Then where is your honor placing me at this moment?

"The Court: No. I don't say that is correct. I say it might subsequently arise it is immaterial, and that is where you are taking your chance.

"Mr. Davis: I am taking no chances. * * * I am not going to be driven into the direct question, 'Was any immoral act committed,' and she says, 'No.' * * *

"The Court: You are not bound by it, but it might be immaterial. I am not going to try every incident in their life. If there is any particular act of immorality you want to bring out I will permit you to bring it out.

"Mr. Davis: We cannot bring it out by asking her the single question if that is so.

"The Court: That means you can go inquiring along all her life to see if you can find something.

"Mr. Davis: I do not want to take her over any territory Mr. Burke [the deputy district attorney] did not take her over in placing her story before this jury. * * *

"The Court: What was the last question, Mr. Reporter? (Question read.)

"Mr. Davis: She detailed to the jury all that occurred in that laboratory at that time, and we want to show that nothing of that kind occurred, and I was cross-examining her to find out if anything she said did occur there, and to find out I asked her, and I ask you now what it was, to detail to this jury what those experiments were, what they consisted of.

"The Court: Objection sustained. I don't care what they were.

"Mr. Davis: I have forgotten, and I beg your honor's pardon, if I may transgress your rules, but I want to keep the record straight in this case, and I will ask this question: Q. Tell us the conversation then that occurred there that first night during the hours that you were there between you and Mr. Degnen?

"Mr. Burke: That is objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, not bearing upon any issue.

"The Court: If there is anything you remember you have not related to the jury you may state it. A. There is no—

"Mr. Davis: Your honor, on cross-examination are we compelled simply to let her restate what she said on direct examination? That is not the rule of cross-examination as I understand it.

"The Court: No, but it is there once and it is not necessary to say, 'Have you testified so and so, or this, that, and the other?' We will never get anywhere with that. You say you don't remember anything else? A. No, sir; there is nothing I have not already stated.

"The Court: That is enough for that.

"Q. By Mr. Davis: You stated, Mrs. Witness, you and Mr. Degnen were down there, and you took notes? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, where are your notes? A. I have some. Some of them are in Mr. Degnen's handwriting at home, and if necessary I can produce them. * * *

"Q. And didn't Mr. Degnen take some notes himself? A. If he did, I really don't know, because you must understand that it was not an exchange of knowledge at that time; Mr. Degnen acted in the position of my preceptor; he was teaching me.

"Q. Then I would like to know what he taught you that night.

"Mr. Burke: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

"Q. By Mr. Davis: Tell us what he taught you at that time?

"The Court: Objection is sustained. * * *

"Q. Now, how long was it before you saw Mr. Degnen again? A. I don't remember. I have already stated that I gave up about an average of three or four evenings a week for the laboratory work. * * *

"Q. Now, can you tell us, and will you tell us anything that occurred between you and Mr. Degnen at any time after that first visit to his laboratory, at his laboratory when you and he were there?

"Mr. Burke: If your honor please, that covers a good deal of territory.

"The Court: There are about 15 or 20 pages of what occurred in the laboratory already of record.

"Mr. Davis: I know, your honor, but it has been held * * * on cross-examination you can ask a witness to go into exactly the same statements in order to see if she tells the same facts.

"The Court: Certainly, with respect to the material things. If you want her to repeat what occurred at the house, I will permit her to repeat them, but it is going a long ways to say we are going to fill this record up with such matters which amount to nothing, that are immaterial in the case, and which will be stricken out on motion.

"Mr. Davis: I take an exception as to the statement of the court that these were such matters that amounted to nothing, and assign the statement of the court as error, and I ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it entirely.

"The Court: The court will instruct the jury both here and there with respect to anything that took place at her house or at his laboratory, unless they amounted to immorality, they are immaterial to the case.

"Mr. Davis: I take an exception to that statement of the court and assign it as error, and ask that the court instruct the jury to disregard it.

"The Court: All right. Go on with the case.

"Mr. Davis: You mean all right, you will instruct the jury to do so, or it is all right for me to take an exception?

"The Court: Proceed. Of course, there is an exception to that. There was certain evidence with respect to certain things that has a certain relevancy to the case. What I mean is, certain matters which do not lead up to this particular offense.

"Mr. Davis: But may I have a ruling on my motion?

"The Court: Your motion is denied.

"Mr. Davis: I don't like to have a motion and have your honor say, 'You have an exception to my statements to the jury,' because you can see where I stand and where the defendant stands. We ask your honor to make a clear-cut ruling in these matters, so that we may have the advantage of it.

"The Court: The motion is denied. * * *

"Mr. Davis: Then, as I understand it, they are instructed to disregard all that testimony as immaterial, or all the testimony with reference to anything except the day of the incident, is that it?

"The Court: No; no. There are certain things which led up to this proposition which are material, but nothing is material which does not tend to show some affection by the defendant towards the witness, or some desire to satisfy his lust upon her in some way, or something of that sort, to show a desire for intercourse upon his part; if anything does not lead up to that, it was immaterial in the first place.

"Mr. Davis: Well, again, I take an exception, to the statement of the court and assign it as error, and ask that the court strike it out from the consideration of the jury, that last statement particularly.

"The Court: Objection overruled. Motion denied. Proceed with your case."

The record then shows several pages of cross-examination, during which the witness testified that appellant had proposed marriage to her at his place of residence, whither she had gone with him. This proposal was said to have been made after the two had been together at appellant's laboratory at night on various occasions. The following then appears:

"Q. Will you tell us what your experiments were between the time when you first met him [at the laboratory] * * * and the time you say he proposed marriage to you?

"Mr. Burke: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial. * * *

"The Court: Objection is sustained."

Appellant resided in a home which was also occupied by a Mr. and Mrs. C. It is shown by the record how E. C. happened to be there on the occasion when appellant proposed marriage to her. E. C. testified that she was at the laboratory one evening working late; that when she got to her home she discovered that in changing her dress she had not put her key in her purse; that appellant suggested her going to a hotel, but that she said she would not, for the reason that the type of hotel that would take her at that hour without baggage was not the character of hotel she would spend the night in; that appellant then suggested her going to his home; and that she was acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. C., having been entertained by them. She accordingly accepted appellant's suggestion. She testified that Mrs. C. made up a divan in the living room for her, which opened off Mrs. C.'s room; that at her request Mr. and Mrs. C.'s door was open through the night; that next morning Mrs. C. drove her to her home; and that she never had her foot in appellant's room. The record then shows:

"Q. Now then, your home was at 1855 North Kingsley Drive in Hollywood, was it not? A. Yes, it is. * * *

"Q. Mr. Degnen's is away over here on Alvarado street, isn't it? A. Yes.

"Q. Where did your secretary that owned the key live at the time when you went to his house rather than get your key from the secretary? * * * A. My secretary was moving, at the time I believe, or something of that sort; she is living at the Christian Women's Home, I believe it is called, and I didn't know her telephone number. That is why. * * *

"Q. You knew where she lived, didn't you? A. No; I did not; I did not know.

"Q. Do you swear positively to this jury that she moved at any time within a month of that time with that key? A. It was a new building. My secretary is here, she can answer that question.

"Q. I know, but you are the one that is being asked the questions.

"The Court: Do you recollect if she moved within a month of that time? A. I know my secretary—it was some circumstance of that sort.

"Q. By Mr. Davis: You can answer that by yes or no. * * * A. I know there was a legitimate reason that either my secretary—

"Mr. Davis: We ask that be stricken out, your honor, and the witness instructed to answer directly these questions.

"The Court: The witness will give her best recollection of the matter and if she doesn't remember she can say so. A. I do not exactly remember the circumstances.

"Q. By Mr. Davis: You don't remember the circumstances, but you can state to this jury positively why you did not go to the secretary and get your key rather than to go to his house and stay all night? A. It was rather late, besides that, when Mr. and Mrs. C., * * * who are reputable people, were to be there to chaperon, I think it would be casting a reflection upon them to suggest anything immoral there. A. I am not suggesting anything immoral.

"The Court: Why are you going into it if there did not anything immoral happen there? Let us go on to the next things.

"Mr. Davis: Your honor, I feel loath to have to take an exception every minute.

"The Court: You can take every exception you see fit, but, unless there was something immoral in her conduct, it is totally immaterial and a waste of time. * * * I don't know that her visit out at that house, if there was not anything immoral to it, had anything to do with this case, unless her previous conduct was immoral it becomes immaterial in this case.

"Mr. Davis: The jury has to determine that and not your honor or myself.

"The Court: No; but I have to determine myself first whether it tends to show immorality. It does not tend that way even.

"Mr. Davis: We take an exception to the court's remark and assign it as error on the part of the court, and we ask the court and move the court to instruct the jury to disregard it.

"The Court: Motion is denied."

It was the contention of appellant throughout the trial—and there was much evidence to support it, as we shall later point out—that E. C. and appellant returned from San Diego to Los Angeles on Tuesday instead of on Monday, and that they lodged at the Cabrillo Hotel on Monday night, as well as on Saturday and Sunday nights, on what we have above referred to as the San Diego trip. We shall anticipate our statement of the evidence mentioned in the last preceding sentence so far as to say that there is testimony in the record to the effect that on Tuesday appellant and E. C. called at a dog hospital, in appellant's car, to pick up a canine which E. C. had left there before proceeding on the San Diego trip. During the cross-examination of E. C. the following occurred:

"Q. When did you go and get the dog at the hospital? A. That I don't remember.

"Q. Didn't you go directly on Tuesday after you got back from San Diego with Mr. Degnen, and get the money from him, and go right in and get the dog? A. I never did. I am not in the habit of accepting from Mr. Degnen or any other men. * * *

"Q. Did you get the dog that day? A. That I don't remember, that I got my dog. * * *

"Q. Do you know who went with you after the dog?

"Mr. Burke: I object to that. * * * The question has been asked and answered she does not remember, consequently she does not remember who went with her, of course.

"The Court: She has answered the question sufficiently for an immaterial circumstance like that. * * *

"Mr. Davis: We want to except to the statement of the court that it is an immaterial circumstance, and assign it as error, and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard it.

"The Court: Overruled. Motion denied."

[8-12] In these extended quotations from the record the question is suggested whether one who is charged with rape by force and violence and who denies absolutely the charge, as did appellant here, may yet offer evidence showing acts of carnal intercourse between him and the complaining witness which occurred prior to the date fixed in the charge. A consideration of this particular point may well serve as a preface to a discussion of the two points made by appellant, that is, that the trial judge erred in limiting the cross-examination of E. C. and in making prejudicial comment in the presence of the jury in connection with his rulings affecting the right more fully to cross-examine. We find no authority emanating from the courts of this state upon the particular question above suggested, but it is the undoubted rule here, no matter what it may be elsewhere, that in a prosecution for rape by force and violence unchaste acts of the prosecutrix committed with other men than the defendant may be shown for the purpose of disproving the allegation that the act charged against the defendant was perpetrated through the exercise of force, and despite the unwillingness of the prosecutrix. People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506; People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 57 P. 885. This rule exists in California, as a perusal of the opinions just cited will demonstrate, in opposition to the weight of authority in other jurisdictions, the rule supported by such authority being that particular acts of lewdness with other men may not be shown, but only the general reputation of the prosecuting witness for unchastity. As lewd acts with other men may be proven in our courts as a defense in prosecutions for rape, it is plain, upon much greater reason, that such acts with the defendant may be proven. If evidence of specific acts of misconduct with men other than the defendant tend to prove that the prosecutrix consented to the act charged against him, the probability of that consent is surely more strongly predicable of a showing that she had formerly submitted herself to the embraces of the defendant himself. We are clearly of the opinion that the latter character of evidence is admissible in such cases. And we can conceive of no reason why such evidence is inadmissible in a case in which the defendant contends, as appellant here contended at the trial, that he committed no lascivious assault whatever upon the prosecutrix. The two principal elements of the crime of rape are, first, the commission of the act, and, second, the lack of consent of the victim to its commission. The burden is upon the people to prove both these elements, of course, and it is inconceivable that the defendant may not offer proof to rebut the evidence introduced by the prosecution in support of each of the two branches of the case. In civil actions it is the well-established rule, expressed, in fact, in the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 441), that a defendant "may set forth by answer as many defenses * * * as he may have"; and it is well settled that the terms of the section permit the allegation of inconsistent defenses (Calexico Lumber Co. v. Emerson, 54 Cal. App. 239, 201 P. 612). These, of course, are rules of pleading, but a similar rule, as a matter of evidence and independent of statute, would seem necessarily to apply in criminal cases under the issue presented by a plea of not guilty. It were strange indeed if a defendant were not permitted to introduce evidence to counterveil proof presented by the prosecution for the purpose of establishing a fact necessary for the prosecution to prove.

[13-15] Taking this point, then, as settled, the next question arising is whether, on the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness in a rape case, the defendant may put questions calculated to prove that she had, previous to the time set in the charge, willingly submitted herself to his carnal embrace, or, if not proving the fact, tending to affect the credibility of her story that the alleged criminal act was resisted by her, and, in fact, the credibility of her entire testimony. And we have not here a case in which the prosecutrix merely recited the occurrences of the occasion mentioned in the indictment, including her statement that she resisted appellant's assault upon her honor, a situation which might make less clear the right to cross-examine for the purposes indicated, but she told a story of her association with appellant from the time she became acquainted with him, in April, 1923, to the day in July of the same year upon which it is charged that his crimes were committed.

Particularly, coming nearer to the points involved in the rulings and conduct of the trial judge, she told of her frequent visits to his laboratory at night, and, in a general way, at least, of the "experiments" which she says were conducted there. The prosecutor doubtless took her over all this ground for the purpose of convincing the jury of the heinousness of appellant's conduct on the occasion which is principally of interest here, and of demonstrating to that body that she had a right to be alone with him on the occasion when the alleged crime was committed, and to expect conduct from him of a character totally different from that with which he was charged. The evidence was entirely proper for the latter purpose, to say nothing of the purpose first stated. In a case in which the defendant was charged with a rape committed upon the person of his sister-in-law it was said, after the discussion of another point:

"Neither was it error to tell the jury that 'they had a right to consider the relation existing between the parties, as tending, in some degree, to show that the prosecutrix had a right to trust herself to the defendant without fear of molestation or harm from him.' If it was a circumstance of any importance in the case, we think the instruction of the court correct. Surely, the prosecutrix had a greater right to repose confidence in the husband of her sister than in a stranger." People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 P. 691, 56 Am. Rep. 126.

This language refers, it is true, to a relationship by affinity, but we can have no doubt that it has a ready application, in principle, to a relationship or to an association arising through friendship. We think, therefore, that the testimony of E. C. on direct examination, showing the character and extent of her association with appellant, was entirely proper and that it did not bring forth mere collateral matters. There could be, then, no objection to the cross-examination of E. C. which appellant's counsel sought to pursue, upon the theory that it was not within the lines laid by the direct examination.

The trial judge sustained an objection to the following question propounded to E. C. on her cross-examination: "I will ask you this. * * * You say you went to the laboratory to perform some work. State what was done, any work that took you three hours to do or any longer time." An objection to the following question was sustained: "Well, then, please tell us what that experiment was." The witness was also asked: "Tell us the conversation then that occurred there that first night during the hours that you were there, between you and Mr. Degnen." An objection was then interposed, and the judge in effect sustained it, for, after himself asking the witness whether she had on her direct examination stated all she could remember of the conversation and getting an affirmative answer, he said: "That is enough for that." This question was put to the witness: "Tell us what he taught you at that time." An objection was interposed, and it was sustained. Although there appears to have been no express ruling upon it, the judge in effect sustained an objection to the following question: "Now * * * will you tell us anything that occurred between you and Mr. Degnen at any time after that first visit to his laboratory * * * when he and you were there?" An objection was sustained to the question: "Will you tell us what your experiments were between the time when you first met him [at the laboratory] * * * and the time you say he proposed marriage to you?" Finally, an objection was sustained to the following question: "Do you know who went with you after the dog?" We cannot but be convinced that the trial judge erred in sustaining the objections to each of these questions. None of them was itself of transcendent importance, it is true, but there were behind them questions of graver import. In the remarks of the judge which we have above quoted so liberally, made in connection with the rulings, appellant's counsel was told, in effect, that he could inquire as to immoral conduct between E. C. and appellant only by putting to the former direct questions as to whether the two had together committed sexual intercourse upon specified occasions, and that he then must take her answers to such questions. This position of the judge exhibited an altogether erroneous view as to the purposes of a cross-examination of E. C. and as to the right of appellant to subject her mind to a searching and vigorous inquest through his counsel. The matter of her alleged or supposed immoral conduct with appellant was not one of impeachment, under rules compelling appellant to put only direct questions to her and forcing him later to prove what he contended was the actual fact by witnesses in his own behalf. He had the right to prove her misconduct, if any there was, out of her own mouth, if he could, either directly or by circumstances from which the jury might justly infer that she had been guilty of misconduct, and for that purpose his counsel had the right to embark upon a searching cross-examination, limited only by the very broad lines of the direct examination. The truth must not be overlooked, also, that, aside from the question of E. C.'s alleged immoral conduct, appellant had the right vigorously to cross-examine her as to every material feature of her direct examination for the purpose of destroying, if he might, her credibility as a witness in general and as to every material part of her testimony. It was said in an early opinion rendered in a cause in which the defendant was charged with rape:

"There is no class of prosecutions attended with so much danger, or which afford so ample an opportunity for the free play of malice and private vengeance. In such cases the accused is almost defenseless. * * *" People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506.

In such cases especially, therefore, the defendant should not be held to a sparing exercise of his right to cross-examine the prosecuting witness, but should be permitted to interrogate her narrowly and thoroughly. This right was denied appellant in the present instance, and it remains only to inquire to what extent his substantial rights were probably damaged by the erroneous rulings of the court.

The testimony of E. C. was contradicted in many particulars. She was asked, for instance, whether on a certain Sunday she did not go with appellant to Santa Fé Springs, at which place they took luncheon in a tent near the oil wells of the locality, upon the invitation of a named individual, and near which place an aeroplane fell to the ground, killing its driver and a young woman who was with him. She denied that such a trip was taken, and denied all knowledge of the circumstances stated for the purpose of refreshing her recollection as to the occurrences of the alleged visit to Santa Fé Springs. Not only was she contradicted in this denial by appellant, who, however, did not mention the aeroplane incident, and who said that he and E. C. did not remain for luncheon in the tent, but by a sales manager of one of the oil companies operating at Santa Fé Springs. It was he who invited the two to partake of luncheon in the tent, but he said they did not remain for that purpose. He mentioned the aeroplane incident as having occurred immediately after E. C. and appellant left the place. Another contradiction of E. C. arose from certain of her testimony concerning the male member of the married pair who, according to E. C., were to have acted as her chaperons on the San Diego trip. She testified that she had met this man a month before the San Diego trip, while he testified that they did not meet until at least 10 days after that event. E. C. was also contradicted in this regard by appellant. Another contradiction occurred with relation to an incident of the San Diego trip. Appellant testified that he ordered a breakfast sent to E. C.'s room on one morning at La Jolla, and that she ate the breakfast in the room, he being present. She testified that no breakfast was brought to her room at La Jolla. The proprietor of a restaurant at La Jolla corroborated the testimony of appellant upon this subject. Further, and so far as the number of witnesses is concerned, there was a wholesale and substantial contradiction of E. C.'s entire story of the San Diego trip, which story is stated above. Appellant testified that the excursion began on a Friday and not on a Saturday, as testified by E. C., and that the return to Los Angeles was on the following Tuesday and not on Monday. Appellant said that the journey was not undertaken for the purpose of testing a camera, and that no camera was taken on the trip. He said that he and E. C. took the journey for pleasure only, and that no chaperons were talked of either before or during the sojourn in the vicinity of San Diego. He testified that E. C. did not go to San Diego on the train, but drove down with him in his car, after they, in company with another man, had left her dog at an animal hospital. A nurse at this hospital testified that on that day E. C. and two men brought the dog to the place in an automobile, one of the men being appellant, and that E. C. said she was on the way to San Diego, and that she was in a hurry to get started. An attendant at the hospital testified that he heard E. C. say that she was on the way to that place and was in a hurry. Appellant testified that neither he nor E. C. was at any time during the trip at the hotel in San Diego at which she said she met him. He said that the town of Tia Juana, across the Mexican border, was the main objective of the journey and not San Diego, and that they did not stop at the latter place on the way to Tia Juana, except to take dinner at a restaurant, but drove to National City, where they spent Friday night at a small hotel. He testified that he registered them at this hotel as "M. L. Degnen and wife," and that they occupied the same room during the night. The hotel register was produced at the trial, and it showed, under the date specified by appellant, the entry above noted. The manager of the hotel identified E. C. as having been at the place with appellant at the time mentioned, and corroborated appellant's entire story of the sojourn there. Appellant testified that he and E. C. left the hotel at National City at 11 or 12 o'clock on Saturday morning and drove to Tia Juana, where they remained until toward evening. He said they both drank intoxicating liquors at two different resorts, and that they thereafter went to a place in Tia Juana called the "Mint Saloon," where, after a drink or two at the bar, they retired to a booth and drank heavily until their departure in the evening. He testified that they drank frequently during the afternoon with the bartender of the saloon and with another man who was about the place. Both of these men were present at the trial, and they corroborated the story of appellant in every particular, except, as to exact date, identifying E. C. as the woman of the occasion. Although these witnesses did not fix the date as to day, they did specify the time as being within a day or so of that testified to by appellant. The latter testified that after this alleged adventure he and E. C. were heavily intoxicated, he being so much so that, after driving his car across the national boundary on the return, he was forced to employ a chauffeur, who drove them to San Diego. This man did not appear at the trial, but appellant testified that he had made a search for him, and that he could not be located. Appellant testified that upon arriving in San Diego he and E. C. had dinner at a café there, and that thereafter they drove together to La Jolla. He denied that, as testified by her, he was ill on the way to that place, but said that he had a "hang over" from the drinking at Tia Juana. He testified that at the Cabrillo Hotel he, in the presence of E. C., registered her and himself as husband and wife. In her presence, he said, he asked for adjoining rooms with a bath between, but was told that such rooms were not then to be had, but that they could be had later, that E. C. was given a room with bath; that he was assigned to a room some distance away; and that later he was "moved" to a room which opened upon the bath theretofore assigned to E. C. This story of events at the Cabrillo Hotel, up to this point, was corroborated by the hotel register, which was produced at the trial, and by the testimony of the proprietress of the place. She also testified that she addressed E. C. as Mrs. Degnen when she saw her about the house, and that E. C. did not demur at being so addressed. The cash book of the hotel, also produced at the trial, showed that appellant paid for the two rooms and bath for Saturday, Sunday, and Monday nights, not merely for the nights of Saturday and Sunday. Appellant testified, further, that, after he was given his second room, the bath between his apartment and that of E. C. was kept open, and that on at least one night he occupied for a time with her the bed in her room, afterward retiring to his own room, where he passed the remainder of the night. He testified that E. C. and he occupied these quarters at the Cabrillo Hotel on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday nights, and that they together drove to Los Angeles on Tuesday, and that, as already related, they went to the animal hospital and reclaimed E. C.'s dog before proceeding to her home. The nurse at the hospital produced records of the place showing that the dog was reclaimed on Tuesday. An attendant at the hospital testified that the dog was taken out on that day; that he carried the animal to an automobile in which E. C. had driven up to the place; and that appellant was seated therein.

We have not stated all of the respects in which the testimony of E. C. was contradicted, but only some of the prominent instances of contradiction. In addition to these matters of direct contradiction, there was much evidence which was utterly inconsistent with important features of E. C.'s story. The night foreman of the office building in which appellant had his laboratory testified that on one occasion he saw E. C. and appellant leave the building at 3 o'clock in the morning. An elevator operator in the building testified that he took them down in his car one evening when both were intoxicated. A janitor of the building testified that the two came into the place one night after the elevator ceased running, which customarily occurred at 9 o'clock, and that they were both so intoxicated that they had to help each other up stairs, both falling in doing so, and that it took about ten minutes for them to get to appellant's rooms, which were on the third floor. Mr. C., at whose house, as it will be remembered, appellant resided, testified that E. C. was frequently at that place of residence after night; that she and appellant were often intoxicated together there; and that on one of these occasions, when they were both drunk, appellant was so much so that he, Mr. C., drove the two home in appellant's car; that on the trip E. C. and appellant occupied the back seat of the vehicle; and that during the ride they hugged and kissed each other—had a "petting party." Mrs. C. corroborated her husband's testimony, with the exception that she said that she never saw anything "improper" between E. C. and appellant.

[16, 17] We do not mean to say that there was no corroboration of E. C.'s testimony, for there was, but that corroboration was largely circumstantial, and taken as a whole it was insignificant when contrasted with the contradictions of her recital. Certainly, if the members of the jury had elected not to believe her, but those whose testimony was opposed to hers, their view that she was an utterly discredited witness would have received ample support from the record. She was disputed at every turn, and not always by appellant alone. If we may judge from the showing made by the reporter's transcript, however, appellant's contradiction of the various phases of E. C.'s testimony was far from being unmarked and unimportant. True, the members of the jury saw the two, and we must not forget the rule of law based upon that circumstance, to the effect that the verdict of a jury is to be upheld even if rendered in opposition to what a court of review may deem to be the weight of the testimony, if there be substantial evidence to support it. We have here determined, however, that the trial court erred in its rulings limiting the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, and we now engage in an endeavor to satisfy the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, to the effect that we shall not reverse a judgment under any asserted error, "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." In the present instance we have examined the entire cause, including the evidence. We have read the 1,200 pages which comprise the testimony. In an endeavor to satisfy the constitutional provision, we must look to the record. We have no other guide. In disposing of the present point, we are not interested in the question whether there is substantial evidence to support the verdict. We are to determine only, from the face of the record, whether the verdict might have been different had not the errors of the trial court occurred. Under such circumstances, we repeat that the face of the record shows appellant's contradictions of E. C.'s story to be worthy of serious consideration. His testimony was marked by a frankness and openness which are not characteristic of hers. She was "fresh," evasive, and "smart" in her recital of the events which culminated in the charge against him. From the cold face of the record we do not hesitate to say that, of the two, he was the more worthy of belief. Not only so, but his version of the relationship between her and him, in so far as the recitals differ, and regarding each recital in the light of the undisputed evidence in the case, is more in accord with the teachings of experience than is hers. In order to justify this assertion, a statement must be made of certain features of the evidence which have not yet been mentioned. We first state some matters which are established without contradiction. Appellant's fifty-third birthday occurred a few days after E. C. and he first met. Her thirty-fifth birthday came nearly two months later. He was a widower, having lost his wife by death a year and a half before his meeting with E. C. The latter was a married woman, living alone and expecting to procure a divorce from her husband. She was unusually attractive, both physically and mentally. Immediately after their first meeting the two began to see each other with great frequency. She herself said that she was at appellant's laboratory three or four times each week, and she saw him at other times at her home and on drives which they took together in his car. They frequently indulged together in intoxicants, although E. C. says that she drank sparingly and was never intoxicated. Their intimacy had so far progressed "shortly" after their meeting that E. C. accepted from appellant a valuable ring as a present. This ring incident seems to us an important feature in the case, and we quote at some length parts of E. C.'s testimony concerning it, which occurred on cross-examination, leaving it to be understood that important features of the recital, hereafter to be specified, were disputed by appellant and by the jeweler mentioned in her testimony; also, the extract will serve to illustrate in some degree the conduct of E. C. on the witness stand:

"Q. When was it that Mr. Degnen presented you with a ring? * * * A. He bought the ring, oh, some time shortly after I met him, and presented it to me for a birthday gift.

"Q. Your birthday was on the 30th of May? * * * A. Yes.

"Q. Is it not a fact that on April the 18th, Mr. Degnen—on April 17th, Mr. Degnen presented you with a ring costing $165, and said, 'This is our engagement ring?' A. That is not true.

"Q. And did you not the very next day go with him to Lucian, the jeweler, and say you wanted a different kind of a ring, and picked out one that cost $225? A. That is a point that I ask to explain the situation. * * * He did not give me the ring. He bought it in April, and it was not given to me until shortly before my birthday, a day or so before. Mr. Degnen had a ring—what he paid for it I do not know—I did not know that he had just bought it at that time. I went to his office one day and he showed it to me. * * * When he showed me a ring he had in his possession, which was in a gold setting, and he said to me, 'I want to give you a birthday gift,' and he said, 'Perhaps you would rather have a different setting, in platinum; it is a ring that I bought for a business investment.' * * *

"Q. * * * When did he first speak to you about the ring he bought? A. I do not know, some time in April—he had the ring in his possession and showed it to me. * * *

"Q. You met him on April 6th? A. Yes.

"Q. How long would you say it was, a week after that? A. Shortly after that, that Mr. Degnen told me that he had appreciated everything I had meant to him, and he knew it was my birthday— * * *

"Q. He did say to you, anyway, he had a ring for you, didn't he? A. Yes.

"Q. And you looked at it, didn't you? A. Yes.

"Q. And you tried it on, didn't you? A. No.

"Q. It did not suit you? A. It was at his suggestion that it be changed.

"Q. I am not asking whether it was his suggestion at this time or not, but I am asking you if that ring suited you—that is a question you can answer 'Yes' or 'No' absolutely. * * * It did not suit you? A. No.

"Q. You told him so, didn't you? A. No, it was his suggestion—he had asked me if I preferred a gold, platinum.

"Q. I am not asking about his suggestion. You can answer by categorical answers 'Yes' or 'No'—did you tell him it did not suit you? A. He asked me if it did, and I answered him truthfully 'No.'

"Q. Did you not go with him to the jeweler the next day in reference to that ring? A. The very same day. * * *

"Q. You picked out a ring? A. I selected it, yes.

"Q. Did not Mr. Degnen there in the presence of this man, the jeweler, * * * say, 'This is your engagement ring?' A. Absolutely not.

"Q. Are you positive that no such conversation as that occurred at all? A. I would not be capable of discussing such a thing—

"Q. I am not asking about your capability or noncapability, I am asking if there was anything said by you or Mr. Degnen at the time of the purchase of the ring? A. Certainly not.

"Q. What did you think of that matter of going with him within 8 or 10 days after meeting him and getting the ring—did you regard that as anything other than his making love to you? A. No, I did not regard it as love at all.

"Q. What did you regard it as, simply getting it from him? A. I think it is most insulting.

"Mr. Burke: I object to the form of the question, argumentative. A. I think it is most insulting.

"The Court: I do not think it makes any difference what her idea was about the matter.

"Mr. Davis: Isn't that something that must come into it as to the relations that existed between the parties at that time—is it a usual thing for a young lady to meet an old man, and she says she met him within 10 days before this and expressed a dissatisfaction with the one he bought, and went to the jeweler and selected another, isn't that something that can be brought out, is that the usual thing, would you tolerate one of the members of your family?

"The Court: A lot of old men make fools of themselves and give rings to young ladies. * * * It is not material. A. Ridiculous.

"The Court: You can prove he gave her the ring, and whether he made any protestations of love. * * *

"Mr. Burke: I object to it as argumentative.

"The Court: I think it is argumentative.

"Q. Now, * * * this episode of the ring that occurred within 10 days from the time you met him, had you during that brief interval gone into your life so as to give him your birthday and all that? A. No.

"Q. How did he know your birthday was about that time? A. I do not remember; I forget the circumstances.

"Q. You do not have the slightest idea? A. No. I cannot tell you definitely, but I know I always make a great deal of my birthday—as a matter of fact, I usually have a little dinner party.

"Q. This was more than 30 days before your birthday? A. I did not receive the ring.

"Q. When was your birthday? A. The 30th of May.

"Q. This was on the 18th of April, wasn't it? A. Mr. Degnen told me he had the ring, which he had in his pocket, and asked me if I would accept it as a token of appreciation for what he knew was going to be a friendship with a woman he was deeply interested in, because of our mental companionship.

"Q. He was deeply interested in you at that time, this old man, wasn't he? A. He claimed to be.

"Q. You knew it? A. I respected his mentality.

"Q. I am not asking whether you respected him—you knew he was deeply interested in you at that time, 10 days after you met him? A. Our companionship at that time was considered by me at that time on a mental basis, because he never could appeal to me physically.

"Q. If you will try to answer me categorically—he told you he was deeply interested in you at that time, didn't he? A. As a friend, yes.

"Q. Tell us exactly what he said when he purchased you this ring, where it was that he offered it to you, and all that occurred at that time. * * * A. In his laboratory—I had gone down there, I think, some time in the morning—it was during the day, at any rate, and it was in his laboratory. He had this ring in a piece of tissue paper, and he took it out of his vest pocket and showed it to me, and he said to me at that particular time, he said, 'Little girl, I want you to have a token of appreciation and esteem from me.' I had spoken some time, I think to my friend, Mrs. Wilson, in his presence, of the approach of my birthday. * * *

"Mr. Burke: You wanted it all.

"Mr. Davis: A while ago she could not remember anything about her birthday. A. I said I could not remember exactly when or how I came to tell him it was my birthday, but I always make a great deal of my birthday—* * *

"Q. * * * What did you say in reply when he called you 'little girl'? * * * A. At that time, I said, 'That is not necessary, I accept your appreciation.' He said, 'No, but I want a material mark of that,—I really hate to tell you the substance—so ridiculous, you will only laugh. * * * He said that he wanted to place that ring on my finger as a seal of his deep appreciation and regard for the most intelligent woman he had encountered—therefore I thought it was quite ridiculous that one who knows a person just a short time should make such an exaggerated statement—he referred to me as a goddess, and a few other terms that were quite exaggerated. * * *

"Q. Nevertheless, you accepted it? A. Not at that time, no, but he asked me—I said to him, 'No, that is not necessary.' He said, 'Yes, I insist.' I did not know how long he had it or anything else—he had it in his possession—he said, 'Now,' he said, 'I will tell you about this ring: Some time ago I bought it as a business investment, but I do not want you to have this in gold, I want it in platinum setting,' and I said, 'That would be quite an expense to have it put in the platinum setting,' but I preferred the white gold, 'if you insist upon my having a token from you,' and he said, 'We will go to the jewelers and make the exchange.' I went to the jeweler's with him, and he said—it was his own suggestion, not mine—I did not like the setting, naturally, when he asked my opinion, but it was his suggestion, not mine, that he selected the larger stone and the ring in white gold, and there was nothing in the conversation at that time to indicate that it was an engagement ring."

Before we proceed to state the conflicting stories of E. C. and appellant as to their relations, using the foregoing showing made by the record including E. C.'s story as to the ring as a preface, we must exhibit the extent to which appellant and the jeweler disputed the recital of E. C. concerning the ornament. He testified that before its purchase he and E. C. had agreed to marry; that on the night of April 17 she told him she had been married twice, but had never had an engagement ring; that they then arranged to meet at his office for the purpose of going together to buy an engagement ring for her; that on the next morning in passing a jewelry store he saw in the window a ring which he thought had a fairly good stone and which he purchased for $150; that E. C. came to his office between 11 and 12 o'clock that morning to keep the engagement to go together to buy a ring; that he showed her the one he had bought, and she said she did not like it—that it was old-fashioned, and that she would have preferred if he had waited until she came down to select it; that he told her he had arranged for an exchange of the ring if it was unsuitable to her; that they then together went to the jeweler's to make the exchange; that he did not tell her he had bought the ring as an investment; that when they went to the jeweler's she selected a ring priced at $65 more than the one he had first bought; that he paid that amount for it in addition to the amount he had paid for the first one; that she put it on her engagement finger. This entire story of appellant was corroborated by the jeweler. Appellant further testified that E. C. kept the ring and was highly pleased with it; that he did not tell her it was a birthday gift; that it was not a birthday gift; and that he could not remember whether he knew at that time when E. C.'s birthday would occur.

We now come to the respective stories of E. C. and appellant as to the nature of the relationship subsisting between them. She testified that their association was platonic; that it was always kept on a "mental" basis; that he tried often to become "personal," but that she always checked him; and that she had never accepted money from him until after the difficulty of July 30, out of which the present criminal charges against him arose, when he gave her money with which to pay physicians and nurses for attendance upon her, made necessary by injuries which she undoubtedly suffered on that occasion. Appellant testified that he had sexual intercourse with E. C. in her home a night or two after he gave her the ring and frequently thereafter; that on several occasions he passed the night with her at her residence; that he began, soon after they met, to furnish her money with which to keep up her establishment; and that the entire expense of the place was defrayed by him during their association together. He said he gave her various amounts under $40 at various times, of which amounts he usually kept no account, but that he did keep a list of payments to her of larger amounts, making an entry of each amount on the day it was paid, or on the next day. This memorandum was offered in evidence, and showed the following payments; April 17, $100; 27, $50; 30, $250; May 8, $40; 14, $50; 16, $75; 28, $250; June 4, $40; 8, $100; 14, $70; 19, $200; 28, $50; July 7, $25; 9, $200; 22, $70. Appellant and E. C. undoubtedly had two serious quarrels or disturbances during their association together. The first occurred about July 10. She testified that it arose out of his desire to enter her house late at night, when she had forbidden him to see her. He said that it grew out of money matters. The second event was that of July 30 and was extremely serious. Beyond dispute, E. C. was severely injured during the physical encounter which then took place between them. She testified, with particularity, to facts tending to show that the event occurred as laid in the indictment. He said that they were both intoxicated at the time, and that the trouble would not have occurred but for that fact. He said that after July 22 he and E. C. had frequent conversations about money matters, during which he told her that he was giving her more than he could afford, and she said to him that he was a "piker" and was not "coming through" as he should. The subject was resumed with great bitterness, on account of their intoxicated condition, on the night of the 30th. He accused her, in effect, of holding him up, and she then attacked him in great anger, scratching and gouging his face. In the scuffle which ensued through his attempt to hold her and thus protect himself, as he said, the injuries which she suffered occurred, because of falls against objects in the house. The undisputed evidence is that on the next day they both showed on their persons ample evidence of the fact that they had been in a "fight." These evidences, of course, were consistent with the story told by each of them. The injuries to E. C. included a fractured clavicle.

[18] We have now reached the end of our protracted consideration of the question whether the limitation placed by the trial judge upon the cross-examination of E. C. has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. It seems to us that it must have done so. When considering the effect of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution we need only determine, in directing a reversal, that we cannot say "whether appellant would or would not have been convicted but for the errors of the court" (People v. Walker [Cal. App.] 231 P. 572), and we are unable to avoid reaching that conclusion in the present instance. Contradicted, as the testimony of the prosecuting witness was, not only by many other witnesses, but by the teachings of human experience as well, who can say what effect a proper cross-examination of E. C. might have had upon the jury? How great or how little additional weight was necessary to be thrown in the scale against her to impel the jury to conclude that the sordid story we have unfolded was but another instance of the victimizing of a fond and confiding man by a younger, but experienced, woman? We do not say that E. C. did victimize appellant. It is not within our province to say so. We do say, however, that the jury should have been given the opportunity, upon a survey of all available evidence, and especially upon a searching cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, to determine whether she did victimize him, and whether, therefore, appellant should not have been allowed to depart the court, at the conclusion of his trial, without day.

We shall say but little concerning the claim that the trial judge committed error in his remarks made in connection with his rulings limiting the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness. We are of the opinion that some of his observations were erroneously made, and, not only so, but that they were materially prejudicial to appellant's rights.

One or two other claims of error are presented, but we find it unnecessary to consider them.

Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

LOS ANGELES CITY HIGH SCHOOL DIST.
OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. QUINN
et al. (L. A. 7964.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 6, 1925.)

1. Escrows ⚡—Binding contract based on valid consideration necessary.

To support an escrow there must be a binding contract based on valid consideration.

2. Escrows ⚡9—No valid delivery of deed by escrow holder where grantee does not comply with conditions contained in agreement.

Where deed is placed in hands of third person, as an escrow, with agreement between grantor and grantee that it shall not be delivered until grantee has complied with certain conditions, grantee does not acquire title, nor is he entitled to delivery until he has strictly complied with conditions, an escrow holder cannot make valid delivery of deed to grantee, in absence of such compliance.

3. Escrows ⚡5—Court must inquire into surrounding circumstances when escrow instructions ambiguous.

Where provisions in escrow instructions, read alone, were ambiguous, court must inquire into circumstances existing at time of negotiations between grantor and grantee which resulted in deposit of deed with escrow holder.

4. Escrows ⚡14(1)—Delivery of deed out of escrow held not to pass title where grantee did not comply with original agreement or grantor's escrow instructions.

Where, under contract of sale of land, grantee was to pay 1922-1923 taxes, but before delivery of deed in escrow grantor paid first installment of taxes, and in escrow instructions directed escrow holder to hold $43.55 for "tax adjustments," and grantee did not comply therewith, but undertook to settle tax "outside of escrow," held that delivery of deed to grantee for acceptance required by Civ. Code, § 1158, was insufficient to pass title and, there being no other delivery, deed never took effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Los Angeles City High School District of Los Angeles County against Patrick Joseph Quinn and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edward T. Bishop, J. N. O'Connor, Albert W. Leeds, and Ivan G. McDaniel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment quieting the title of plaintiff to certain lands in the city of Los Angeles. The plaintiff relies upon deeds of the property, executed under escrow instructions, but not recorded. The defense in the trial court was that the defendants had not been divested of their title, for the reason, that they had revoked the escrow instructions before actual delivery of the deeds.

Appellants are the four children of Catherine Quinn. Three are of legal age, and the fourth, a minor, is represented by and appears through Mrs. Quinn, his guardian. Part of the estate of the four children, each owning an undivided one-fourth interest therein was the land here in question. Catherine Quinn, who appears to have been acting on behalf of all of the appellants, gave the respondent, Los Angeles city high school district of Los Angeles county, an exclusive option to purchase the property for the sum of $5,500 cash, taxes to be paid by the board of education of respondent, possession to be given October 17, 1922. No other terms or conditions of sale were specified in the option, which was in writing, signed by Catherine Quinn personally, as owner. She understood, so the option recites, that the sale of the property was to be handled in escrow by a company satisfactory to the board of education, and she agreed to furnish a good and sufficient grant deed, and a new, unlimited guarantee of title to the property, to be issued by a title company satisfactory to the respondent. The respondent, by formal resolution of the board of education, decided to purchase the property from Mrs. Quinn as an addition to the Polytechnic high school site, and on the terms and conditions set forth in the option. It also directed that an action in condemnation, theretofore authorized by it to acquire the property, be discontinued, providing the property be purchased in accordance with the option, and through ordinary channels. The secretary of the board of education thereupon notified Mrs. Quinn in writing that the board agreed to purchase the property at the price mentioned, provided a good and sufficient deed, and a new, unlimited guarantee of title were furnished, showing title to the property in the Los Angeles city high school district of Los Angeles county, free and clear of incumbrances, "except the taxes for the fiscal year 1922-23."

Catherine Quinn, as guardian of the minor appellant William Charles Quinn, thereupon filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county a return of sale of the interest of the minor in the property to the respondent, and prayed for confirmation, which was granted by an order of the court made and entered on the 7th day of December, 1922. On the same date, Mrs. Quinn deposited with the Title Guarantee & Trust Company a title company satisfactory to respondent, escrow instructions reading as follows:

"Escrow Instructions. Number 457343.

"Los Angeles, Cal., Dec. 7, 1922.

"Title Guarantee & Trust Company:

"I will hand you a deed executed by Catherine Quinn, guardian, also deed executed by Mary Elizabeth Quinn et al. to Los Angeles City High School District of Los Angeles County, on the following described property: [Describing it.]

"Subject to: Second half taxes 1922-23.

"Conditions, restrictions, reservations, and rights of way of record, which you are authorized to deliver or use upon payment to you within 20 days from date hereof for my account, the sum of $5,500.00. No insurance through escrow.

"Hold for me $43.55 as tax adjustment.

"Pay your escrow charges; also your charges for guarantee certificate.

"(Liability $5,500.00.)

"Affix and cancel proper revenue on each deed. Deeds to come.

"In the event that the conditions of this escrow have not been complied with at the expiration of the time provided for herein, you are instructed to complete the same at the earliest possible date thereafter, unless I have made written demand upon you for the return of all instruments deposited by me.

"Signature: Catherine Quinn.

"Address: 607 West 40th Place, City.

"Phones: Auto. 298034; Sunset —."

Following the deposit of these escrow instructions, Catherine Quinn, as guardian of William Charles Quinn, a minor, executed and placed with the escrow holder, Title Guarantee & Trust Company, a deed of such guardian conveying the quarter interest of the minor to the respondent. She also had prepared and caused to be signed by the three adult appellants a deed conveying their three-quarters interest in the property to the same grantee. This deed she likewise deposited with the escrow holder. After the deposit of these deeds with the escrow holder, the respondent delivered to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company the following communication:

"Los Angeles, Cal., December 12, 1922.

"Order No. 435264. Escrow No. 457343.

"Title Guarantee and Trust Company, Fifth Street and Broadway, Los Angeles, California. Mr. Zell Henley, Escrow Clerk—Gentlemen: Please be advised that the Board of Education has agreed to purchase from Catherine Quinn (describing the property), for the sum of $5,500.00, provided that a good and sufficient deed and a new unlimited guaranty of title are furnished showing title to said property vested in 'Los Angeles City High School District of Los Angeles County,' free and clear of all incumbrances except the second half of taxes for the fiscal year 1922-23.

"The board is to pay only the fee for the recording of the deed; all other escrow charges to be paid by the seller.

"When the deed is ready for formal acceptance by the board, please forward it to the secretary's office, 730 Security Building, and after being accepted by the board, it will be sent to you for recording and final return to the secretary's office.

"We will have prepared a warrant to cover the above-mentioned purchase price and forward it to you for use in this escrow.

"Very truly yours,

"Wm. A. Sheldon, H. E. G.,

"Secretary Board of Education."

A few days later, and within the time required, the respondent handed to the Title Company its warrant in the sum of $5,500, with directions to disburse the same "in accordance with our [its] previous instructions." The Title Company received the warrant, and deposited it in its own account in bank. The escrow instructions signed by Mrs. Quinn were not shown to the respondent, and the escrow instructions signed by the respondent were not shown to Mrs. Quinn.

Deeds or grants conveying real estate, or an interest therein, to a political corporation or governmental agency cannot be accepted for recordation without the consent of the grantee evidenced by its resolution of acceptance attached to such deed or grant. Civ. Code, § 1158. Consequently, on January 6, 1923, the Title Guarantee & Trust Company sent the two deeds to the board of education of the respondent for acceptance and return to the escrow holder. The communication accompanying these deeds contained the following:

"The seller's instructions in this escrow provide that you hold for them $43.55 as tax adjustment and farther told us that this as on account of first half taxes having been paid by them, which according to your original agreement with them was to be assumed by you.

"If it is your intention to comply with this, you can send us funds in this amount with instructions to use said funds for the above purpose.

"Also in your letters to us include approval of liability under your guarantee of title not to exceed $5,500.00, and that there is to be no insurance through escrow.

"As soon as the above matters have been provided for we will notify you regarding dismissal of action."

On January 8, the board of education, by resolution, accepted the deeds, and certificates to that effect, attested by its secretary, were attached to the documents. On the next day the deeds were returned to the Title Company, with a direction to have the instruments recorded and returned to the secretary's office. The letter contained this statement: "We will settle for tax with the seller outside of escrow."

On January 12, the appellants served on the Title Company an instrument in writing, canceling and annulling their escrow instructions, and vacating the authority of the Title Company to deliver the deeds, and demanded immediate return of the documents. The deeds were never recorded, and, at the trial below, it was stipulated that they were not in the possession of the escrow holder.

[1] The contentions of the appellants are that they were not divested of their title in the land by the transactions noted for the reasons, first, that there was no escrow between the parties, because no valid contract of purchase and sale of the property was entered into by them, and Mrs. Quinn was not authorized in writing to do so for them; and, second, that the passing of the deeds out of escrow, for the sole purpose of having the certificates of acceptance indorsed thereon, did not amount to a delivery. That there must be a binding contract based on a valid consideration to support an escrow admits of no debate. Thomas v. Birch, 178 Cal. 483, 489, 173 P. 1102; Holland v. McCarthy, 173 Cal. 597, 602, 160 P. 1069; 10 Cal. Jur. 581. But it is not necessary for us to consider that phase of the case. Assuming that there was such a contract, we are satisfied that title did not pass to the respondent for want of a proper delivery of the deeds.

[2] Where a deed is placed in the hands of a third person, as an escrow, with an agreement between the grantor and grantee that it shall not be delivered to the grantee until he has complied with certain conditions, the grantee does not acquire any title to the land, nor is he entitled to a delivery of the deed until he has strictly complied with the conditions. Dyson v. Bradshaw, 23 Cal. 528, 536. If he does not comply with the conditions when required, or refuses to comply, the escrow holder cannot make a valid delivery of the deed to him. McLaughlin v. Clausen, 85 Cal. 322, 327, 24 P. 636. It is therefore necessary to determine what were the conditions precedent imposed on the respondent in this case to entitle it to delivery of the deeds. Respondent contends that there was but one, the payment by it to the escrow holder of the sum of $5,500, for the account of appellants, within 20 days from the date of the escrow agreement, and that, having received manual transmission of the deeds, title to the property passed to it.

[3] Appellants contend that another condition was imposed by the escrow, which was not complied with by respondent, and non-performance of which rendered delivery of the deeds ineffective. They rely upon the direction, "hold for me $43.55 as tax adjustment," contained in the escrow instructions given to the Title Company by Mrs. Quinn. Read alone, the direction is ambiguous and uncertain. There is nothing in the context to explain it. It therefore becomes the duty of the court to inquire into the circumstances and conditions which existed at the time of the negotiations between Mrs. Quinn, on behalf of the appellants, and the respondent for the sale and purchase of the property, which resulted in the deposit of the deeds with the Title Company as escrow holder. "This is necessary in order to bring the language in the 'escrow agreement' as near to the intention * * * of the parties at the time of its execution as the words which they saw fit to employ and rules of law will permit. The rule is universal that it is the duty of the court, where the language used is not clear, positive, and certain, to consult the conditions, situation, and motives of the respective parties for the purpose of ascertaining their intention." Clarke v. Eureka Co. Bank (C. C.) 123 F. 922, 927.

[4] By the terms of the option, and the acceptance, which resulted in the deposit of the deeds, the respondent agreed to pay the sum of $5,500 for the property, which was to be free of lien or incumbrance, except the taxes for the year 1922-23. From the record we may judge that appellants, not having been able to complete their escrow before the first Monday in December, paid the first installment of taxes for the year 1922-23, rather than suffer it to go delinquent. They were not compelled to make that payment under the terms of their contract of sale, for the transfer was to be made to respondent, subject to the whole of the tax for 1922-23. There is nothing in the record from which it may be inferred that that agreement was ever changed or modified. But, the first installment being paid by the appellants, the situation of the parties was changed from that in which it rested at the beginning of the negotiations. That both parties to the transaction were aware of the fact that the situation had changed is conclusively established by the evidence of what took place after the first installment of the tax was paid. The escrow instructions of both appellants and respondent recognize the fact. There is the direction of the Title Company in each set of instructions that the property is to be conveyed subject, only, to the second half of the taxes for 1922-23. We know of no reason why appellants, having made a payment, prior to the deposit of the deeds, which the respondent should have made, should not have demanded as a condition precedent to delivery of the deeds that respondent repay them for such advance. It is very evident that such was the motive of the appellants in inserting in the escrow instructions the direction to the escrow holder to hold the sum of $43.55 "as tax adjustment." The choice of language in the direction was not happy. It has afforded respondent an opportunity to argue that it was impossible to carry out the direction for the reason that the Title Company could not "hold" something it did not have, or which it did not collect, and that as the escrow holder was instructed to deliver the deeds on payment of the sum of $5,500 it could demand no further payment from respondent.

The argument is too technical. It does not take into consideration the duty of the court to go behind the wording of the escrow agreement in order to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the parties. We have shown their situation in relation to the taxes before and at the time the deeds were deposited. The manifest intention of the appellants was to secure for themselves repayment of the sum advanced for taxes which respondent should have paid. The escrow holder fully understood what their intention was, and so informed respondent. The communication it sent to the board of education on January 6, 1923, is so plain on that point, and settles it so completely, that it does not admit of argument.

Instead of complying with the condition, which was reasonable, and with which it was fully cognizant, the respondent undertook to settle with appellants for the tax "outside of escrow." It does not appear that such course was ever agreed to by appellants, or that they have been repaid the amount. It follows, therefore, that the manual transmission of the deeds by the title company to the respondent for "acceptance and return to" it must be considered as having been made only for the purpose of putting the deeds in proper shape to be recorded. Transmission for any other purpose was, at that time, beyond the scope of the power and authority of the Title Company as the escrow holder. No other delivery appears to have been made or attempted. As a result, there was no delivery at all, no title passed, and the deeds never took effect. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 591, par. 15.

The judgment is reversed.

Industrial Accident Commission is required despite St. 1917, p. 871, § 60, subd. (a), to conduct proceedings pursuant to prescribed procedure and rules of evidence so that there will be as little occasion as possible for courts to resort to rule of decision announced in that section.

2. Master and servant ⇨404—Copy of transcript of testimony at coroner's inquest held admissible in compensation case though hearsay.

Copy of transcript of testimony given at coroner's inquest though hearsay held admissible under St. 1917, p. 871, § 60, subd. (a), in a hearing before Industrial Accident Commission, and properly included in return to writ of review.

3. Master and servant ⇨415—Knowledge that copy of certain testimony would be included in return to writ of review held imputable to insurer.

Myers, C. J., and Lennon, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act for compensation by Herman Ford, a minor, through his guardian ad litem and trustee, Josephine Ford, opposed by the Merchants' Improvement Company, alleged employer, and the Continental Casualty Company, insurance carrier. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the insurance carrier applies for certiorari to review the award. Affirmed.

Hettman & Hoge, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

W. H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. On October 11, 1922, Herman Ford, a minor, by his guardian ad litem and trustee, Josephine Ford, filed an application in the Industrial Accident Commission for the adjustment of a claim against the Merchants' Improvement Company and the Continental Casualty Company. The claim is based on the following alleged facts: On August 16, 1922, Wilbur Ford was killed, the result of an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment by the Merchants' Improvement Company, and that Herman Ford, a minor, is the dependent son of the deceased. Wilbur Ford, aged 51 years, was a porter engaged in repairing an elevator for the Merchants' Improvement Company in the California Fruit Exchange building in the city of Sacramento, when he was caught between the elevator and the wall of the shaft and fell to the bottom of the pit sustaining injuries in the abdominal region from which he died on August 16, 1922. Under his employment he received a wage of $100 per month and worked six days a week. The answer of the defendants denied that Wilbur Ford was the employee of the Merchants' Improvement Company.

It was found by the commission that the injuries sustained by Wilbur Ford arose out of and in the course of his employment and proximately caused his death; that Herman Ford, his adopted minor son, is in the custody of his foster mother, Josephine Ford, and under the provisions of a decree of divorce the deceased was required to pay $10 per month for the support of said minor; that Herman Ford is conclusively presumed to be totally dependent upon deceased and entitled to a death benefit of $3,320 payable at the rate of $14.25 per week, in addition to $100 burial expense, and that the foregoing benefit was based upon a wage of $100 per month. It was further found that the "evidence herein is insufficient to establish as a fact that the defendant, R. Smith, was, at the time of said injury, the employer of the deceased, Wilbur Ford." The award made was in accordance with these findings. Subsequently, the death benefit was increased to the sum of $3,662, payable at the rate of $15.67 per week upon the basis of a wage of $110 per month.

The Continental Casualty Company, a corporation, the insurance carrier of the Merchants' Improvement Company, against whom the award was made, petitioned this court for a writ of review of the foregoing award and proceedings on the grounds: "(a) That said commission acted without and in excess of its powers in making its said decision, order, and award; (b) that the evidence does not justify the findings of fact; (c) that there was no evidence legally sufficient to justify the findings and award of said commission."

In this behalf, the petitioner contends that the evidence in the case does not justify the finding that the Merchants' Improvement Company was the employer of the deceased, Wilbur Ford; that according to the testimony of Fred L. Martin, the secretary and manager of said building, one R. Smith, was paid the sum of $325 per month under a contract with the Merchants' Improvement Company to do the janitor work on certain floors in said building; that R. Smith had no connection with the Merchants' Improvement Company other than by said contract, which had been in force for two or three years; that R. Smith employed various persons to assist him, of whom Wilbur Ford, the deceased, was one, whom Smith paid out of his salary; that Fred L. Martin did not know any of the employees of R. Smith; that he had nothing whatsoever to do with them; that the Merchants' Improvement Company exercised no control whatsoever over the manner or method in which R. Smith performed the work; that it did not hire or discharge the employees of R. Smith; that it did not pay the deceased any money and did not know that he was working in the building; that R. Smith was an independent contractor and the Merchants' Improvement Company did not control his full time since he was free to accept other contracts and do whatever work he saw fit to do and "that according to all of the testimony * * * Wilbur Ford was employed by, compensated by, subject to control of, and working under the instructions of the defendant R. Smith; that the defendant, R. Smith, was an independent contractor performing said work under a contract for a stipulated sum of money and was responsible to the Merchants' Improvement Company for results only; that said Merchants' Improvement Company was not the employer of said deceased, Wilbur Ford."

The testimony of Fred L. Martin, the secretary and manager of the building operated by the Merchants' Improvement Company at the original hearing before the commission on November 16, 1922, is that R. Smith was employed by the Merchants' Improvement Company under a contract to do the janitor work on the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, ninth, and tenth floors; that he was to hire his own men; that he was given a master key to all the floors and offices he contracted to clean; that he never directed him as to how the work was to be done; that George Erhardt, the engineer, was instructed to give him directions and inspected the building every day; that no control was exercised over the way in which R. Smith did the work; that he did not know who the employees of R. Smith were;

that he did not discharge any employee of R. Smith; that no money was ever paid by the Merchants' Improvement Company to any such employee; and that all the witness was concerned with was the result of the employment.

George Erhardt, the superintendent and engineer of the building, testified that he was instructed by the manager to see that all the janitor work in the offices was done; that on various occasions he spoke to R. Smith and "jacked him up" about the work; that he never spoke to the men "because they were working for Smith and Smith was the man I held responsible for the work"; that he was never around when R. Smith was doing the work; that the company furnished the appliances used in the janitorial work; that he would not "fire" R. Smith without consulting the manager; and that he never exercised any authority or any control directly or indirectly over Wilbur Ford, the deceased.

From the return to the writ of review it appears that the testimony above mentioned was heard before the commission on November 16, 1922, and filed on December 7, 1922. Seventeen months later a copy of the testimony of the witnesses at the coroner's inquest was "served and filed April 28, 1924," upon R. Smith, the Continental Casualty Company and Josephine Ford, as guardian ad litem. In the transcript of the coroner's inquest, R. Smith purports to have testified that "Mr. Ford was employed by the California Fruit people [Merchants' Improvement Company] and under my direction. * * * This man was working under my instruction as a janitor." Upon this supplemental testimony the commission on May 22, 1924, made the finding above mentioned that Wilbur Ford, the deceased, was in the employ of the Merchants' Improvement Company and sustained injuries resulting in death arising out of and in the course of his employment, and based the award on such finding.

On June 10, 1924, a petition for rehearing before the commission was interposed by the Continental Casualty Company upon the ground that the evidence shown by the record was not sufficient to establish the finding that the deceased was employed by the Merchants' Improvement Company. This petition was granted, and the following statement made by the commission:

"It further appearing to the satisfaction of this commission that no good reason exists for taking further testimony, the commission now reconsiders and redetermines the original cause without setting a time and place for such further hearing, and now makes its findings and award."

As appears above, the award was amended in the amount of the death benefit based on the testimony of R. Smith that prior to the accident he had increased the deceased's wage to $110 per month. It is clear that the commission based its findings and award upon a variation between the testimony of R. Smith given at the coroner's inquest held August 22, 1922, and that received at the hearing before the commission on November 16, 1922, touching the status of deceased and resolved this variation in favor of the latter's employment by the Merchants' Improvement Company. Upon this variation respondents contend that the former testimony impeached the latter. Petitioner asserts that the court cannot be expected "to take this contention seriously" because "respondents cannot at this stage of the proceedings drag into the case testimony given before a coroner's inquest or any other testimony that has not heretofore been produced in the case."

The first question is whether the testimony given at the coroner's inquest was competent and was properly before the commission. It is hearsay testimony and was not admissible under the original act. In Eaglebretson v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 170 Cal. 793, 151 P. 421, it was held that the common law or statutory rule against the admission of hearsay evidence as proof of a fact under section 77 of this act (St. 1913, p. 279) is not a mere technical rule of evidence and that the commission has no power to make an award where the only evidence of a jurisdictional fact consists of hearsay testimony. The Legislature, however, has since expressly provided that:

"All hearings and investigations before the commission or any member thereof, or any referee appointed thereby, shall be governed by this act and by the rules of practice and procedure adopted by the commission, and in the conduct thereof neither the commission nor any member thereof, nor any referee appointed thereby, shall be bound by the common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure, but may make inquiry in such manner, through oral testimony and written and printed records, as is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and carry out justly the spirit and provisions of this act. * * * Stats. 1917, p. 871, § 60(a).

See, also, Perry v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 180 Cal. 497, 181 P. 788; McFeely v. Industrial Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 223 P. 413; Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 315, 163 P. 60; Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 179 Cal. 432, 177 P. 273; Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 180 Cal. 497, 181 P. 788; State Compensation Insurance Fund v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 996.

Petitioner's contention, however, is that the testimony was not "admitted," since "there is absolutely no stipulation or admission upon the part of petitioner that the testimony attributed to R. Smith was as a matter of fact R. Smith's testimony"; that it is not hearsay testimony for the reason that no witness has testified that they heard R. Smith give any such testimony; and that although petitioner was aware of the fact that such testimony was desired by the commission and actually assisted the commission in obtaining a copy of it, it did not know and was not able to ascertain until one day before the oral argument in this court that it had been included in the return to the writ of review. The question whether this testimony was properly made a part of the return was first discussed during the oral argument herein and the point was thereafter taken up in the briefs filed. No objection was made to this testimony in the petition for a writ of review, and we have just called attention to petitioner's claim that it did not know it was included in the return until the day before the oral argument. The brief of respondents states that the Continental Casualty Company was notified of their desire to procure a copy of such testimony and quotes the response in the form of a letter which reads as follows:

"With reference to your letter of April 19th beg to advise that the writer was in Sacramento the latter part of last week. While there a call was made on the coroner in an effort to speed the forwarding to you of copy of inquest. At that time the coroner's records were checked up and it was noted that request had been made by the Industrial Accident Commission that they be furnished with such copy. It seems, however, that the reporter who writes up the notes of the proceedings is insisting on $3 fee for transcription. The coroner, however, advises me that he would endeavor to get a copy forwarded to you soon and I trust that it will reach you in the near future."

The return recites the testimony of R. Smith before the coroner's inquest and contains the following purported filing mark already set forth: "Served and filed April 28, 1924." It is represented in respondents' brief that copies of such testimony were sent by mail to the three principal parties and that only the one addressed to Josephine Ford was returned unclaimed by the post office department. Petitioner does not state that the copy was not actually received by it, the burden of its claim being that the testimony had no place in the return and was therefore for the reasons already stated not even hearsay. It may be conceded that the manner in which the testimony in question was received was informal. A more satisfactory way and one more in keeping with orderly procedure would have been to have given notice of intention to reopen the case for the admission of certain supplemental testimony and on the day noticed to produce the coroner or other competent witness with the transcript of the proceedings of the inquest properly certified, and also prove that the R. Smith who gave the testimony at such proceeding concerning the status of the deceased and the R. Smith who testified before the commission were identical.

It was realized by the Legislature, however, that in proceedings before the commission there will be occasional departures from rules of evidence and procedure, and hence section 60a of the act also provides:

"No informality in any proceeding or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order, decision, award, rule or regulation made, approved or confirmed by the commission; nor shall any order, award, rule or regulation be invalidated because of the admission into the record, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, of any evidence not admissible under the said common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure." Stats. 1917, p. 871.

[1] While the terms of this section are broad and comprehensive, covering as they do the admission into the record and use as proof of any fact in dispute of any evidence objectionable under the common law and statutory rules, yet it was not intended thereby that it would be any the less the duty of the commission to follow the prescribed procedure and rules of evidence. In other words, it still remains the duty of the commission to conduct the proceedings so that there will be as little occasion as possible for the courts to resort to the said rule of decision.

But apart from this rule of decision we cannot perceive how petitioner has any substantial ground of complaint. Petitioner was put upon notice by respondents indicating that the testimony at the coroner's inquest was desired. It is not stated that such testimony was not filed in the commission nor actually received by petitioner; if it was received by petitioner, any objection thereto, either to its substance or the form in which it was presented, should have been made to the commission so that if well founded it might be obviated. No such objection was made. In such a situation it was incumbent on petitioner, if it had not done so, to make inquiry as to the purpose for which the supplemental testimony was sought and to acquaint itself with the manner of its introduction. Moreover, petitioner does not claim that the same R. Smith did not testify before both tribunals; that the coroner's transcript was not in fact filed; that the testimony was not given by Smith; that it was not correct or that it was not a true copy. The contention is, as already stated, that it was not evidence at all on the question of fact whether the deceased was the employee of the Merchants' Improvement Company.

[2-4] Assuming that the admission and consideration of this evidence by the commission was irregular, we think the objection made by petitioner comes too late. It does not appear that any objection was made by petitioner at any time to the admission of the testimony as evidence in the case prior to the oral argument, nor that petitioner in the petition for rehearing requested permission to cross-examine the said witness. Approximately 25 days elapsed between the time the testimony was filed and the making of the findings and award. Furthermore, a rehearing was granted thereafter and apparently no objection was made to such testimony. The commission found "that no good reason exists for taking further testimony" and entered the final award on July 2, 1924, approximately 60 days after the transcript of the testimony was filed. Petitioner did not object to such testimony on the ground it was not certified. The return does not show it was certified, but it purports to be a copy of the testimony "In the matter of the inquisition upon the body of Wilbur Ford" and it would be yielding form to substance to assume it was not evidence in the case filed with the commission at the time the findings were made.

We conclude that the copy of the transcript of the testimony which purports to have been given at the coroner's inquest is hearsay testimony but admissible; that it was filed as evidence in the proceedings before the commission April 28, 1924, and was properly included in the return to the writ of review; that the petitioner does not claim it did not have notice that such copy was filed, and knowledge that it would be included in the return to the writ of review will therefore be imputed; that while its admission was attended with informality and irregularity the petitioner made no objection thereto and it must therefore be deemed to have waived all objection to the manner of taking such testimony and its admission into the record.

[5] It follows that there being a conflict in the evidence as shown by the return to the writ of review, on the question of the employer of the deceased, and the commission having found that the Merchants' Improvement Company was the employer, insured by the Continental Casualty Company, the award based upon such finding must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MYERS, C. J. I dissent.

Waiving all questions relating to the admissibility and use as evidence of the purported copy of the testimony at the coroner's inquest, and assuming that the witness R. Smith actually made the statements at the inquest which he is here assumed to have made, I am of the opinion that it appears from the record herein that the respondent commission was without jurisdiction to render the award for the reason that the relationship of employer and employee was not shown to have existed between the Merchants' Improvement Company, owner of the building, and the deceased employee. It is true that the Legislature by the amendments to the Workmen's Compensation Act has abrogated, for the purpose of hearings before the Industrial Accident Commission, all of the common law and statutory rules of evidence and procedure, and has provided no other rules of evidence to take the place thereof. It cannot have been intended, however, to vest the commission with authority to render an award without the production of some evidence of some sort reasonably tending to prove the existence of the jurisdictional facts, one of which in each such case is the relationship of employee and employer between the injured person and the one from whom compensation is sought. If such were the intention it would be ineffective under the limitations of our Constitution (Const. art. 20, § 21; Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 P. 218; Pacific G. & E. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 180 Cal. 497, 181 P. 788; Worswick Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 181 Cal. 550, 185 P. 953; Flickenger v. Industrial Acc. Com., 181 Cal. 425, 184 P. 851, 19 A. L. R. 1150; Fidelity & C. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 191 Cal. 404, 216 P. 578. The authority and duty still rests in this court upon proper application and showing, to review an award of the respondent commission. Such review looks to the question of jurisdiction, and, notwithstanding the abrogation of the common law and statutory rules of evidence, it is still the duty of the court upon such review to annul an award where the record shows that there was no evidence of any sort having a reasonable tendency to establish the existence of an essential jurisdictional fact.

The statement of the witness Smith at the coroner's inquest that "Mr. Ford was employed by the California Fruit people and under my direction. * * * This man was working under my instruction as a janitor" was obviously made merely by way of identification of the deceased. It was no more than a conclusion of the witness, a mixed conclusion of law and fact, and there is nothing in the record to indicate that this witness had the slightest comprehension of the legal distinction between the rendition of service in the capacity of an employee and the rendition of similar service in the capacity of an independent contractor. I doubt that the quoted statement may even be justly regarded as tending substantially to impeach the testimony later given by this witness before the commission. The later testimony was as to facts rather than conclusions, and from the facts so testified to by him the conclusion would inevitably follow that he was an independent contractor and that the deceased was his employee. Conceding, however, that his testimony before the commission was impeached by the quoted statements made by him at the coroner's inquest, there remains in the record the testimony of Martin and Erhardt, whose testimony was in nowise impeached and who testified to facts and circumstances from which, if true, no conclusion can be drawn other than that Smith was an independent contractor and the deceased his employee. This testimony being in nowise impeached and in nowise inherently improbable, the commission was bound to accept it as true unless it was substantially contradicted. 10 Cal. Juris., 1143; Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 411, 221 P. 191, and cases cited. I cannot regard the quoted testimony of Smith as a substantial contradiction thereof and I therefore think that the award herein should be annulled.

MARTIN v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (Sac. 3696.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 3, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ☞659(3)—Motion for diminution of record and insertion of matter in transcript on file in appellate court denied.

Motion for diminution of record and insertion in transcript on file in appellate court of instructions offered and refused in trial court, and clerk's record of order denying motion for new trial, and specification of grounds thereof, accompanied by copies of papers on file in trial court, and certified by clerk to be correct, will be denied, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 953a et seq., and amendment to Code, providing for review of order denying new trial on appeal from judgment, where matter sought to be inserted was not included in reporter's transcript, settled by judge of trial court.

2. Appeal and error ☞612(2)—Clerk can authenticate for record on appeal only judgment roll and notice of appeal.

Only portions of record which clerk is competent to authenticate for record on appeal are judgment roll and notice of appeal.

3. Appeal and error ☞616(1)—Trial judge's action necessary to make papers part of reporter's transcript.

Only means by which copies of papers on file in trial court and certified by clerk to be correct purporting to be instructions refused, notice of motion, and order denying new trial, could properly be made a part of reporter's transcript, would be by action of trial judge, including them therein, and certifying to their correctness.

4. Appeal and error ☞659(3)—Application for relief from mistake for failure to include papers in reporter's transcript to be made to trial court.

If papers purporting to be instructions refused, notice of motion, and order denying new trial were omitted from reporter's transcript, as settled by trial judge, through mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, application for relief therefrom should be made in first instance to trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Henry Alan Martin, a minor, by and through P. R. Merrill, as guardian of his estate, against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On defendant's motion for diminution of record and to insert matter in transcript. Motion denied.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, and T. J. Straub, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1-4] This matter comes up on a suggestion by appellant of diminution of the record and motion to insert in the transcript now on file in this court the instructions offered by the party at the trial below and refused by the judge and also the clerk's record of the order denying motion for new trial and the specification of grounds of the motion. This motion is accompanied by copies of papers on file in the trial court and certified by the clerk to be correct, purporting to be instructions refused, notice of motion for new trial, and order denying motion for new trial, respectively. The record upon this appeal was prepared under the provisions of section 953a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. The papers specified in the motion, in order to be available to appellant for use upon this appeal, should have been included in reporter's transcript, settled by the judge of the trial court. Section 953a provides for the inclusion in the reporter's transcript of "all rulings, instructions, acts or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate. * * *" The instructions are thus expressly provided for, and, since the amendment of the Code to provide for a review of an order denying a new trial upon appeal from the judgment, the order upon the motion therefor is in effect a ruling of the court, and the notice of intention to move for a new trial is in the nature of a supporting paper, and is a matter to which the ruling relates. The only portions of the record which the clerk is competent to authenticate for the purpose of a record on appeal are the judgment roll and the notice of appeal. Therefore, if the papers here involved should be inserted in the clerk's transcript, they could not be considered as a part of the record upon appeal. Richmond v. Julian Consolidated Min. Co., 176 Cal. 600, 169 P. 356; Barnabee v. Hunstock, 42 Cal. App. 659, 183 P. 951. The only means by which these papers may properly be made a part of the reporter's transcript is by the action of the trial judge including them therein and certifying to their correctness. Bell v. Brigance (Cal. Sup.) 229 P. 27. If these papers were omitted from the reporter's transcript, as settled by the trial judge, through mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, application for relief therefrom should be made in the first instance to the trial court. In the absence of action thereon by the trial court, or the trial judge, the insertion of these papers in the transcript would add nothing to the authentic record upon appeal.

The motion is denied.

DIAMOND MATCH CO. v. SANITARY FRUIT CO. (Civ. 2786.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 22, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 19, 1925.)

1. Mechanics' liens ⇐3—Right to lien is guaranteed by Constitution, manner of enforcement being committed to Legislature.

Right of mechanics, materialmen, etc., to a lien on property is guaranteed by Const. art. 20, § 15, and Legislature is required to establish a reasonably framed system for enforcement of right, and is not vested with arbitrary power or discretion.

2. Mechanics' liens ⇐3—Legislature cannot impair right to lien or unduly hamper its exercise.

Legislature cannot impair or unduly hamper exercise of right to lien guaranteed by Const. art. 20, § 15.

3. Mechanics' liens ⇐3—Statute adopted to prevent denial of benefit of lien for immaterial mistakes.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1203, as added by St. 1907, p. 858, and re-enacted by St. 1911, p. 1319, § 12, and St. 1911, p. 1319, § 14, relating to mistakes in notice of mechanics' liens, were adopted to prevent a denial of benefit of lien duly filed for immaterial mistakes or errors in taking of steps prescribed or doing things required to perfect lien.

4. Mechanics' liens ⇐3—Legislature, in adopting means for enforcement of liens, required to protect rights of owners of property.

Legislature, in adopting means for enforcement of liens, given by Const. art. 20, § 15, must protect rights of owners of property which may be affected thereby.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇐159—Act of filing notice of lien constitutes "constructive notice."

Act of filing notice of lien as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, constitutes "constructive notice" to owners and others.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Constructive Notice.]

6. Mechanics' liens $\Leftrightarrow$ 159—Filing of claim of lien in recorder's office intended to protect owner and those dealing with him.

Filing of claim of lien in recorder's office is intended to protect owner of property against double payment to contractor or payment for his services and materials in excess of what his contract calls for, and for protection of those who may deal with owner of property.

7. Mechanics' liens $\Leftrightarrow$ 137(1)—Statutory requirement, that claim of lien shall contain name of owner or reputed owner, must be complied with.

Requirement of Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, that claim of lien shall contain name of owner or reputed owner of property, must be complied with to perfect lien, where such owner is known to claimant.

8. Mechanics' liens $\Leftrightarrow$ 155—Statute requiring county recorders to keep an index of notices of mechanics' liens construed.

Under Pol. Code, § 4132, subd. 16, requiring county recorders to keep an index of notices of mechanics' liens, owner of property is not required to make any further inquiry as to liens than an examination of such index.

9. Mechanics' liens $\Leftrightarrow$ 137(2)—Notice of claim of lien, in which claimant inserted its own name as that of owner, held insufficient.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing that notice of lien shall contain name of owner or reputed owner of property, notice containing statement of all matters required, except that claimant inserted its own name as that of owner, was insufficient, and name of owner could not be read into notice, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1203, as added by St. 1907, p. 858 and re-enacted in St. 1911, p. 1319, § 12, and St. 1911, p. 1319, § 14.

10. Mechanics' liens $\Leftrightarrow$ 137(2)—Statement of name of owner in caption of notice insufficient.

As index of notices of mechanics' liens is required only to contain name of parties against whom lien is claimed, parties claiming lien, an indication of time of filing claim and book in recorder's office in which it may be found, statement of name of owner in caption does not cure error in name in body of notice.

11. Mechanics' liens $\Leftrightarrow$ 137(2)—Caption of claim of materialman's lien and attached account held insufficient to show that defendant was owner of property.

Caption of claim of materialman's lien and notation at head of itemized statement of account attached thereto, purporting to designate building for construction of which materials were furnished, held insufficient to show that defendant was owner of property.

12. Mechanics' liens $\Leftrightarrow$ 157(1)—Equity without power to protect lien claimant, if default or neglect material to perfection of lien.

Equity is without power to protect a lien claimant against consequences of material defects in notice of lien, unless defect is within scope of Code Civ. Proc. § 1203, as added by St. 1907, p. 858, and re-enacted by St. 1911, p. 1319, § 12, and St. 1911, p. 1319, § 14, providing that certain errors shall not invalidate lien.

13. Constitutional law $\Leftrightarrow$ 70(1)—Courts cannot change requirements of statute as to perfecting of mechanics' liens or change claim of lien.

Courts cannot change requirements of statute as to perfecting of mechanics' liens or change claim of lien in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1858.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by the Diamond Match Company against the Sanitary Fruit Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, and James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

HART, J. This action was brought to foreclose a materialmen's lien, filed against certain real property situated in the town of Red Bluff, Tehama county.

The second amended complaint states that, on or about the 9th day of October, 1920, one Jasper W. Bandy entered into a contract with plaintiff whereby the latter agreed to furnish and did furnish and deliver to Bandy lumber and building material of the agreed value of $3,209.58, to be used for the erection of a building for the defendant, Sanitary Fruit Company, on the real property specifically described in the complaint; that the latter, at the time said building material was being furnished, knew that the same was being used by said Bandy in the construction of a building on said Sanitary Fruit Company's real property; that said Fruit Company has not paid the sum due for said lumber, etc., although demand for such payment has been made. Other essential facts in an action of the character of this are alleged, and then the complaint avers that the structure was completed on the 15th day of March, 1921, and that within 90 days after such completion plaintiff filed in the office of the county recorder of Tehama county its claim of lien against said land and building. It is further alleged that said claim of lien, which is annexed to the complaint and made a part thereof, contained all the matters which the statute in such cases requires. It is further alleged that no notice of the completion of the building was ever filed in the office of the county recorder as required by the lien law; that the defendant fruit company, at the time of the filing and recording of the claim of lien by plaintiff, was indebted to said Bandy for erecting said building in the sum of $3,209.58.

Defendant, Sanitary Fruit Company, demurred to the second amended complaint on the general ground. The demurrer being overruled said defendant filed an answer denying specifically the averments of the complaint and setting up a special or an affirmative defense, the nature of which, as will presently be seen, is not of material importance in the decision of the case. After introducing testimony showing that building materials had been furnished Bandy to be used in the erection of a warehouse on the real property described in the complaint, that said materials were so used, the value thereof and that the same had not been paid for, the plaintiff offered the purported notice of lien in evidence. This offer was objected to by counsel for the defendant, Sanitary Fruit Company, on the ground that in a certain material particular the instrument did not and does not comply with the requisites of the statute governing the preparation and filing of such liens and that it was, therefore, void and without legal force. The court sustained the objection. The defendant thereupon moved for a nonsuit and the motion was granted. The appeal here is by the plaintiff from the judgment entered upon the order granting the nonsuit.

Thus the sole question presented for our solution is whether the purported notice or claim of lien complies with section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure setting forth the matters to be contained in such an instrument. Said section provides, in part, as follows:

"Every original contractor, claiming the benefit of this chapter, within sixty days after the completion of his contract, and every person save the original contractor claiming the benefit of this chapter, at any time after he has ceased to perform labor or furnish material, or both, for any work or improvement mentioned in this chapter, and until thirty days after the completion of such work or improvement, may file for record with the county recorder of the county or city and county in which such property or some part thereof is situated a claim of lien containing a statement of his demand after deducting all just credits and offsets, the name of the owner or reputed owner, if known, a general statement of the kind of work done or materials furnished by him, or both, the name of the person by whom he was employed or to whom he furnished the materials, and a description of the property sought to be charged with the lien sufficient for identification; which claim of lien must be verified by oath of claimant or some other person."

The instrument filed for record by the plaintiff as a claim or notice of lien sets forth that the materials therein referred to were furnished by plaintiff to Bandy, the contractor, to be used and that they were actually used in the construction of the building on the real property described therein, and states in detail the terms of the contract between plaintiff and said Bandy for the furnishing of said materials. In brief, the instrument contains a statement of all the matters required to be set forth in such an instrument by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, with a single exception, to wit, the name of the owner or reputed owner of the real property against which a lien was sought by plaintiff to be filed, and as to that requirement the document attempts to comply therewith in the following fashion, "The Diamond Match Company, a corporation, is the name of the owner and reputed owner of said contractor." The instrument is entitled, "The Diamond Match Company, a Corporation, v. Sanitary Fruit Company, a Corporation, and Jasper W. Bandy, also known as J. W. Bandy." Attached to the lien is an itemized statement of the materials furnished, and this statement is under the following heading: "Sold to J. W. Bandy—Tag No. — Job: Sanitary Fruit Company. Warehouse." The plaintiff contends that the foregoing statement in the purported claim of lien and the itemized statement of the account attached thereto clearly show that a clerical mistake was made by inserting its own name instead of that of the defendant as the owner of the property (or of the "contractor," as the instrument reads), and that the mistake is one which falls with-in the spirit, though confessedly not with-in the letter, of section 1203 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was added to our Mechanic's Lien Law by the Legislature of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 858) and re-enacted by the Legislature of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1319). Said section provides:

"No mistake or errors in the statement of the demand, or of the amount of credits and offsets allowed or of the balance asserted to be due to claimant, nor in the description of the property against which the claim is filed, shall invalidate the lien, unless the court finds that such mistake or error in the statement of the demand, credits and offsets, or of the balance due, was made with the intent to defraud, or the court shall find that an innocent third party, without notice, direct or constructive, has since the claim was filed, become the bona fide owner of the property lien-ed upon, and that the notice of claim was so deficient that it did not put the party upon further inquiry in any manner."

It will be noted that within the mistakes or errors enumerated by the above section, which will not be treated as having the effect of invalidating a claim of lien, is not included a mistake or error in stating the name of the owner or the reputed owner of the property to which it is intended that a lien shall attach. It is the contention that, since it is clear from the whole instrument that the insertion of its own name therein as the owner was purely a mistake on the part of the plaintiff, and that likewise it is clear that the owner or reputed owner is the defendant, the broad and liberal principle underlying section 1203 should be applied, and the name of the defendant read into the document as the owner or reputed owner of the property. That this should be done, so it is argued, is further emphasized by section 14 of the Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, pp. 1319-20), which declares, among other things, that the provisions of the lien law "shall be liberally construed with a view to effect its purpose."

[1-3] The right of mechanics, materialmen, etc., to a lien upon property upon which they have bestowed labor, or in the improvement of which material which they have furnished have been used, for the value of such labor or materials, is guaranteed by the Constitution, the mode and manner of the enforcement of such right being committed to the Legislature. Article 20, § 15, Const. Manifestly, the Legislature is not thus vested with arbitrary power or discretion in attending to this business. Indeed, rather than power so vested in the Legislature, it is a command addressed by the Constitution to the lawmaking body to establish a reasonably framed system for enforcing the right which the organic law vouchsafes to the classes named. Clearly, it is not within the right or province of the Legislature, by a cumbersome or ultratechnical scheme designed for the enforcement of the right of lien, to impair that right or unduly hamper its exercise. Every provision of the law which the Legislature may enact for the enforcement of the liens mentioned in section 15 of article 20 of the Constitution must be subordinate to and in consonance with that constitutional provision. Hampton v. Christensen, 148 Cal. 729, 737, 84 P. 200. The rules embraced in section 1203 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 14 of the Act of 1911, supra, were adopted to prevent a denial of the benefit of a lien duly filed, merely because of immaterial or unsubstantial mistakes or errors in the taking of the steps prescribed or doing the things required to perfect a lien.

[4-8] But, while all that has been said above is true, it will not be denied that it is no less the duty of the Legislature, in adopting means for the enforcement of the liens referred to in the constitutional provision, to consider and protect the rights of owners of property which may be affected by such liens than it is to consider and protect the rights of those claiming the benefit of the lien laws. The liens which are filed under the lien law against property, as a general rule, grow out of contracts which are made by and between lien claimants and persons (contractors) other than the owner of the property so affected, and such liens may be filed and so become a charge against property without the owner having actual knowledge thereof. The act of filing, as the law requires, constitutes constructive notice to the owners and others that the property stands embarrassed with a charge which will operate as a cloud upon the title thereof so long as the lien remains undischarged, and that the property may be sold under foreclosure proceedings unless the debt to secure which the lien was filed is otherwise sooner satisfied. The filing of the claim in the recorder's office is intended to protect the owner of the property against double payment to the contractor or payment for his services and the materials he uses in the work of improvement in excess of what his contract calls for. The notice is also intended for the protection of those who may, as to such property, deal with the owner thereof—that is, third persons as purchasers or mortgagees. Corbett v. Chambers, 109 Cal. 178, 182-183, 41 P. 873; Wyman v. Quayle, 9 Wyo. 326, 63 P. 988. For these reasons, the requirement that the claim of lien shall contain the name of the owner or the reputed owner of the property is imperative, and must be complied with, where such owner is known to the claimant, to perfect the lien. Hooper v. Flood, 54 Cal. 218; West Coast Lumber Co. v. Newkirk, 80 Cal. 275, 22 P. 231; Palmer v. Lavigne, 104 Cal. 30, 37 P. 775; Corbett v. Chambers, supra; Bryan v. Abbott, 131 Cal. 222, 63 P. 363; Lucas v. Gobbi, 10 Cal. App. 650, 103 P. 157; Malter v. Falcon Min. Co., 18 Nev. 209, 2 P. 50; Blattner v. Wadleigh, 48 Kan. 290, 29 P. 165, 167; Gordon v. Deal, 23 Or. 153, 31 P. 287; White v. Mullins, 3 Idaho, 434, 31 P. 801; Wyman v. Quayle, supra. The importance of this requirement and the necessity of complying with it are emphasized by section 4132, subd. 16, of the Political Code, which provides that—every recorder (of the counties) "must keep * * * an index of notices of mechanics' liens, labeled 'Mechanics' Liens,' each page divided into three columns, headed, respectively: 'Parties against Whom Claimed,' 'Parties Claiming Liens,' 'Notices—When and Where Recorded.'"

What is said in Corbett v. Chambers, supra, speaking of a section of the Political Code, then known and numbered as "4236, subd. 16," which was substantially in the same language as subdivision 16 of section 4132, supra, is equally pertinent here:

"It is by this index that a subsequent dealer with the property is to be guided in ascertaining whether there are any incumbrances upon the owner's title, and it is apparent that this index would afford no notice to subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers if the owner whose name is to be stated in the claim is one who at some previous time had been owner, but who had long prior to filing the claim parted with all interest in the property."

See, also, Wyman v. Quayle, supra.

It is clear that it was intended by subdivision 16 of section 4132 that the owner of the property, so far as are concerned incumbrances of the character of those with which property may be charged under the lien law, is not required to make any further inquiry into the status of the title to his property than an examination of the index prescribed by said section.

[9] In the instant case, the owner of the property, or any other person in a deal with the owner affecting the property, would be justified in at once concluding, upon an examination of the recorder's index of liens to ascertain whether the property had been charged with a lien, that the property was entirely free from embarrassments in the form of liens authorized by section 15 of article 20 of the Constitution. The name "John Doe," or "John Smith," in the claim of lien herein involved in the place of that of the plaintiff in the recorder's index would convey no less accurate information as to the identity of the real or the reputed owner of the property than does the name of the plaintiff.

[10, 11] The claim that the caption of the claim of lien, considered with the notation on the itemized statement of the demand, as above indicated, sufficiently shows that the defendant is or was the owner of the property, is subject to several answers. The first is that the law does not require that the caption of the claim of lien or the itemized account or demand should itself be included in the index, except in so far as the index is to be regarded as involving a reference to the entire document and its contents. In other words, the index to which alone the owner or an interested party is required to look to learn whether the property has been and is charged with a lien, is required only to contain the name of the party or parties against whom the lien is claimed, the party or parties claiming the lien, and an indication of the time of filing the claim and where and in what book in the recorder's office it may be found. Secondly, it cannot be told from the caption whether the Sanitary Fruit

Company or J. W. Bandy is such owner or reputed owner. Indeed, it cannot be told from the caption whether either is the owner or the reputed owner thereof. The same is to be said of the notation at the head of the itemized statement of the account purporting to designate the particular building for the construction of which the materials were furnished. These matters could go no further, even if to that extent, than affording an inference that the Sanitary Fruit Company and J. W. Bandy, or one or the other, might have some sort of interest in the property or the building, but such inference is entirely too remote and indefinite to justify a definite finding or conclusion that either or both is or are the owner or owners or reputed owner or owners of the property, and such inference might lead to a false conclusion.

In Malter v. Falcon Min. Co., supra, the notice of lien contained the declaration that the claimants intend "to hold and claim a lien upon * * * that certain Howland pulverizing and wet crushing and amalgamating mill, situated in Rock creek, on the millsite owned or claimed by the Falcon Mining Company, in Elko county, state of Nevada." The Supreme Court of Nevada, by Hawley, C. J., answering the contention that the foregoing statement in the claim of lien was a sufficient identification of the owner of the property upon which the labor was bestowed and for which materials were furnished by the contractors, the lien claimants, said:

"There is no statement that the Falcon Mining Company is the owner, or the reputed owner, of the mill. The question of ownership is left to inference only, and the inference to be drawn from such a statement that the Falcon Mining Company is the owner, or reputed owner, of the property, may or may not be true. It does not necessarily follow that because the company claims to be the owner of the millsite, that it is the owner, or reputed owner, of the mill erected thereon." (Italics ours.)

In White v. Mullins, supra, there was an omission to state the name of the owner or reputed owner in the notice of lien, and there was no statement therein that the owner or reputed owner was unknown to the claimants. The notice of lien was entitled "White and Mallison, Subcontractors and Claimants, v. R. J. Bledsoe, Contractor, and B. G. Mullins, Owner." The Idaho statute prescribing the essentials of a claim of lien was substantially in the same language as is our section 1187. It was contended in that case that the name of the owner was sufficiently shown by and so could readily be ascertained from the caption of the claim as filed for record, and as indicated above. The court said:

"It can hardly be claimed that the descriptive personae at the head of the notice [here follows the caption as above shown] is a direct and unequivocal allegation of the name of the owner."

It is true that the rule in Idaho was that the lien laws should be strictly construed. Possibly that rule was grounded on the reason that the right of lien was given by statute and not by the Constitution. But be that as it may, the significance of the utterance of the Idaho Supreme Court, as given above, is in the importance attached to the requirement that the name of the owner or the reputed owner, if known to the lien claimant, shall clearly be made to appear in the claim of lien.

In Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Co. v. Lyons, 133 Cal. 114, 119, 65 P. 329, cited by appellant as presenting a situation analogous to that which appears herein, one Ellen Lyons was the owner of the property to which the lien attached in her separate right. The trial court found that her husband was the reputed owner of the property involved at the time the contract for the improvement of the same was made and that "he, both in his own individual behalf, and as the ostensible agent of his wife, Ellen, and in her behalf, though in his own name, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff for the performance" of the work. The court said:

"If plaintiff made any mistake in thus stating the ownership, it was an honest one, and in no sense was it fraudulently made, or made for the purpose of deceiving any person, and the mistake could not prejudice his right to a lien. * * * It has been held * * * that if the lienholder in good faith 'gives the name of the reputed owner, he shall not lose his lien if he shall afterward ascertain that some other person was the owner.' Corbett v. Chambers, 109 Cal. 178."

In the present case, as will be noted, the notice or claim of lien does not state either the name of the owner or the reputed owner of the property, nor is it therein stated that the owner or reputed owner or the name of such owner or reputed owner is or was unknown to the claimant. Indeed, according to the complaint, the plaintiff could not have honestly made such a statement in the claim of lien, for that pleading unequivocally states that:

"The defendant, Sanitary Fruit Company, a corporation, was, at the time of the making of said contract and at the time of the delivery of said lumber and building material upon the land hereinafter described, and now is the owner and the reputed owner of said property."

If the claim of lien in this case had stated that "the Sanitary Fruit Company, a corporation, is the owner or reputed owner of the contractor," we would then have a case which would probably come within the spirit or contemplation of section 1203 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 14 of the Act of 1911, supra, and also a case something like that of McDonald v. Backus, 45 Cal. 262, 264, cited by appellants here, wherein the lien claimant, in stating the name of the contractor by whom he was employed to do certain work on the building constructed, used the word "occupied" instead of the word "employed," so that the claim read:

"* * * Swain is the name of the person by whom he (plaintiff) was 'occupied.'"

While there is no express statement in the opinion itself to that effect, we think the reporter's interpretation in the syllabus of the opinion that "a mere mistake in the use of a word in a claim of lien filed to secure a mechanic's lien will not vitiate it, but the court will insert the word intended to be used," is a fair and reasonable deduction from the opinion and that the conclusion that the mistake was immaterial is eminently sound.

In Allen v. Wilson, 178 Cal. 674, 678, 174 P. 661, 663, the following statement from West Coast Lumber Co. v. Newkirk, 80 Cal. 277, 22 P. 231, is approved:

"The plaintiff [lien claimant] is only required to state names mentioned (owner, etc.), if known. If the names are not known the claim filed is sufficient if it is silent on the subject."

That case has no application here, however. As shown, the plaintiff did know, at the time it prepared and filed its notice of lien, the name of the owner or reputed owner of the property.

[12, 13] Appellant insists that this case should be disposed of on broad, equitable considerations, but such considerations can enter into the determination of the case only in so far as the lien statute itself permits it. The Legislature has introduced into the system for the enforcement of liens of mechanics, etc., the only equitable principles which can be invoked in the decision of any case arising under such statute in the rules enunciated in section 1203 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 14 of the Act of 1911, and unless the case is one which is subject to the mollifying influence of the rules declared in those sections, then, if the default or neglect be material to the perfection of a lien, it is beyond the remedial scope of equity, in the exercise of its usual powers, to protect the lien claimant against the untoward consequences of what may be and probably was his own neglect. The courts cannot read either into the statute or the claim of lien what is not there, nor take from either what is there. Code Civ. Proc. sec. 1858. If the courts may say that the name of the owner or reputed owner, where known by the claimant, need not be stated in the notice of lien, with equal reason may they hold that any other requisite of the statute need not be observed and followed. Indeed, the index of notices of liens required to be kept by the county recorder by subdivision 16 of section 4132 of the Political Code would be of little efficacy or its object wholly thwarted, if the provision of the lien law requiring the statement in the notice of lien of the name of the owner or reputed owner of the property to which the lien is to attach, may be held not to be a material requirement.

The judgment is affirmed.

JACOBS, MALCOLM & BURTT v. NORTHERN PAC. RY. CO. (Civ. 5011.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 30, 1925.)

1. Attachment ⚡7—Action, construed as tort in case of doubt and attachment, does not lie.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 537, if action is in tort, remedy of attachment does not lie, and, if any doubt arises as to nature of action, it shall be construed as tort.

2. Attachment ⚡5—Action against carrier held to sound in contract rather than in tort, rendering attachment proper.

In determining whether action was contract or tort as bearing on question whether issuance of attachment was proper, allegation that in consideration of reasonable hire carrier agreed to transport potatoes under standard ventilation, which meant that ventilators should be closed at 32° above zero and opened above that temperature, held, in absence of legal showing to contrary, to impose on carrier greater duty than law imposed, and to make action sound in contract rather than in tort for violation of public duty.

3. Attachment ⚡7—Whether action tort or contract not determined exclusively by language of complaint.

Whether action is founded in tort or upon contract as bearing on propriety of issuance of attachment is not to be determined exclusively from particular language in complaint, if it be made to appear that nature of obligation sued upon constitutes a tort.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Jacobs, Malcolm & Burtt, a partnership consisting of Albert J. Jacobs and Joseph Moyes against the Northern Pacific Railway Company. From an order denying its motion to dissolve attachment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. This is an appeal by the defendant railroad company from an order denying a motion to dissolve an attachment, issued in an action brought by plaintiff to recover of and from the defendant the sum of $371.25, as damages, for the breach of a contract, wherein, it is alleged, defendant agreed to give "standard ventilation" to a shipment of 403 sacks of potatoes which were being transported by defendant, as the initial carrier, from Wapato, Wash., to San Francisco.

Defendant is a foreign corporation and the issuance of the writ of attachment was predicated upon an affidavit, filed on behalf of plaintiff in which it was stated, in substance, that the action was upon contract against a defendant not residing in the state.

[1] The single question presented by the appeal is whether the action is upon contract or in tort. If it be an action in tort, the remedy of attachment does not lie. Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, 166 P. 1; Mudge v. Steinhart, 78 Cal. 34, 20 P. 147; Code Civ. Proc. § 537. And, if any doubt arises as to the nature of the action, it should be construed as one in tort. 10 Cor. Jur. 1026. But, if the action be one upon contract, appellant concedes that the motion for the dissolution of attachment was properly denied.

[2] It is the contention of appellant that the respondent's cause of action is the common one against the carrier to recover damages for injury to goods while in transit, and is therefore founded upon a breach of public duty, which constitutes a tort. 10 Cor. Jur. 107; 4 Cal. Jur. 868; Civ. Code, § 2194. With respect to that it may be granted that it is the carrier's duty, independent of contract, to properly ventilate its cars in order to preserve perishable goods in transit, and that any failure to comply with such duty resulting in loss or injury to the shipper renders the carrier liable for the damage sustained. 10 Cor. Jur. 93.

In respondent's complaint it is alleged that—

"In consideration of certain reasonable hire and reward to be paid therefor" the defendant "promised and agreed to transport said potatoes under and give them 'standard ventilation.' That in and by the terms 'standard ventilation' was meant and intended, and was so understood by the parties hereto, that all ventilators on said car should be closed when the outside temperature fell to 32 degrees above zero; that all ventilators should be opened when the outside temperature rose above 32 degrees above zero."

We are of the opinion that, in the absence of any legal showing to the contrary, the contract pleaded in the complaint imposed upon the carrier a duty or obligation in respect to the goods beyond that which the law itself imposed, and which was of advantage to respondent; that, therefore, the action must be construed as one upon contract rather than one for the breach of carrier's public duty. Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) §§ 1331 and 1328, and cases cited. If the complaint had alleged merely that the appellant had failed to give the shipment "proper ventilation," or if there had been any contra showing made by affidavit or otherwise at the time this motion was presented to the effect that the obligation of the contract sued upon extended no farther than to require the performance of the common public duty, or if a sufficient averment of facts had been presented in that regard, to even raise a doubt upon that question, a different situation would be presented.

[3] Appellant contends, and correctly so, we think, that the question of whether or not the action is founded in tort or upon contract is not to be determined exclusively from the particular language employed in the complaint, if it be made to appear that the nature of the obligation sued upon constitutes a tort. Hallidie v. Enginger, supra. But, as before stated, there was nothing whatever before the trial court, and nothing here, by which such fact is made to appear. The allegations of respondents' complaint stand undisputed, and, in the absence of any evidence as a basis, we are not prepared to hold, as a matter of law, that the common public duty of a carrier to properly ventilate potato shipments requires that all ventilators should be closed when the outside temperature falls to 32 degrees above zero and shall be opened when the temperature rises above that degree.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Samuel W. Luitwieler against Sophia C. Luitwieler and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 57 Cal. App. 751, 207 P. 931.

Haas & Dunnigan, Bradner W. Lee, Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. S. Taylor and E. W. Forgy, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. There are four principal grounds advanced by appellant for reversal of the judgment herein. They are: First, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; second, that the court erred in denying appellant's motion for a nonsuit; third, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings; and, fourth, errors of law in admission and rejection of evidence.

[1] Considering these grounds in the order named, we will first take up the appellant's contention that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Among other things, the plaintiff has alleged, in his complaint, that respondent and appellant are husband and wife; that certain real property described therein is their community property; that said parties had entered into a written agreement of date August 7, 1912, concerning said real property, wherein they had agreed that the proceeds from the sale thereof, "whether in land, money or securities, shall be divided between the parties hereto share and share alike, each party to receive one-half thereof"; that appellant had received and used large sums of money coming into her hands from the sale of certain portions of said real property, over and above the amount to which she was entitled, and refused to account to plaintiff for any of the money so received by her; that she has taken in her own name notes and mortgages given to secure the purchase price of certain portions of said land sold by said parties; and that she has refused to execute deeds or to sell the remaining 40 acres of said land, or any portion thereof. In addition to these allegations, the complaint contains further statements that appellant had conspired with the defendant Henry L. Miller, the son-in-law of appellant and respondent, to defraud plaintiff of his interest in said lands, and in other property belonging to plaintiff. Appellant now contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action with respect to alleging fraud and conspiracy, and that the allegations of the complaint in other respects are so dependent upon those alleging fraud and conspiracy that it fails to state any cause of action whatever. In this contention of appellant we are unable to agree. The substance of these allegations of the complaint, after eliminating all reference to fraud and conspiracy, we have briefly stated above, and we think that they sufficiently state a cause of action against appellant. It may be that the complaint, when considered as a pleading charging fraud and conspiracy, is deficient, yet if it contains allegations which, independent of any fraud or conspiracy, set forth a legal demand against the defendant in favor of the plaintiff, a cause of action is stated therein. The position of appellant that such allegations are so dependent upon the allegations of fraud and conspiracy that they do not in themselves state a cause of action is untenable. Take, for instance, the allegation of the complaint that appellant has used large sums of money coming into her hands from the sale of the community property, and that she has used this money fraudulently and in furtherance of the conspiracy entered into between herself and the said Miller. The gist of this allegation is the illegal retention of all of the money by appellant. As far as the appellant is concerned, this injury to the plaintiff is the same, whether she unlawfully used this money in conspiracy with Miller, or whether she did so otherwise. Eliminate all reference to the conspiracy in the above allegation, and there still remains a sufficient material fact—the unlawful use of the money. We find this condition to exist generally throughout the complaint; that is, after striking therefrom all reference to any fraud or conspiracy, there is left a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a good cause of action in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant and appellant.

[2, 3] Under appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, she has specified some twelve instances wherein she contends that the evidence is lacking in this respect. We will consider briefly some of the more important of these specifications. Appellant first contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain or justify the finding that the notices from the defendant, and her acts, prevented the sale of any of the unsold portions of the land. The land described in said agreement had been purchased by the respondent, an undivided one-half thereof in the year 1889, and the balance in the year 1891. It was subdivided into lots and blocks, and a map thereof was made and filed for record in the office of the county recorder of the county of Los Angeles. After the subdivision of said lands and after the agreement of September 2, 1912, a number of lots therein were sold by the parties. These sales were made by deeds executed by both appellant and respondent in favor of the respective purchasers. In 1919 one Reese was acting as the agent of the parties for the sale of these lands. A short time prior to September 25, 1919, the respondent, in so far as he was able, made arrangements with the said Reese for the sale of the unsold portions of said lands and so advised appellant. Upon being notified of this fact, appellant wrote Reese on September 25, 1919, as follows:

"I am vested with all the right, title, and interest in and to the lots in question and you are not authorized to sell the same."

As a result of this letter received by Reese from appellant, no further sales were made of said lots. There was other evidence, some of which tended to show that the respondent had refused to sign any deeds to any of said lots during the year 1919. With this state of the evidence the court found that it was the acts of appellant which prevented the sale of the unsold portion of this land. As the evidence was conflicting, according to the well-established rule in such cases, this court will not disturb the finding of the trial court. There is a further finding that the sales were interrupted in the year 1919 by both parties joining in an oil lease to the Standard Oil Company. Appellant objects to this finding as unsupported by the evidence. Assuming that appellant is correct in this contention, we cannot see that any importance whatever can be attached to the fact found therein which would be of any advantage to appellant. If the lease to the Standard Oil Company did not prevent the sale of said land, then the action of appellant in notifying Reese on September 25, 1919, not to make any further sales of the lots in question, might be construed to be the sole cause which prevented the further sale of said land. The court further found that one of the purposes of making said agreement of September 2, 1912, was to settle and remove the objections of appellant to respondent involving said land in his manufacturing business, and it was the intention of the parties thereto to quickly dispose of all of the lands described therein. This finding, appellant contends, finds no support in the evidence. Respondent testified that "she objected to my putting any money in my business and that was the grounds of the agreement." The evidence further shows that at the time the agreement was made the lots were selling rapidly, and we can assume that the parties considered that this condition would continue. From this evidence, we are not prepared to say that the court was not justified in concluding that the parties, at the time they entered into the agreement, contemplated an early sale of all the property. Appellant also objects to the finding of the court that no complete account was kept after May, 1917, as unsupported by the evidence. It appears that after May, 1917, the books of account were kept by respondent himself, while residing in Rochester, N. Y., but only from data furnished him by appellant, who was carrying on the business in Los Angeles, Cal. There was evidence tending to prove that the appellant did not report to respondent all transactions which should properly be entered in the books, and for this reason no entry of the matters involved in those transactions was ever made in the books. This evidence was sufficient to support the finding last referred to, and, taken in connection with the additional proof that appellant claimed to be the sole owner of said property and entitled to all proceeds therefor, it justified the further finding of the court that appellant had received large sums of money from sales of said property, "of which plaintiff has no account and of which defendant has refused to give any account, and which she has without right appropriated to her own use and account." While the report of the referee, thereafter appointed by the court, cannot properly be considered primarily as any evidence tending to support this finding, the fact that this report of the referee (which was approved by the court) showed that the appellant had appropriated to her own use $15,353.55 is at least some confirmation of the court's conclusion in this matter. The other specifications of insufficiency of evidence have all been carefully considered by us. Some of the issues involved in these findings covered by these specifications are of little or no concern to either party in this controversy, and their determination one way or the other would not affect the ultimate results of this action. Those findings relating to matters of any material importance are supported by competent evidence. On the whole, we are satisfied that all the material findings in this action find reasonable and substantial support in the evidence.

[4] A large number of the rulings of the court on the admission and rejection of testimony are claimed by appellant to have been erroneous. These assignments are unsupported by any argument or citation of authority. The appellant, in her brief, has merely given the rulings of the court with a short statement of the evidence in connection with which each ruling was made. It is a well-established rule of the appellate courts of this state that questions thus presented should not receive consideration. 2 Cal. Juris. 732; Thomas v. Hacker, 179 Cal. 731, 178 P. 855. Nevertheless, we have examined the rulings questioned by appellant and discover no error therein to the prejudice of the appellant.

[5] In addition to the contentions of appellant set forth in the four grounds above stated, she further claims that the agreement of September 2, 1912, is a copartnership agreement, and that upon the dissolution of the copartnership formed thereby, there should be returned to her, before any division of the copartnership property is made to either of the parties, all property contributed by her to such copartnership. She further claims that the lands described in said agreement were her own separate property and that their value at the date of the agreement should first be paid to her, and, if, after making this payment to her, anything remains of the partnership property, it should be divided between herself and the respondent. This agreement of September 2, 1912, is as follows:

"Memorandum of agreement made this second day of September, 1912, between Samuel W. Luitwieler of the first part and Sophia C. Luitwieler, his wife, of the second part, witnesseth: That in consideration of one dollar by each to the other in hand paid at and before the ensailing and delivery of these presents, and of other good and valuable consideration, said parties have agreed and hereby agree that when their lands, known as the Whittier property, situated in the state of California, are finally sold or disposed of the net proceeds thereof after paying all liens and incumbrances thereon and expenses of sale—whether in land, money or securities, shall be equally divided between the parties hereto, share and share alike, each to receive one-half thereof.

"Witness our hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"Samuel W. Luitwieler. [L. S.]

"Sophia C. Luitwieler. [L. S.]"

There is nothing, in our opinion, contained in this agreement that would constitute the parties thereto a partnership. All it purports to do is to provide for a division of the net proceeds of the sale of the land described therein, equally between the parties thereto. This interpretation coincides with the testimony of the respondent, who stated that just prior to the execution of this agreement, "Mrs. Luitwieler asked me to make arrangements to give her half of that property.

* * * In response to that I sat down and wrote out the contract and said 'Take that to Mr. Bentley, our lawyer, and submit it to him.'" The contract thus referred to by the respondent was the agreement of September 2, 1912, slightly modified by Mr. Bentley. But, even if the transaction should be construed as a partnership, we find nothing in the evidence to justify appellant's claim that this property belongs to her as her separate estate. The evidence shows that this land was originally acquired by the respondent as the community property of himself and appellant, and in our opinion there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that it ever lost its character as community property. In the agreement itself, the parties thereto refer to it as "their lands." This reference would tend to negative the claim that the property was the separate estate of either of the parties. Therefore, to construe the agreement as creating a partnership between the parties would not benefit appellant's position.

[6, 7] The claim of appellant that a partnership existed between herself and respondent was not made in her original answer, but at the conclusion of the evidence the appellant was granted leave to amend her answer to conform to the proof, and thereafter, under this leave granted, she filed an amendment to her answer, wherein, for the first time, she set forth in her pleadings her contention that a partnership existed between herself and husband. The court made no findings upon the allegations of this amendment to her answer, and the appellant now assigns this failure of the court as prejudicial error entitling her to a reversal of the judgment. In this amendment to her answer, appellant set up the agreement of September 2, 1912, as the basis of her claim of the existence of this partnership. We think it apparent, as we have already stated, that this agreement wholly fails to establish any such partnership. Therefore the amendment failed to state facts sufficient to constitute any legal defense in said action, and the omission of the court to find upon any of the issues made by said amendment would not amount to error on its part. As the amendment failed to state any legal defense, its allegations were not material, and the court is not required to find upon any immaterial issue made by the pleadings.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HOLMES et al. (Cr. 1156.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 30, 1925.)

Rape — § 51(4)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of rape by force and threats of great bodily harm.

Evidence that prosecutrix traveled from place to place with defendant and his common-law wife, was constantly submitted to abuse and ill treatment by them, and continually under their surveillance, and that at time of alleged rape prosecutrix was in a delicate condition, held to sustain conviction of rape by force and by threats of great bodily harm, in violation of Pen. Code, § 261, subs. 3 and 4.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Don Holmes was convicted of rape, and he and Yetta Ratiante were convicted of contributing to the delinquency of a girl under the age of 21, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Shreve, Dorn, Shreve & Tyler, of San Diego, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged by information with having committed the crime of rape in violation of the provisions of subdivisions 3 and 4 of section 261 of the Penal Code, and was also charged jointly with one Yetta Ratiante with having contributed to the delinquency of a girl under the age of 21 years. Both defendants were convicted by a jury, and this appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying a motion for new trial upon the charge of rape.

The portions of said section which are relied upon by respondent read as follows:

"Rape is an act of sexual intercourse, accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, under either of the following circumstances:

"* * *

"3. Where she resists, but her resistance is overcome by force or violence;

"4. Where she is prevented from resisting by threats of great and immediate bodily harm, accompanied by apparent power of execution, * * *"

Appellant's contention in his brief is that the prosecutrix cohabited with him continuously for a period of about two years from March, 1922, until the 14th day of May, 1924, and that from that fact, coupled with all the evidence in the case, he succeeded in proving that there was no resistance, or prevention of resistance accompanied by apparent power of execution; that such a condition of depravity was shown to have existed that the jury concluded, contrary to the evidence, that he "should be in the penitentiary regardless of the fact that he had not committed the offense alleged." It is argued that the testimony of the prosecutrix was so inherently improbable and unworthy of belief that it should have been rejected, and that without it there was no proof of the exercise by appellant of any force or violence toward her.

The only authority attempted to be cited by appellant is section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, which he contends has been violated in spirit and intent by the failure of the trial court to grant him a new trial. This section provides that:

"No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

It is suggested that a proper understanding of the case requires a careful review of the entire record, in order to obtain an adequate and comprehensive knowledge of the facts. We are in accord with appellant's admonition, but are unable to conceive of a jury rendering a different verdict upon the sordid state of facts presented in this case.

Appellant's only defense consisted of an uncorroborated denial of the testimony of six witnesses, of documentary evidence and of circumstances, all of which tended to support the testimony of the prosecutrix in every material respect. She had been reared upon a farm in the state of Washington, to the age of 14, when she left home, and when appellant met her on the streets of Los Angeles one evening in June, 1922, she was apparently without experience, and without friends. Appellant was an itinerant painter, who was traveling from place to place with a common-law wife whom he hastily married in Imperial county about five days after the commission of the offense with which he is here charged. It was testified by the prosecutrix and by others, including disinterested witnesses who conducted road camps, that appellant traveled by automobile and slept in the same bed with both women for a period of two years; that he prevented other people from conversing with the prosecutrix, that he cursed her, compelled her to lift heavy trunks and ladders, and struck her. His consort joined him in preventing the girl's escape. One or the other held her when she attempted to leave them, and on at least two occasions sought her out and compelled her to return when she had obtained employment through the assistance of strangers whom she importuned to befriend her. Appellant attacked one Foughty for talking to the prosecutrix, striking him on the head with a board or club, and tried to shoot him, and it was during an altercation that officers were notified, which resulted in this prosecution.

Appellant had originally promised to carry the prosecutrix to her mother in Washington, according to her testimony, but, as they approached the northern part of this state, he would turn back. She would ask him when he expected to take her home, and he would offer some excuse. It appears from all the evidence that she was kept under constant surveillance, was enslaved and abused; that she was in fear of both the appellant and of his paramour. She testified that she hated him from the first, and that she fought him whenever he insisted upon illicit relations with her. Men who had traveled with them testified that at the times the prosecutrix was so severely mistreated by appellant that she would sob and become hysterical. In March, 1924, she gave birth to a child, and she testified that appellant had intercourse with her two days thereafter when she was ill.

On May 14, 1924, the night of the alleged offense, appellant was driving toward a camp in San Diego county, unaccompanied except by the prosecutrix. It appears that other members of the camp were driving another machine ahead of them. The girl swore that he stopped the car by the roadside, dragged her from the machine, and after a struggle succeeded in committing the offense. She stated that she fought him with all her strength, but that since the birth of her baby she had been weak; that he would hold her arms at times so that she could not move; that he threw her down, and tore some of her clothes to pieces; that thereafter he admonished her to tell others at the camp that he had been delayed by tire trouble. Foughty testified that the prosecutrix on the following day complained to him of appellant's cruelty, and told him of this latter occurrence.

Appellant testified in his own defense, making a complete denial of the use of profanity and tyranny toward the prosecutrix, although a careful review of the testimony of various witnesses shows convincingly that such conduct by him was common. He denied having written her from the county jail after his arrest, or having given letters to Edward Bishop; yet Bishop testified that he was confined in the jail with appellant for a time, and that on May 25, 1924, he wrote two letters "word for word" as dictated to him by appellant, and that the latter signed them; that appellant cautioned him that when released he should be very careful in smuggling them out of the jail, because if found they would go against appellant. These letters were taken from Bishop by the jailer and were produced in evidence. One was addressed to a woman by the name of Thompson, saying, among other things:

"You do all in your power to turn Hazel to drop these charges against me and my wife."
"Do all you can to get her away."

The other letter was addressed to the prosecutrix, stating:

"I want you to do everything I say." "Hazel, the best thing you can do is to drop these charges and skip out of the country." "Don't tell anybody about my forcing you to do anything with me."

Bishop testified that he wrote them for appellant because the latter was very nervous; that he told the witness to take the letters to prosecutrix and talk to her, to "see if you cannot get her out of the country."

Respondent relies upon People v. Bonzani, 24 Cal. App. 549, 141 P. 1062. The comparative strength of the parties was there an issue, it appearing that the woman was unusually large, while the prosecutrix in the case at bar was a slender girl weighing but 123 pounds. It was said in that case, however:

"It does not necessarily follow that, because a person may be of extraordinary avoirdupois, he is possessed of corresponding or even approximately corresponding physical strength and vigor. * * * Mrs. de Bell testified that she resisted the defendant with all her power and, by every means available to her, attempted to prevent him from accomplishing sexual relations with her. Moreover, she testified that she was very much frightened—in fact, so determined to accomplish his purpose did the defendant appear to be, she said, that she was in constant fear that he would inflict upon her serious bodily injury or perhaps might take her life. She described his appearance at the time as that of a man with a fixed determination to accomplish at any cost the act upon which his mind was set."

And, in announcing the rule, it was further said:

"So, in all such cases, of which this is typical, since there is evidence in the record tending to show that the prosecutrix was much frightened and terrified, it is always with the jury to say, where there is some credible evidence of the fact, whether the female was, at the time of the assault, possessed of such fear as would likely have the effect of impairing, if not altogether destroying, her ability to so resist her assailant as to prevent actual intercourse."

In the instant case the prosecutrix was confronted by two persons with whom she was compelled to contend much of the time, and experience had evidently convinced her that resistance was hopeless, and was usually productive of dire results. This fact, coupled with her delicate condition so soon after confinement, was sufficient to authorize the jury to conclude that her physical powers were of little avail as against the efforts of a man of ordinary strength. Appellant admitted that upon one occasion he knocked Foughty down, and from his continued life in the open, and the nature of his vocation, it is apparent that he possessed at least an average physique. It cannot be successfully denied that the jury was justified in believing that he perjured himself upon many of the material facts testified to by all the other witnesses, and from the entire record we think the jury was justly convinced that he falsified as to the one vital issue in the case. He emphatically denied under oath that he had ever had intercourse with the prosecutrix; yet it is conceded, and argued by his counsel as a ground for reversal, that appellant's cohabitation with her for a period of about two years was conclusive evidence of the absence of force or resistance.

We think the proof was amply sufficient to support the charge by the prosecution under both subdivisions 3 and 4 of section 261 of the Penal Code, and the judgments and orders denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by D. E. English against C. R. Shipley and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

U. G. Hayden, of Fresno, for appellants.

L. B. Hayhurst, and Harris & Hayhurst, all of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff sued to recover the amounts due on two promissory notes. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

The controversy arose out of a real estate transaction. An alfalfa farm near Fresno was owned by Mr. Mason. He entered into a contract by which he agreed to sell to J. J. Williams and R. L. Inman. Inman was to purchase an undivided two-thirds, and Williams was to purchase an undivided one-third. The terms of that instrument were such that the purchasers were to go into possession, and one-half of the alfalfa hay was to be delivered to Mr. Mason. After the purchasers had been in possession for a period of time they allowed C. R. Shipley to farm the alfalfa, harvest the hay, and deliver to Mr. Mason the portion to which he was entitled under the contract. After that arrangement had been followed for a while, on the 5th day of June, 1922, Shipley made oral contracts. By the terms of one agreement he agreed to purchase the two-thirds interest of Inman, and by the terms of another agreement he agreed to purchase the one-third interest of Williams. As to Williams the purchase price was $933. Of that sum Shipley paid in cash $133 and executed two promissory notes. Each note was dated June 5, 1922. One note was payable 17 months after date and the other one was payable 29 months after date. Each note bore interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and was payable annually. Each note contained a provision that if the interest was not paid as agreed that the note should immediately become due at the option of the holder. The defendant Shipley signed the notes on the day they were dated. About three months later Mrs. Shipley, the other defendant, signed the notes. As recited above Shipley was in possession of the farm caring for the crops at the time the agreements last above mentioned were executed. Thereafter he continued in possession, and, as the hay was harvested, made deliveries to Mason, or for Mason's account, and Williams does not appear to have been on the place excepting to make an occasional call. The terms of the agreement between Shipley and Inman were such that Shipley was to build a house at Parlier for Inman, and that the house and lot were to be accepted by Inman in payment of his equity. Later, Shipley not having performed his part of the contract with Inman, Inman retook possession of the alfalfa farm.

On or about October 1, 1923, Frank English and his wife, D. E. English, entered into a contract with Williams whereby the Englishes agreed to sell and Williams agreed to purchase a house and lot in Fresno for the sum of $4,500. As a part of the purchase price Williams transferred to the Englishes the two notes above mentioned, and guaranteed "the payment of said notes and interest in the sum of $870, and, if the same are not paid promptly when due, then the same shall not be a credit on said purchase price, and said real property shall revert back to the said first parties hereto, and the interest of the second party in this contract and in said premises shall be at an end." There is no evidence that Mrs. English, the respondent, knew any infirmity regarding the notes. The evidence is slightly conflicting as to whether her husband knew any infirmity regarding the notes before he had executed the contract with Williams. However, shortly after that contract had been executed, Frank English called on Shipley, and at that time Shipley stated to him the facts hereinabove recited. Later, the interest was not paid upon request being duly made, and this action was commenced. The trial court made findings on all of the issues against the defendants and in favor of the plaintiff. Among other findings the trial court found that the notes were "sold, assigned, and transferred by the said J. J. Williams to the said plaintiff D. E. English, prior to the maturity of said notes, or either of them, and that at the time of the transfer of said notes by the said J. J. Williams to the said plaintiff, plaintiff had no knowledge or information that the said defendants disclaimed liability on said notes, or either of them, or that the said notes were not what they purported to be on their face."

Before proceeding further it will be best to dispose of one fact that entered into the proof, but which strikes us as being immaterial. Before Inman and Williams entered into their contracts with Shipley, Williams entered into a contract with Inman by the terms of which he agreed to sell his equity to Inman. That contract was recorded; but it was never carried out by the parties, but on the other hand it was by the parties mutually abandoned. For all of the purposes of this case we think that the agreement between Inman and Williams stands as though it were never executed.

[1] The appellants call attention to the fact that the agreement between Williams and Shipley was oral, that it involved the sale of an interest in real property, and that the agreement was therefore invalid. Civ. Code, § 1624. The respondent replies that whether valid or invalid the defense of the statute of frauds has been waived. In this behalf the respondent calls attention to the fact that in their answer the defendants pleaded the agreement between Shipley and Williams as recited by us hereinabove, and that they did not in the trial court present any question regarding the statute of frauds. On the other hand respondent calls attention to the fact that the whole transaction was presented to the trial court by parol proof, and no contention was made in that court regarding the defense of the statute of frauds. Thereupon the respondent contends that the defense of the statute of frauds may not be presented by the appellants in this court at this time, and respondent cites Armstrong v. Barceloux, 34 Cal. App. 433, 167 P. 895. The case cited, and numerous other cases contained in respondent's brief, fully support her contentions.

[2] The appellants rely upon a want of consideration as a defense. As to C. R. Shipley we cannot understand his contention in this behalf. The record does not contain any conflict regarding the agreement being to the effect that Williams agreed to sell his equity to Shipley for the sum of $933, and that Shipley agreed to pay the same. Moreover, it is equally clear that Williams thereupon immediately left the property, and has not in any way attempted to take the possession from Shipley. As to the defendant C. R. Shipley the defense is entirely without merit.

[3] As to the defendant Ethel Shipley it appears from the evidence that she signed some three months after the notes had been delivered to her father, J. J. Williams. There is no evidence to the effect that the respondent, or her agent, Frank English, knew at the time the notes were purchased from Williams that Shipley signed and delivered the notes on one date, and his wife delivered the notes on another date. The evidence shows that the respondent is a holder in due course. As against her the appellant Ethel Shipley may not set up the defense of absence of consideration. Civ. Code § 3109.

[4, 5] The fact that the interest was due and payable in June, 1923, and that it had not been paid, was a fact which the appellants were entitled to present to the consideration of the trial court on the issue as to whether the plaintiff is a holder in due course. However, that fact is not controlling. It is not of such weight as to disturb the finding of the trial court.

[6] It does not appear from the evidence that when the respondent accepted the notes she knew that they had been executed by the maker as one step in an executory agreement to buy and sell land. However, if she did know it, nevertheless, it is further certain that she did not know of any infirmity in that transaction either in the nature of fraud or breach of contract. It follows that the position of the respondent as a holder in due course is not weakened. McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, 390, 113 N. W. 858, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 15 Ann. Cas. 665.

The appellants cite and rely on Griswold v. Morrison, 53 Cal. App. 93, 200 P. 62, and American Nat. Bank v. Kerley, 109 Or. 155, 220 P. 116, 32 A. L. R. 262. The second case cited involves the law applicable to pre-existing debts. The first case cited is helpful in so far as it construes section 3135 of the Civil Code on the subject of partial payments. But the respondent did not agree to make partial payments. There is nothing in either case at variance with the views hereinabove expressed.

The judgment is affirmed.

ELLIS LANDING & DOCK CO. v. CITY OF RICHMOND et al. (Civ. 5108.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 24, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 24, 1925.)

1. Evidence ☞83(2)—Presumed city council will do duty.

It will be presumed that a city council will do its duty, and will not attempt willfully to violate the law.

2. Municipal corporations ☞226—One dealing with municipality must take notice of powers.

Every one dealing with a municipality is bound to take notice of the limitation of its powers and ascertain whether the power has been exercised in the mode required by law.

3. Injunction ☞118(3)—Writ not issued on unsupported conclusion stating intended violation of official duty.

Writ of injunction will not be issued upon the mere declaration of a pleader that public officials are about to violate their duties, without the recital of some facts justifying such conclusion.

4. Municipal corporations ☞993(2)—Demurrer held properly sustained to complaint of taxpayer seeking to enjoin city from acting under void lease.

A demurrer held properly sustained to complaint of taxpayer seeking to enjoin defendant city from carrying out and operating under a void lease, to prevent irreparable damage to himself as a taxpayer, where it appeared from the affirmative allegations defendant's council did not authorize the lease, as required by Richmond City Charter, art. 3, § 7; that it was abandoned; and that the city was to derive a profit without incurring obligations from operations to be carried out under the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; H. V. Alvarado, Judge.

Action by the Ellis Landing & Dock Company against the City of Richmond and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Elmer E. Robinson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

D. J. Hall, City Atty., and Preston & Duncan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action is one brought by plaintiff as a taxpayer of the city of Richmond for the purpose of enjoining said city from proceeding, carrying out, and operating under a lease that is void because of its execution in excess of the powers of the city, and in a manner other than provided by the charter. The court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, without leave to amend. This appeal is from the judgment for the purpose of reviewing the order.

The complaint was filed August 7, 1923. It is alleged therein in substance that the city of Richmond was at the commencement of the action, and at all times mentioned in the complaint, the owner in fee-simple absolute of and in possession of certain real estate situate in the city of Richmond and containing some 1.098 acres of land, which is alleged to be a portion of the waterfront of said city. It is further alleged that the city holds such property under a public trust for the improvement of commercial facilities by the erection of wharves and other commercial conveniences along its water front, and the regulation and collection of wharfage and dockage and other income from its use. The complaint, proceeding, charges the city of Richmond, "by the mayor and clerk thereof," and defendant Draughon with having entered into a certain agreement with reference to the property which is wholly void and of no effect, as the agreement exceeds the power, jurisdiction, and authority of the city of Richmond and of the council of said city, for the reason that it is ultra vires and the said mayor and said clerk had no power, authority, jurisdiction, or right to execute the same, and that the council of said city likewise had no authority, jurisdiction, or right to authorize, direct, or provide for or ordain its execution. It is then alleged that the said Draughon has abandoned said agreement and no longer has or holds any lease upon the property in question, but that the defendants and their officers, employees, and agents, notwithstanding such abandonment, seek to operate thereunder. Then follows an allegation that if the carrying out of said agreement is not restrained the income of said city will be reduced and the taxable burden of plaintiff will be increased, to his irreparable injury and damage. The prayer is that the defendants and their agents be enjoined from doing anything under or in pursuance of the agreement, and that it be declared wholly null and void and of no effect, and that it be vacated and set aside.

A copy of the agreement referred to in the pleadings is attached to the complaint, and it provides, among other things, that the lessee shall within 10 days from its date file with the proper authorities such application as may be legally required to procure all necessary franchises and permits in order to install and operate a ferry service provided for in such agreement; that the lessee shall within six months from the date thereof commence the construction of a ferry slip on the property of a capacity sufficient to accommodate and permit to be docked within the government bulkhead line the ferries provided for in the agreement. Provision is made for the deposit of a certain sum of money by the lessee to insure the faithful performance of the contract, and also for the payment of specified rentals to the city for such property, and of a percentage upon all freight carried by said ferry system.

As above stated, a demurrer was interposed to the complaint and sustained, and we think rightfully so, as we are of the opinion that the plaintiff has alleged himself out of court, and that only a moot question is raised by the pleadings.

The charter of the city of Richmond provides that all powers therein granted to and vested in the city of Richmond shall be exercised by its council, which shall have the power to fix and establish the method and manner in which such powers shall be exercised. It further provides that no ordinance shall be passed or contract made unless approved and authorized by the council, and that no ordinance shall be passed, no officers appointed or removed, no contract established or awarded, and no obligation incurred in excess of $300, without the affirmative vote of at least five members of the council. Section 7, art. 3, Charter of the City of Richmond (Stats. 1909, p. 1263).

[1] The complaint alleging as it does that the contract was executed on behalf of the city by the mayor and clerk alone, and not authorized by the council, it is manifest, as stated by respondents, that it is mere waste paper, as its execution was in direct disregard of the mode prescribed for the exercise of the powers of the municipality, which is to be carried out only by the council, and, the contract being ultra vires and void, and also totally abandoned, the plaintiff as a taxpayer can suffer no irreparable injury therefrom. The mayor, as such, has no more power than any of the other members of the council; his duties being the same as theirs, except that he shall sign all contracts on behalf of the city when properly authorized by the council to do so. The mere conclusion of the pleader in the complaint that the defendants, and their officers, employees, and agents, and each of them, long after the abandonment of the agreement, come out and threaten to proceed to act under and in pursuance of the terms of the attempted agreement, without the recital of any facts showing such intention, can add nothing to the complaint. It is to be presumed that the council will do its duty, and will not attempt to willfully violate the law. McBride v. Newlin, 129 Cal. 36, 61 P. 577.

[2-4] Everyone dealing with the municipality is bound to take notice of the limitation of its powers and ascertain whether the power has been exercised in the mode required by law. In a case where, as here, it appears by affirmative allegations, first, that the council never authorized the lease, and that it was abandoned; and, second, that the city was to derive a profit and to incur no obligation from the operations to be carried out thereunder, it is difficult to see how any irreparable damage will result to a taxpayer. It is not the policy of the law to allow a writ of injunction to be invoked upon the mere declaration of a pleader that public officials are about to violate their duty, without the recital of some facts justifying such conclusion. Barto v. Supervisors, 135 Cal. 496, 67 P. 758.

Something is said in the briefs of the power of the city to execute a lease of the character here attempted, and also of the right of this particular plaintiff to maintain the action. Considering our conclusion, these questions are unimportant, and we are not here concerned with them.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. TERRY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY, DEPARTMENT NO. 1, et al. (Civ. 4817.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 29, 1925.)

Prohibition ⚡13—Petition for prohibition dismissed, where questions raised therein are moot.

Where complaint and indictment charging petitioner with bribery have both been dismissed, proceedings in prohibition seeking determination of abstract question of right of judge of superior court to try petitioner raised moot question only, and petition must be dismissed.

Original prohibition by the People of the State of California, on the relation of A. W. Terry, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Bernardino, Department No. 1, and another. Petition dismissed.

Fred Duffy, of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

O. N. Hilton and Caesar A. Roberts, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Petition for writ of prohibition. The petitioner, A. W. Terry, was charged by complaint filed in the justice's court of San Bernardino township with having accepted a bribe, and was subsequently indicted by the grand jury of San Bernardino county for the same offense. He caused to be made, in the superior court of said county, a motion for trial before a judge other than the respondent; this motion was based upon certain affidavits which petitioner contended set forth facts showing bias and prejudice of the trial judge against him. The motion was denied, and petitioner thereupon filed in this court a petition for writ of prohibition against the respondent trying the case, and praying that the latter be directed to transfer the same to another department or to call in another judge for that purpose.

It appears that the complaint and indictment above mentioned have both been dismissed, and that no charges are pending against the petitioner in the premises. The proceedings before this court therefore seek the determination of an abstract question which does not arise upon any existing facts or rights, and is moot. It follows that the petition must be dismissed, and it is so ordered. Munger's Laundry Co. v. Rankin, 8 Cal. App. 448, 97 P. 95.

Ex parte DUNLAP. (Cr. 1207.)

1. Criminal law ⚡991(2)—Sentence imposing illegal minimum punishment for robbery held not void in toto.

The imposition under Pen. Code, § 213, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271, of a minimum sentence of five years for robbery committed prior to the amendment, held not to render the sentence void in toto.

2. Habeas corpus ⚡50—Appellate court will not consider question of excess of sentence until expiration of term for which accused may be lawfully confined.

The appellate court will not, on habeas corpus, consider question of excess of sentence under Pen. Code, § 213, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271, until the expiration of the time for which accused may be lawfully confined.

Original application by Harry J. Dunlap for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Milton M. Golden, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. In this proceeding the petition for a writ of habeas corpus shows that the applicant was convicted on five counts of robbery, out of a larger number stated in an indictment, and that all of said offenses were charged as having been committed prior to August 18, 1923. On each of three of these charges Dunlap was sentenced to prison for terms of "one year to life," and on each of the other two the sentence was for "five years to life." These sentences were imposed on the 29th day of August, 1924.

The applicant claims that his imprisonment under said sentences is illegal in this, that said sentences for a minimum term of five years were not authorized by the law in force at the time when the offenses were committed.

Prior to August 18, 1923, section 213 of the Penal Code read as follows: "Robbery is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison * * * not less than one year." By amendment effective August 18, 1923, that section was made to provide that robbery in the first degree is punishable for not less than five years, and robbery in the second degree for not less than one year.

[1,2] Assuming that, as petitioner contends, the punishment to be imposed on defendant is limited by the law in force at the time when the offenses were committed, and that therefore the sentences which provided a minimum of five years were not authorized, it is sufficient to say that they are not void in toto. The judgment having been pronounced less than one year prior to this time, it is clear that the petitioner has not served the time for which he may be lawfully imprisoned. "It is the established practice of this court not to consider any question of excess of sentence until the expiration of the time for which the prisoner may be lawfully confined. It is clear, therefore, that a writ should not be granted at this time." In re Moreck, 180 Cal. 384, 181 P. 657.

The application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

POWELL v. ALLAN et al. (Civ. 4788.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 21, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 20, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞371 — "Any" bonds as used in street improvement statute held to mean "all" bonds not disposed of at sale.

In Street Improvement Act of 1913, the provision in section 30 that "any bonds" not sold at expiration of 15 days after the advertisement of the sale provided for in section 29 shall be turned into the special improvement fund, the words "any bonds" mean "all bonds" not disposed of at the advertised sale, "any" being properly construable in some instances as meaning all.

2. Municipal corporations ☞518(1)—Interest of "penalty" for delinquency.

Sum exacted as "interest" of delinquent property owner is in fact a penalty.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Penalty.]

3. Municipal corporations ☞954 — "Interest" on street improvement bonds held "penalty" for delinquency.

The "interest" provided for in street improvement bonds issued pursuant to Street Improvement Act of 1913 is not a charge for delinquency, in view of section 34 et seq., which makes specific provisions for penalties when property owner assessed defaults in payment of principal or interest of bond after its maturity, but is "interest" within Civ. Code, § 1915, i. e., compensation for the use or forbearance of money, and as such is distinguished from a penalty, which is a punishment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interest.]

4. Municipal corporations ☞371—Payment of incidental expenses or awards of damages held exclusive purpose for which city may "advance" money for use in special street improvement fund; "advances."

Under Street Improvement Act 1913, § 32, payment of incidental expenses or awards of damages, or both, held exclusive purpose for which city may make advances of money for use in special improvement fund; "advance" being something which precedes; to advance money meaning to pay it before it is due, or to furnish it for a certain specified purpose, with the understanding that it or some equivalent, is to be returned, and, as used in section 32, means to furnish for a certain specified purpose.

5. Municipal corporations ☞371—When city may make advances to special street improvement fund and receive bonds in exchange stated; "any," "either."

Street Improvement Act, § 32, providing that if a city advances money to the special street improvement fund to pay incidental expenses or awards of damages, or both, "in any event" the city may make advances and receive bonds in exchange, empowers the city to make the exchange only in either of those events in view of sections 30, 33; the word "any" being synonymous with the word "either," or as equivalent with the term "any such"; "any" being a word of several meanings, according to the subject which it qualifies (citing Words and Phrases, First Series, "Any").

6. Municipal corporations — 371 — Contractor held entitled to receive in payment pro tanto of contract price all bonds remaining in special improvement fund after sale.

Where a city in connection with street improvement work under Street Improvement Act, § 9, made no advances within section 32 for incidental expenses or awards of damages, contractor, on city's final acceptance of improvement, held entitled to receive payment pro tanto of contract price, all bonds issued for the improvement and remaining in special improvement fund after a sale had under section 29, with accrued interest, in view of §§ 10, 25, 30, 33 and section 46, subd. 6.

Original application for writ of mandate by C. L. Powell against R. M. Allan and others, as officials of the city of Los Angeles. Peremptory writ granted.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Myers, C. J., and Seawell, J., dissenting.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Jess E. Stephens and Lucius P. Green, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel respondents, city officials of the city of Los Angeles, to deliver to petitioner certain street improvement bonds.

By proceedings regularly had under the Street Improvement Act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 954), a written contract was entered into on April 2, 1920, between the city of Los Angeles and petitioner's assignor, one John Hayes, whereby the latter, as the contractor, undertook to construct for the sum of $995,773.21 a tunnel in the city of Los Angeles, commonly referred to as the Second Street tunnel. Thereafter assessments were levied upon the lots within the improvement district. Assessments equal in the aggregate to about one-half of the total amount assessed were paid in cash, and bonds were issued, at the election of the lot owners to represent the remaining assessments. The principal of the bonds amounted to the sum of $542,656.17. Work was commenced within 20 days after March 23, 1921, that being the date when the contractor received notice from the board of public works that there was sufficient money and bonds in the special fund devoted to the proposed improvement to pay the contract price. Numerous extensions of time were regularly granted for the performance of the work, which was finally completed some time in July, 1924, and prior to the expiration of the last extension of time. The improvement has since been accepted by the board of public works, and we may assume that it likewise has been accepted by the city council, for we are informed by respondents in their brief that the tunnel has been finally completed and is now open to public use. On January 9, 1922, Hayes assigned to petitioner all of his right, title, and interest in and to the moneys and bonds due or to become due under the contract.

On March 22, 1921, the bonds in the special fund devoted to the improvement were regularly offered for sale by the city, pursuant to proceedings had under section 29 of the act. It seems that at that time there was some question as to the validity of the bonds, due to certain litigation then pending wherein the legality of the proceeding was attacked, and the city succeeded in selling bonds only to the amount of $8,497.07, leaving unsold and in the special fund devoted to the improvement a large number of bonds, the aggregate par value of which is $534,159.10.

It never became necessary for the city to advance to the special improvement fund any money whatever to pay any incidental expenses in connection with the improvement, or to pay any of the awards of damages; and, in fact, the city never has made any such advances nor have any of the bonds ever been sold or used for the payment of incidental expenses or awards of damages.

It seems that the doubt which was cast upon the validity of the bonds by the litigation pending at the time when they were offered for sale was not finally removed until the Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision rendered March 3, 1924, ordered the dismissal of a certain action, wherein the complainants had challenged the validity of the proceeding. Shortly after this decision, namely, on April 28, 1924, the city council, notwithstanding the fact that no money had ever been advanced to the special improvement fund by the municipality to pay for incidental expenses or for awards of damages, directed the city treasurer to transfer to such special fund from the reserve fund the sum of $534,159.10 in money, and to deliver to the city in exchange therefor the bonds which remained in the special fund after the sale of March 22, 1921, i. e., the bonds the aggregate par value of which amounts to the sum of $534,159.10. This action was taken by the city council upon the assumption that such exchange is authorized by section 32 of the Improvement Act. The city treasurer complied with the direction of the city's legislative body, and by reason thereof the municipality has ever since claimed to be the rightful owner of the bonds. Petitioner disputes the city's claim, and has brought this proceeding to compel respondents to deliver the bonds to him. His contention is, that by virtue of the statutory provisions presently to be mentioned, the bonds should be treated as so much money in the special improvement fund, and that he,

as the assignee of the contractor, became entitled to receive the bonds in payment pro tanto of the contract price of the improvement immediately upon final acceptance of the work.

The provisions of the Improvement Act bearing upon these respective claims are the following: No work is to be commenced by the contractor until assessments have been made on the lots in the improvement district and he has received written notice "that there is sufficient money or bonds, or money and bonds in the special fund devoted to the proposed improvement to pay the contract price." Section 9. If bonds have been issued at the election of any of the property owners to represent the assessments against their lots, the city, after advertising the bonds for sale, may sell them, or any number of them, to the highest bidder for cash, and the "proceeds of the sale of such improvement bond shall be paid into the fund of the proceeding to represent assessments in which said bonds were issued." Section 29. The next section reads, in part, as follows:

"Section 30. Any bonds not sold at the full expiration of 15 days after the completion of the publication of the advertisement provided for in the preceding section shall be turned into the fund for the improvement for which the assessment is made, and shall be deemed and treated as so much money in said fund, and shall upon final acceptance of said improvement be issued to and accepted by the contractor for the work, or his assigns, in payment pro tanto of the contract price of said improvement, provided there is sufficient money in the said fund to pay all incidental expenses and all awards of damages that must be paid prior to the doing of the work."

The remainder of the section relates to advances of money by the contractor to the special improvement fund to pay incidental expenses and awards of damages, when there is not sufficient money in the fund for those purposes. Section 32 reads:

"The legislative body of any municipality may, in its discretion, upon the failure of any contractor to advance sufficient money to the fund devoted to any improvement to pay the incidental expenses and the awards of damages as hereinabove provided, advance from the general fund, or from such fund as said legislative body may designate, to said fund the amount necessary for such purposes. Whereupon the city treasurer shall issue to said city bonds of the improvement in an amount equal at their par value to the amount of money so advanced by the said city, and in any event (italics ours) it shall be competent for the city to advance to the appropriate fund the par value of all or any part of said bonds, in which case the said bonds shall be issued to the city, and the said city shall have the same rights in respect to the enforcement and collection thereof as other purchasers. Where the city advances money as in this section provided, it shall have full authority at any time to sell said bonds at a point acceptable to the legislative body thereof."

The italicized words "and in any event" are those upon which respondents mainly rely to justify the city's position. Section 33 is as follows:

"Whenever the contractor or the city has advanced to the appropriate fund an amount sufficient to pay the incidental expenses and awards, and has received bonds at their par value in an amount equal to the sum so advanced, as hereinbefore provided, the bonds remaining shall be turned into said fund, and shall be treated and regarded as so much money in said fund, and shall upon final acceptance of the work be issued to and received by the contractor in payment pro tanto of the contract price of the said improvement."

[1] We think it clear that unless the words of section 32 which we have italicized necessitate a different conclusion, there can be no question as to petitioner's right to receive the bonds and to apply them, at their par value, in payment pro tanto of the contract price of the improvement. The act, in section 29, makes provision for but one sale of bonds. In section 30 the lawmakers expressly and specifically declare that "any bonds" not sold at the expiration of 15 days after the advertisement of the sale provided for in the preceding section "shall be turned into" the special improvement fund. The words "any bonds," as here used, undoubtedly mean "all bonds" not disposed of at the advertised sale. There are instances, and this plainly is one of them, where the word "any" is properly construed to mean "all." See note to State v. Kansas City, Ann. Cas. 1916E, p. 8. It further is provided in section 30 that the bonds so turned into the special fund at the expiration of 15 days after the advertisement of sale "shall be deemed and treated as so much money in said fund," and that upon the final acceptance of the improvement the bonds thus turned into the special fund "shall * * * be issued to and accepted by the contractor for the work, or his assigns, in payment pro tanto of the contract price of said improvement," provided there is sufficient money in the special fund to pay all incidental expenses and all awards of damages. In the instant case there was sufficient money in the special improvement fund to make all such payments. By section 33 it likewise is expressly declared that if the contractor or the city shall have received bonds in an amount equal to any sum which he or it may have advanced to pay for incidental expenses or for awards, "the bonds remaining" shall be turned into the special improvement fund, shall be treated and regarded as so much money in said fund and "shall," upon the final acceptance of the work, "be issued to and received by the contractor in payment pro tanto of the contract price of the said improvement."

There is no uncertainty in this mandatory language. The two sections (30 and 33) declare unequivocally that any bonds not sold under section 29 of the act, and which are not used to reimburse the city or the contractor for advances made by it or him to meet incidental expenses or awards of damages, shall be issued to the contractor in payment pro tanto of the contract price.

Notwithstanding the plain and positive injunction contained in sections 30 and 33, respondents confidently assert that the language of these two sections leaves it optional with the city to say whether the contractor shall or shall not receive any bonds in payment of the contract price. We can perceive no merit in this claim, but because it has been made we shall consider its tenability before adverting to that part of section 32 upon which respondents mainly rely to sustain the city's claim to the bonds.

The imperative language of sections 30 and 33—the positive declaration that upon final acceptance of the work the bonds remaining in the special fund shall be issued to and received by the contractor in payment pro tanto of the contract price—would seem to be completely at variance with any notion of a privilege on the part of the city to deliver the bonds to the contractor or not, as it sees fit. But respondents, stressing the use of the term “contract price” as employed in the provision to the effect that the contractor shall receive the bonds “in payment * * * of the contract price,” argue that if interest has accrued upon the bonds prior to the completion and acceptance of the work, the contractor, if he receives the bonds at their par value in payment of the contract price, will receive, to the extent of such accrued interest, a sum over and above the “price” at which he contracted to do the work. This argument is more plausible than convincing. Where there is no question as to the validity of the bonds, and they are readily salable in the market, the contractor, to the extent of the interest which has accrued on the bonds, will, it is true, receive a sum in excess of the amount named in his agreement as the contract price. But the bonds may be absolutely void, or, because of some real or supposed irregularity in the proceeding leading up to their issue, their marketability may be so far impaired that they can be sold only to speculators at sums much below their nominal value. But whether valid or invalid, questionable or unquestionable, the contractor not only must accept them in payment pro tanto of the contract price, but he must accept them at their nominal or par value. The statute enters into the contract and becomes a part of it. The bidders for the work are deemed to know this. Every bidder, therefore, doubtless fixes the amount of his bid with a view to the possibility that he may be compelled to accept bonds in payment of a part at least of the contract price. It is true that whether the successful bidder shall be compelled to accept any bonds, and, if he shall be, what amount of bonds he may be compelled to take, are questions which lie in the misty realm of speculation and uncertainty at the time when the bids are made. But this very uncertainty, involving as it does the possibility that the successful bidder may be compelled to take worthless bonds for his work, affords all the more reason why he should, as he doubtless does, fix the amount of his bid to meet all possible contingencies, including the possibility that when the work is accepted he will receive bonds upon which interest has accrued.

Nor does the fact that the contractor may receive the interest which has accrued upon the bonds at the time when the work is finally accepted necessarily afford a ground for respondents' claim that if the statute be construed as contended for by petitioner the contractor will, in effect, be paid a premium for unreasonably delaying the completion of the improvement. All bonds issued to represent these local assessments draw interest from their date. Section 25. Therefore, the contractor who is obliged to take bonds for his work will receive the same amount of interest whether he performs his work diligently or dilatorily, provided, of course, he has not forfeited his contract by reason of delay in its performance. By performing his work expeditiously and by promptly receiving his pay for it, whether that compensation take the form of money or bonds or of money and bonds, he may the sooner satisfy any interest-bearing obligations which he may have been compelled to incur in order to finance the job. By speedily completing the improvement he hastens the day when he can put an end to the running of the interest which he, as a borrower, may be obligated to pay. For this reason it is quite within the range of possibility that the motive which impels him to hasten the work will be the same whether he be paid in money or in bonds. Whether the motive is the same in either case is a matter depending largely upon the rate of interest at which he is able to borrow. If that interest be equal to or greater than the interest which the bonds draw, he may gain by completing the work as soon as possible and liquidating his debts with the money or bonds received by him in payment of the contract price.

There is a greater reason for holding that the statute should be construed as not giving to a city which has made no advances for incidental expenses or for awards of damages the privilege of taking bonds at their par value, thus enabling it to make a profit to the extent of the accrued interest, than there is for holding that the bonds with their accrued interest should not be delivered to the contractor in payment pro tanto of the contract price. The principle underlying special assessments to meet the cost of local improvements is that the property upon which they are imposed is peculiarly benefited, and that, therefore, the owners do not in fact pay anything in excess of what they receive by reason of the improvement. But the constitutional guarantees for the protection of private property would be seriously impaired if, under the guise of local assessments, the Legislature should attempt to make the lot owners in a local improvement district contribute to the general revenue for the use of the public at large. Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 19 S. Ct. 187, 43 L. Ed. 443. In McCormack v. Patchin, 53 Mo. 36, 14 Am. Rep. 440, the Supreme Court of Missouri says:

"The whole theory of local taxation or assessments is, that the improvements, for which they are levied, afford a remuneration in the way of benefits. A law which would attempt to make one person or a given number of persons, under the guise of local assessments, pay a general revenue for the public at large, would not be an exercise of the taxing power, but an act of confiscation."

Every assessment levied under the provisions of this Street Improvement Act must include its proportion of the total amount of incidental expenses necessarily incurred by the city in connection with the proposed improvement. Section 10 and subd. 6 of section 46. If by reason of the issuance of bonds there be any expense to the city which is not included within the statute's definition of the term "incidental expenses," it must, as a general rule, be a trifling sum as compared with the amount of interest which may accrue upon the bonds prior to the city's acceptance of the improvement. If, therefore, the city, without having made any advances for incidental expenses or for awards, but at its option and at any time before the final acceptance of the work, may transfer from its general fund to the special street improvement fund a sum of money equal only to the par value of the street improvement bonds remaining in the latter fund, receiving such bonds in return for the moneys so transferred by it, and if, as in the instant case, the validity of the bonds has been determined beyond peradventure, then the accrued interest represents a very considerable profit to the city—a sum of money which the property owners paid into the city treasury for a purely local improvement, and which, therefore, could very properly be paid to the contractor as a part of the cost of the improvement. But if in such case the city receives the accrued interest the profit which it makes out of the transaction will not be used by it to defray any part of the cost of the local improvement for which it was paid. On the contrary, if the profit be retained by the city, it may be used by it for any of the numerous purposes to which the municipality's general revenue is devoted. A construction of the statute which permits this to be done opens up a grave constitutional question which, if we do not find it necessary to decide, must at least give us pause. We do not decide it, simply because we think the language of sections 30 and 33 is too plain to permit the construction which respondents seek to place upon it.

[2, 3] It cannot successfully be claimed that the interest provided for in the bonds is of the nature of a "penalty" to which the city is entitled simply because it is a penalty. Where, under the guise of "interest," a sum is exacted of a delinquent property owner, such sum, though denominated "interest," is in fact a penalty, as was held by the Oregon supreme court in Colby v. Medford, 85 Or. 485, 167 P. 487. There the court said:

That "when interest is charged on a delinquent tax it is not regarded as interest in the sense that it is a consideration for the forbearance of money, but it is deemed to be a penalty."

But the "interest" provided for in these street improvement bonds is not a charge for delinquency. No part of a bond is delinquent until the lot owner has defaulted in the payment of the principal or interest of the bond after it has become due. When that happens the statute makes specific provision for the only "penalties" which are imposed by reason of such default. Sections 34 et seq. Therefore the interest which is provided for by these bonds, interest which runs from the date of each bond, is interest in the true sense of the term, i. e., it is compensation for the use or forbearance of money and as such is distinguished from a penalty, which is a punishment. In re Ashland Emery, etc., Co. (D. C.) 229 F. 829; Sparks v. Lowndes County, 98 Ga. 284, 25 S. E. 426; Shmuck v. Wheeler, 98 Wash. 535, 167 P. 1126, 25 C. J. 1178; Civ. Code, § 1915. Clearly, it was not the intention of the Legislature to punish the property owner simply because he sought to avail himself of the statutory privilege of having a bond issue to represent the assessment against his lot.

[4] Our conclusion from the foregoing is that if sections 30 and 33 stood alone, petitioner, without doubt, would possess the unconditional right to receive the bonds in payment pro tanto of the contract price. Having arrived at this conclusion, we shall now consider whether there is anything in the language of section 32 which justifies the city's position. That section, after declaring, in substance, that the city may advance money to the special street improvement fund for the purpose of paying incidental expenses and awards of damages if the contractor has failed to make such advances, and that the city treasurer shall issue bonds to the city equal, at their par value, to the amount so advanced by the city for incidental expenses or awards, goes on to say:

"* * * and in any event (italics ours) it shall be competent for the city to advance to the appropriate fund the par value of all or any part of said bonds, in which case the said bonds shall be issued to the city, and the said city shall have the same rights in respect to the enforcement and collection thereof as other purchasers."

Respondents claim that this language is broad enough to justify the city in making advances of money to the special fund in exchange for bonds in "any" event, and quite regardless of whether the advances were made by it for the specific purpose of paying incidental expenses or awards of damages. This might be true if the general words "in any event" were not used in connection with a very definite subject-matter and in immediate association with language of much narrower import. In this section of the act the Legislature is dealing with "advances" to meet incidental expenses and awards. As respondents construe the section, the city is, in effect, not merely empowered to make advances, but is authorized to "purchase" the bonds outright, just as any purchaser might do at a sale held under section 29 of the act. If that had been the intention, the Legislature, we may presume, would have employed more appropriate language to express the intent. But here the language is that it shall be proper for the city to "advance" to the appropriate fund an amount equal to the par value of the bonds. An "advance" is something which precedes. "To advance money is to pay it before it is due, or to furnish it for a certain specified purpose, with the understanding that it, or some equivalent, is to be returned." Ebeling v. Ebeling, 61 Misc. Rep. 539, 115 N. Y. S. 895. (Italics ours.) Without doubt, the word "advance," as used in this section of the act, means "to furnish for a certain specified purpose." The payment of incidental expenses or of awards of damages, or both, is the only purpose for which money could possibly be furnished by the city for use in the special fund to which the advances are made. We may safely conclude, therefore, that advances of money for such limited purposes constitute the subject-matter of the section.

[5] "Any" is a word which may have one of several meanings, according to the subject which it qualifies. Like all other general words, its meaning is often restrained and limited by the context or subject-matter. In Barber v. Morgan, 89 Conn. 583, 94 A. 984, Ann. Cas. 1916E, p. 102, it is held that a statute providing that "every such corporation" may increase or reduce its capital stock and the number and par value of its shares, and that in case of a reduction of the capital stock of "any corporation" by any mode which shall render it insolvent, the stockholders assenting thereto shall be liable for the debts of the corporation, applies only to joint stock corporations, and the words "any corporation" must be limited to joint stock corporations. There the court says:

"What corporations did the Legislature have in mind when they used the words 'any corporation'? Naturally, joint stock corporations with which they were dealing, and for the reduction of whose stock provision was made in the same section and sentence in which these words are found. Clearly by 'any corporation' was intended any such corporation (italics ours), and the general words must be limited to that meaning."

In Richardson v. Ainsa, 218 U. S. 289, 31 S. Ct. 23, 54 L. Ed. 1044, the United States Supreme Court, construing an act of Congress, gave to the general words "in any case"—words which are synonymous with the term "in any event"—a limited scope and meaning in harmony with reason and with the evident purpose of Congress as disclosed by its entire legislation upon the subject. In United States v. Hom Hing (D. C.) 48 F. 635, the court had occasion to construe an act of Congress which provides:

That "in any case where it is necessary, in order to prevent a failure or delay of justice, any of the courts of the United States may grant a dedimus potestatem to take depositions according to common usage."

The court held that the words "in any case" do not mean broadly any case where one of the parties to a controversy desires the evidence of a foreign witness, but any case of which the court granting the commission has jurisdiction. For other cases in which the word "any" has been restricted to the subject-matter of the statute, or to the subject-matter of the particular section or clause in which it occurs, see Indiana, etc., Coal Co. v. Neal, 166 Ind. 458, 77 N. E. 850, 9 Ann. Cas. 424. Also In re Licenses (Iowa) 179 N. W. 609, and the cases there cited.

Not infrequently the word "any" has been construed in accordance with the ejusdem generis doctrine. 3 C. J. 231. "It may be admitted," says the federal Supreme Court in United States v. Bitty, 208 U. S. 402, 28 S. Ct. 398, 52 L. Ed. 543, "that in accordance with the familiar rule of ejusdem generis, the immoral purpose referred to by the words 'any other immoral purpose', must be one of the same general class or kind as the particular purpose of 'prostitution' specified in the same clause of the statute." In Hubbell v. Higgins, 148 Iowa, 36, 126 N. W. 914, Ann. Cas. 1912B, p. 822, it was held that a statute providing that all hotels be kept and maintained in a clean and sanitary condition, free from any effluvia, gas or offensive odors arising from any sewer, drain or privy, "or from any other source whatever" within the control of the owner, manager or person in charge, does not confer on the hotel inspector arbitrary power to declare a nuisance solely because of "offensive odors," since, under the rule ejusdem generis, the words "any other source whatever" refer to a source of like kind with "sewer, drain and privy." See, also, Ex parte Neet, 157 Mo. 527, 57 S. W. 1025, 80 Am. St. Rep. 638.

It has been held that "any" should be construed as synonymous with "either" whenever it is necessary to do so in order to prevent destroying the evident intention of the Legislature. Fenet v. McCuiston, 105 Tex. 299, 303, 147 S. W. 867; Dowling v. State, 5 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 664; State v. Antonio, 2 Tread. Const. (S. C.) 776, 783; 3 C. J., p. 231; Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 414; note to State v. Kansas City, supra, Ann. Cas. 1916E, p. 11.

We think that the word "any," as used in the phrase "in any event" in section 32 of this act, should be construed as synonymous with the word "either" or as the equivalent of the term "any such," and that when the Legislature said that "in any event" it shall be competent for the city to advance money to the special fund in exchange for bonds, it had in mind that if it became necessary for the city to advance money to that fund for the purpose of paying incidental expenses or awards of damages, or both, then and in either of those events, or in any such event, it would be competent for the city to make the advances and to receive bonds in exchange. Any other construction would bring the section into irreconcilable conflict with sections 30 and 33, and we should be confronted with a situation as absurd as that involved in the hypothetical case of an irresistible force meeting with an immovable body. It cannot be presumed that, in adopting section 32, the Legislature intended to destroy the evident meaning of sections 30 and 33.

[6] Our conclusion is that petitioner's interpretation of this statute is correct, and that, therefore, upon the final acceptance of the work, he became entitled to receive all of the bonds which were in the special improvement fund immediately prior to the action taken by the city on April 28, 1924, the bonds to be accepted by petitioner at their par value in payment pro tanto of the contract price.

C. L. POWELL, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES (a Municipal Corporation) et al., Defendants and Respondents (Nellie A. Hill, Intervener and Appellant). (Civ. 4790.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 21, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 20, 1925.)

Appeal by plaintiff and intervener from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles county, Ralph H. Clock, Judge, in an action to enjoin defendant from asserting claim to certain street improvement bonds. Reversed.

MYERS, C. J., and SEAWELL, J., dissent.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jess E. Stephens and Lucius P. Green, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff is the assignee of one John Hayes, the contractor to whom was awarded a contract to do certain street work in the city of Los Angeles under the Street Improvement Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954). The action was brought to enjoin defendants from asserting any claim by the city to the ownership of certain street improvement bonds. The plaintiff here is the same person who applied to this court for a writ of mandate in the proceeding entitled C. L. Powell v. R. M. Allan et al. (No. 4788) 234 P. 339, and which was this day decided in favor of the petitioner. Substantially the same facts are alleged in the complaint in this action that are set forth in the petition there. One of the property owners against whose lots bonds had been issued to represent the assessments thereon, and who claimed an interest in the matter in litigation here adverse to the defendants and in favor of the plaintiff, filed a complaint in intervention in which she joined with plaintiff in praying that the defendants be enjoined from asserting the city's claim to such of the bonds as were issued against her property. The defendants demurred to the complaint and likewise to the complaint in intervention. Both demurrers were sustained, and thereupon judgment was entered in favor of defendants. Plaintiff and the intervener have appealed from that judgment and likewise from an order refusing to grant their application for an injunction.

In the brief on behalf of respondents it is stated that "the same questions of law are involved" in this action that were presented in the mandamus proceeding, and it is conceded, in effect, that the appeal here should be governed by the decision made in the former proceeding. Powell v. Allan discusses every issue which is raised on this appeal, and our decision there, which is against the city, necessitates a reversal here.

The judgment and the order appealed from are reversed.

Rehearing Denied April 6, 1925.)

1. Master and servant ⇨398—Employer held to have waived limitation of time for claiming compensation.

Where claimant was injured on June 29, 1922, and was sent by employer, who paid bill, to hospital for operation for hernia, resulting from injury, some time after June 23, 1923, employer held to have waived Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Laws, § 11, imposing limitation of six months for bringing claim.

2. Master and servant ⇨398—Waiver by employer of limitation of time for presenting claim, binding on insurer.

Waiver by employer of provision of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Laws, § 11, barring claims not presented within 6 months, by paying expense of subsequent operation, held binding on insurance carrier, in view of section 30.

3. Insurance ⇨591½—Insurance carrier not merely surety, in view of Compensation Act.

Under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Laws, § 30, raising conclusive presumption that insurance contract contained clause to effect that carrier should be directly and primarily liable to employee, status of insurance carrier is not merely that of surety.

4. Master and servant ⇨405(6)—Finding disability had not terminated sustained.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain inference that claimant's disability had not terminated, although he testified that wound was healed up but still hurt badly, as against contention that award was predicated on pain alone.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by John Avila for injuries, opposed by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, insurer. From an order of Industrial Accident Commission, insurer brings application for writ of review to annul award. Award affirmed.

Horace W. B. Smith and P. R. Lund, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. We are satisfied with and hereby adopt the following portions of the opinion prepared herein by Mr. Justice Sturtevant of the District Court of Appeal:

"This is an application to have an award made by the defendant Commission annulled.

"On December 5, 1922, John Avila filed with the Commission an application for adjustment of claim. In that application he set forth that prior to the 29th day of June, 1922, he was employed by the Associated Milk Producers at

Los Banos; that on the 29th day of June, 1922, in the course of his employment he was lifting heavy sacks of casein and strained himself causing a hernia; that he purchased a truss and returned to work on July 1, 1922; that he continued to work until July 7, 1923; that on the date last mentioned his trouble had increased to such an extent that he quit work; that during the same month he was operated on for the hernia; that he returned to work September 5, 1923; that on October 22, 1923, the above-mentioned injury became aggravated and he was compelled to quit work and that he lost five months' time to the date of said application. In his application the claimant further set forth that he notified his employer of the injury received on the 29th day of June, 1922, and that he consulted Dr. Jadarola and Dr. Sprague who attended him for the injury received; that Dr. Eaves performed the operation above mentioned and that Dr. Eaves was paid for the operation by the employer; that neither the hospital bill, nor Dr. Jadarola, nor Dr. Sprague have been paid; and that other sums have not been paid for medicines. The application also set forth that the employee was receiving $120 a month payable monthly and that he worked seven days a week. The application was answered by this petitioner. In the answer the petitioner alleged that it was the insurance carrier and as such appeared for the purposes of the case and asked to be substituted in the place of the employer. In its answer the insurance carrier, as the defendant, denied that the applicant was injured in the course of his employment with the employer on or about the 29th day of June, 1922; admitted that the applicant was in its employment on the date mentioned and was receiving $120 a month seven days per week. The defendant also denied that bills were incurred at St. Mary's Hospital, or that doctor bills were incurred as above stated. In their answer they also set forth: 'As a separate and affirmative defense to the application herein, defendants allege that more than six months have elapsed between the time of the alleged injury on June 29, 1922, and the time of the filing of the application herein, and by reason thereof the right of the applicant to file application for adjustment of claim herein is wholly barred, as provided by section 11 of the California Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Laws of the State of California.' (St. 1917, p. 841.)

"On the pleadings so framed the parties presented the proceedings concerning the claim of the employee. The Commission made findings in which it found every fact in favor of the employee and made its award 'in favor of John Avila against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company in the sum of $161.23, payable to applicant forthwith, and the further sum of $17.10 a week beginning October 12, 1923, until the termination of disability or the further order of this Commission. * * *

The evidence taken commenced with a date prior to June 29, 1922, and extended over the ensuing date down to the 15th day of January, 1924. No objection was made as to any testimony being without the issues. All of the testimony came in without objection.

"On turning to the evidence introduced, it appears that on June 29, 1922, the day the hernia was caused, the employee notified the employer of the injury. It also appears that said notice was frequently repeated, but that the employer never notified the insurance carrier until about the 23d day of June, 1923. On that date Avila came to San Francisco. After telling his story to the officers of the Associated Milk Producers, they sent him to the insurance carrier. The insurance carrier denied liability. Thereafter the attorney for the employer called on the insurance company and received a reply of similar import. Thereupon the employer sent the employee to St. Mary's Hospital, where he was operated upon at the expense of the employer. No claim is made that the insurance company is liable to the employer for these expenses. On September 5, 1923, the employee returned to work and continued at his work until October 12th following. At that time he quit work because an open sore existed at the point where he had been operated on for the hernia. Thereupon Avila consulted Dr. Sprague, who proceeded to treat the wound and continued to treat it until about December 20, 1923. At that time the running sore had been healed, but as the witness stated on the witness stand on January 15, 1924, 'It is healed up now but it still hurts me bad.'

[1, 2] "Claiming that Avila suffered but one injury, the hernia, and that injury was on June 29, 1922, the petitioner asserts that the defense of the statute of limitations was a complete defense and that the Commission erred in making any award. In asserting that claim the petitioner overlooks entirely all that portion of the story subsequent to the apparent healing of the incision made at the time of the operation. If there were no more facts involved, there would be more in the contention of the petitioner. However, when we consider all of the facts, we think that there is nothing in the claim of the petitioner. * * * The employer may waive the terms of the statute, and the employer in this case did waive the terms of the statute when it sent its employee to the hospital to be operated on for hernia and the expenses of the operation to be borne by the employer. The statute in that behalf provides as follows: 'Sec. 11 (c). The payment of compensation, or any part thereof, or agreement therefor, shall have the effect of extending the period within which proceedings for its collection may be commenced, six months from the date of the agreement or last payment of such compensation, or any part thereof * * *'. It is clear that, as to the employer, the defense of the statute of limitations was waived. The insurance company, so far as the record disclosed, became liable to the employee under the same circumstances and to the same amount as the employer. The statute on that subject provides: 'Sec. 30 (c). Every contract insuring against liability for compensation, or insurance policy evidencing the same, must contain a clause to the effect that the insurance carrier shall be directly and primarily liable to the employee and, in the event of his death, to his dependents, to pay the compensation, if any, for which the employer is liable. * * * (d) * * * Every contract insuring against liability for compensation, provided by this act, or insurance policy evidencing the same shall be conclusively presumed to contain all of the provisions required by this act.' When, as here, the employer could not successfully plead the statute of limitations, it is difficult to see how its agent the insurance carrier could successfully do so for the employer."

[3] We are satisfied that for the purposes of the proceeding here under review the employer could and did waive the statute of limitations and that such waiver is equally binding upon the insurance carrier. The contract of insurance was not in evidence before the Commission, and we are not here concerned with the question whether or not that contract was breached, as between the immediate parties thereto, by the act of the employer in waiving the statute. In the face of the conclusive presumption that the contract of insurance contains a clause to the effect that "the insurance carrier shall be directly and primarily liable to the employee * * * to pay the compensation, if any, for which the employer is liable" (section 30c, italics added), there is no merit in the contention that the status herein of the insurance carrier is merely that of a surety.

[4] We are of the opinion that the testimony before the Commission was legally sufficient to sustain the inference that Avila's disability had not terminated on December 20, 1923, or on January 15, 1924. It cannot be said therefore that the finding was based upon mere speculation, or that it was predicated upon the theory that pain alone is sufficient to justify an award of compensation.

The award is affirmed.

JENKS v. LURIE et al. (S. F. 11515.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 11, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1126—When Supreme Court will entertain motion to affirm judgment because appeal without merit stated.

Supreme Court may entertain motion to affirm judgment on grounds that appeal is without merit, when record discloses nothing which would justify a reversal.

2. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 801(4)—Motion to dismiss appeal not considered, where investigation of merits is necessary.

In action to rescind conveyance, made by plaintiff as executrix, and confirmed by court in probate proceedings from which no appeal was taken within required time, motion to dismiss appeal on grounds that issue was moot, but contention being in reality that matter was res adjudicata, could not be entertained; investigation into merits of case being necessary.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by May Harley Jenks, executrix, against Louis R. Lurie and others, to set aside a sale of a contingent reversionary interest in real property. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., and L. J. Rabinowitz, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Ferrari, R. H. Morrow, and Henry E. Monroe, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the grounds that the controversy involved therein has been determined in a proceeding over which this court has no jurisdiction; that such determination has become final so that this court cannot grant effectual relief upon this appeal; and that, therefore, this controversy is moot and presents no genuine issue to this court.

[1, 2] This action was brought by plaintiff, as executrix of said estate, to rescind and set aside upon the grounds of fraud and mistake a sale and conveyance theretofore made by her of a contingent reversionary interest in certain real property arising out of building restrictions contained in a previous conveyance of said property. The answer sets up as an affirmative defense that the sale and conveyance sought to be rescinded was made by plaintiff as executrix; that the sale was duly reported to and confirmed by the court in the probate proceedings; that no appeal was taken from the order of confirmation; that the time for appeal therefrom has elapsed and the same has become final; and that the matters involved herein are therefore res adjudicata. The facts so pleaded are the facts which are relied upon in support of this motion to dismiss the appeal. It thus appears that the grounds of this motion are not in reality that the appeal has become moot, or even that the controversy herein is moot. The real ground of the motion is the claim that respondents' defense of res adjudicata, or estoppel by judgment, was a valid and complete defense to the action; that it ought to have been sustained by the trial court; that the judgment in favor of the defendants, therefore, was correct; and that the appeal therefrom is without merit. But this is a question going to the merits of the action which was litigated in the trial court herein, and which is involved and to be determined upon this appeal. This court has sometimes entertained a motion to affirm the judgment on the ground that the appeal is without merit, in that the record on appeal discloses nothing which would justify a reversal of the judgment. But this is done ordinarily in cases where the lack of merit in the appeal is plainly apparent from a mere inspection of the record (as, for example, where the appeal is upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, or errors in ruling thereon, and there is no duly authenticated bill of exceptions or reporter's transcript in the record upon appeal). In order to entertain and act upon this motion we must, perforce, consider and decide one of the principal questions going to the merits of the action and one which was litigated and determined in the trial court. The general rule is that this court will not entertain a motion to dismiss an appeal in cases where a determination of the motion necessitates an investigation and consideration of the merits of the case. Ricketson v. Torres, 23 Cal. 636, 649; Foscalina v. Doyle, 48 Cal. 151; In re Blythe, 108 Cal. 124, 127, 41 P. 33; Estate of Sharp, 10 Cal. App. 1, 100 P. 1071. If we should entertain this motion and ultimately grant it, the result would be in effect an advancement of this cause (without any showing of good reason therefor) and the decision thereof upon the merits in advance of other cases which are ahead of it upon our calendar. If we should take this motion under submission and ultimately deny it, the result would be that we should thereafter have to again take the same case under submission as to the remaining questions involved in this appeal. In other words, we should be rendering two opinions in the same case upon the same appeal, each of which would determine but a portion of the case upon the merits. See 2 Cal. Juris. § 749.

The motion is therefore denied without prejudice to the future consideration upon this appeal of the questions involved therein.

ISERT v. RIECKES, Sheriff, et al. (Sac. 3513.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 6, 1925.)

1. Justices of the peace ⚡40—Justice of peace has jurisdiction to entertain motion to quash service of summons.

Justice of peace has jurisdiction to hear motion to quash service of summons on ground that defendant is not resident of county nor party to contract to be performed therein.

2. Justices of the peace ⚡40—Default judgment obtained in county other than residence of defendant, who never made contract to be performed therein, is void, though not void on its face.

Default judgment against defendant sued in justice's court in county of which he was not and never had been a resident, who never entered into contract to be therein performed on which suit was predicated, is wholly void for want of jurisdiction, under Code Civ. Proc. § 848, though not void on its face.

3. Justices of the peace ⚡128(3)—Defendant having moved to quash service of summons held to have sufficiently pursued legal remedy to entitle him to equitable relief against enforcement of default judgment.

Where defendant, wrongfully sued in justice court in county other than that of his residence, specially appeared and moved to quash service of summons, he was not required to move to set aside default judgment, or to recall execution, or to appeal before being entitled to enjoin enforcement of such judgment.

4. Appeal and error ¶954(1)—Injunction ¶135—Granting of injunction pendente lite is within discretion of court, whose action will not be disturbed except for abuse of discretion.

As general rule, granting or denial of injunction pendente lite rests in sound discretion of trial court, whose action will not be disturbed, except for abuse of discretion.

5. Execution ¶171(3)—Denial of temporary injunction pending suit to enjoin enforcement of void judgment held unwarranted.

Application for temporary injunction pending suit to enjoin sheriff from selling realty on execution issued on void judgment held to present no occasion for exercise of court's discretion, and denial of injunction was unwarranted.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Suit by J. M. Isert against W. H. Riecks, as Sheriff of County of San Joaquin, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Neumiller & Ditz, of Stockton, for respondents.

MYERS, C. J. This was a suit in equity for an injunction to restrain the defendant sheriff from selling certain real property of the plaintiff situate in San Joaquin county, upon an execution issued out of the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco. The plaintiff herein, Isert, was made defendant in an action brought in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco to recover the sum of $100 alleged to be due to the defendant State Compensation Fund, plaintiff in that action, as a premium upon a policy of insurance alleged to have been issued by said fund to him. In the complaint in that action it was alleged that the said Isert had "agreed in writing to pay at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California" the premium sued for. The summons therein was served upon Isert in San Joaquin county, and in due time he appeared specially in the justice's court upon a motion to quash the service of summons, upon the ground, as stated in his affidavit and notice of motion, that he was a resident of San Joaquin county; that he was not and never had been a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, and that he had never made or entered into any agreement in writing or otherwise to purchase said policy of insurance or to pay any premium thereon. This motion came on regularly for hearing upon notice in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco, and after hearing thereon the motion was denied. Isert took no further action in the justice's court proceeding, and thereafter judgment was rendered against him by default for the sum sued for. Execution issued upon this judgment was delivered to the defendant sheriff of San Joaquin county, and was levied by him upon real property in that county belonging to Isert, which was advertised for sale, whereupon Isert brought this action in the superior court of San Joaquin county to enjoin such sale, and to have the judgment vacated and annulled. The plaintiff having applied for an injunction restraining the sale of said property pendente lite, an order to show cause was granted thereon, and in connection therewith an interim restraining order. Upon the return of the order to show cause, and after a hearing thereon, the court made its order denying plaintiff's application for an injunction pendente lite and vacating the interim restraining order theretofore made. Thereafter the general demurrer of the defendants to the complaint herein was sustained by the court, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment in favor of defendants followed. Plaintiff appeals herein from said judgment and also from the order denying his application for an injunction pendente lite and vacating and dissolving the interim restraining order theretofore entered.

[1, 2] The effect of the demurrer being to admit all of the allegations of the complaint which were well pleaded, we must assume, for the purpose of reviewing the judgment upon appeal, that all of the facts of the case are as alleged in the complaint herein. We must assume, therefore, that Isert has never been a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, but was at all times a resident of San Joaquin county; that the alleged contract which forms the basis of the action in the justice's court was not made or entered into within the city and county of San Francisco, and that it was not to be performed therein. It follows that while that court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the motion to quash the service of summons (History Co. v. Light, 94 Cal. 56, 31 P. 627), nevertheless, assuming the facts to be as alleged in the complaint herein, that court never acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant therein, and its judgment was wholly void, though not void upon its face. Code Civ. Proc., § 848; Smith v. Ross, 48 Cal. App. 360, 191 P. 974; Newman v. Barnet, 165 Cal. 423, 132 P. 588.

[3] Respondents concede in effect the validity of the foregoing conclusions, but contend that the plaintiff herein is nevertheless not entitled to the equitable relief which he is here seeking, for the reason that it was incumbent upon him to first exhaust his remedy at law, either by moving in the justice's court to set aside the judgment, or to recall the execution, or by appealing to the superior court from the judgment of the justice's court. In support of this contention they cite a long list of decisions, of which the case of Luco v. Brown, 73 Cal. 3, 14 P. 366, 2 Am. St. Rep. 772, and Smith v. Ross, supra, are fairly illustrative, holding that an injunction will not lie to restrain the enforcement of an execution on a judgment by default in a justice's court, which is void for the reason that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, unless such defendant shall have first pursued his remedy at law, either by motion in the justice's court to set aside the execution or judgment, or by appeal therefrom to the superior court.

The cases cited by respondents are not at all determinative of the question of the extent to which a defendant who has been wrongfully sued in a justice's court of a county other than that of his residence is required to pursue his remedy at law before he may properly seek equitable relief. In none of those cases did the defendant make any effort whatsoever to obtain relief at law, either by motion to quash the service of summons or by motion to vacate the judgment or to recall the execution or by appeal from the judgment. Those cases, therefore, hold no more than this: That such a defendant must have made some effort to obtain relief at law, either by motion in the case or by appeal from the judgment or by some other means, before he is entitled to invoke injunctive relief in a separate action. The case of Newman v. Barnett, supra, is much more nearly in point herein and sheds more light upon this question. The plaintiffs in that action, who were residents of Alameda county, were sued in the justice's court in San Joaquin county in an action upon contract for goods sold and delivered. The complaint in that action contained no allegation as to the residence of defendants therein, nor did it allege whether or not the contract sued upon was in writing. The defendants, having been served with summons, made no appearance in the justice's court until after judgment had been rendered against them upon default. Thereafter they appeared specially in the justice's court and moved to set aside the service of summons and the default judgment, which motion was denied. An execution issued under the judgment having been levied upon defendants' real property, they brought suit in equity, as did the plaintiff herein, for an injunction to restrain the sale thereof. Upon appeal from the judgment granting the injunction, the defendants' contention was substantially the same as made by the defendants herein, namely, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the equitable relief of an injunction for the reason that they had not wholly exhausted their remedy at law—citing Luco v. Brown, supra, and History Co. v. Light, supra. In response to this contention the court said:

"These cases relied on, applying the general rule above stated, held that a party will not be heard in a court of equity to enjoin the sale of property under an execution issued on a justice's judgment, until he has made application in a justice's court for relief—made some appropriate motion to set aside the judgment or annul proceedings under it. But the clear answer to this contention of the appellant is that the defendants did make their application for relief in the justice's court and it was denied. It was not necessary for them to move in that court, in terms, for the recall of the execution or for a stay of further proceedings on the judgment. A full compliance with the equitable rule was had when they moved to set aside service of the summons and the judgment which, if granted, would have set at large all process and proceedings taken under it. No appeal lies from the action of the justice's court on such a motion, hence, when respondents made their motion to set aside the judgment and it was denied, they had done all they were required to or could do as a prerequisite to invoking the interposition by injunction of a court of equity to obtain the relief they sought in the present action and which the court properly awarded them."

This is, in effect, a holding that a defendant in such circumstances, who has made an appropriate though ineffective application for relief in the justice's court, by an appropriate motion, supported by a proper showing, has done all that he is required to do as a condition precedent to invoking injunctive relief. We are unable to see that it makes any difference whether such application is made before or after judgment in the justice's court. A motion to quash the service of summons is as appropriate to this end as would be a motion to vacate the judgment or to recall the execution. Each of these motions would be based upon precisely the same ground, to wit, that under the facts of the case the service of summons in a county other than that in which the action was commenced was unauthorized and, therefore, void. We are aware of no reason, and none has been suggested by respondents herein, for concluding that plaintiff herein should have waited until after judgment was rendered before making his motion to quash the service of summons, or that he should have repeated the same application by a motion to vacate the judgment. The ruling of the justice's court upon such motion would have been the same in either event, because both motions would be governed by the same state of facts and the same rules of law. The plaintiff herein having duly presented in the justice's court his motion to quash the service of summons upon the ground that the same was unauthorized and therefore void, and that motion having been denied after a hearing thereon, it would have been a vain and useless thing for him to thereafter present the same motion to the same court upon the same ground in the form of a motion to vacate the judgment.

The purpose of the cited code section is to protect a defendant, who has been sued in violation thereof in a justice's court of a county other than that of his residence upon a small claim, from the expense, inconvenience, and loss of time incident to the conduct of litigation at a place far distant from his residence. To hold that he must make repeated applications for relief to the justice's court in which he is thus wrongfully sued would be to defeat pro tanto the purpose of this statute. It is suggested that:

"In the Newman v. Barnet Case the plaintiffs proceeded to the point where the invalidity of the justice's court judgment was disclosed and where the court responsible for it refused any relief from it."

That is precisely what happened in the case at bar. The plaintiff herein proceeded to the point where the invalidity of the justice's court judgment was disclosed to that court, and that court denied relief (assuming the facts to be as alleged in the complaint herein). We are satisfied that the case at bar is ruled by the case of Newman v. Barnet, supra, and that the plaintiff herein has done all that he is required to do preliminary to the seeking of an injunction. It is suggested that the case of Newman v. Barnet is inapplicable to the case at bar for the reason that the judgment in that case was void upon its face, whereas the judgment herein, though void in fact, is not void upon its face. We are not prepared to hold that the judgment in the Newman Case was void upon its face. It did not appear from the record therein that the defendants therein were not residents of the county in which the action was brought. Neither did it there appear that the contract sued upon was not in writing, except as this might be inferred from the failure to allege in the complaint that it was in writing. But, assuming that the judgment in that case was void upon its face, we are aware of no reason, and none has been suggested to us, why this circumstance should lead to a different rule with respect to the duty of the defendant seeking relief therefrom. This court did not base its decision in that case upon the circumstance that the judgment was void upon its face. It did not even so decide. On the other hand, this court has held that, while a judgment which is void upon its face may be attacked at any time, either directly or collaterally, the better practice in the case of a judgment which, while void in fact for want of jurisdiction, is not void upon its face, is to attack it by a separate action. People v. Harrison, 84 Cal. 607, 608, 24 P. 311; People v. Thomas, 101 Cal. 571, 575, 36 P. 9.

[4, 5] It is the general rule that the granting or denial of an application for an injunction pendente lite rests in the sound discretion of the trial court and its action thereon will not be disturbed upon appeal except where it appears that such discretion has been abused. However, it does not appear that there was herein any occasion for the exercise of such discretion upon the application for the temporary injunction. There was here no occasion for the balancing of equities, and there was no question involved as to whether the probable injury to the defendants from the granting of the temporary injunction would be greater than the probable injury to the plaintiff from the denial thereof. The defendants' lien upon plaintiff's land by virtue of the levy of execution thereon will continue until the termination of this action. They are fully protected, therefore, and cannot be substantially injured by an injunction restraining the sale pending the determination of the action, and the temporary injunction should have been granted.

The order and judgment appealed from are therefore reversed.

PEOPLE v. CONNELLY. (Cr. 2726.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 12, 1925. Rehearing Denied April 7, 1925.)

1. Homicide $\S$ 253(1)—Evidence held sufficient to establish guilt of first degree murder while committing robbery.

Testimony of eyewitnesses to robbery and to shooting and to planning and preparation for robbery, together with other incriminatory and corroboratory circumstances arising from conduct and flight following shooting, held sufficient, if believed, to positively establish guilt of first degree murder.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(5)—Implied finding identifying defendant as murderer supported by ample evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

There being ample evidence to sustain implied finding identifying defendant as person who committed homicide during robbery, and that being province of jury, it will not be disturbed on appeal, notwithstanding certain discrepancies arising from attempt of witnesses to reproduce descriptively from mental pictures features of defendant where on facing defendant each identified him positively.

3. Criminal law ⚡396(2)—Entire conversation in nature of confession admissible where partially drawn by defendant from sheriff on cross-examination.

Where defendant charged with murder, on cross-examination of sheriff brought out part of subject-matter of conversation between latter and himself in which sheriff said, "You had a gun you are not used to, and in the scuffle it accidentally went off," it was proper for witness to tell all that was said on subject, and to give defendant's answer that he thought it happened that way.

4. Criminal law ⚡523—Untrue statement by sheriff to defendant held not to exclude confession.

Sheriff's untrue statement to defendant that finger prints on cash register robbed at time of commission of murder corresponded with defendant's, held not to render inadmissible defendant's statements in nature of confession, under rule that deception does not exclude confession unless calculated to produce false statement.

5. Criminal law ⚡516—Statements held to be merely evidence of consciousness of guilt and not "confessions."

Statements of defendant charged with murder that he was glad of arrest since strain had been hard, that he had lung and kidney troubles, and it did not matter much now, and that he could not be blamed if he tried to escape, and that during flight he had tried to disguise himself, and that he would plead guilty if assured he would get no more than life imprisonment, held merely evidence of consciousness of guilt, and not to amount to "confessions," latter term being restricted to acknowledgements of guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Confession.]

6. Criminal law ⚡409—Admissions as to matters tending when connected with other facts to prove guilt admissible without preliminary proof as in case of confessions.

Admissions as to truth of matters, which, while they do not themselves involve guilt, when connected with other facts tend to prove guilt, held admissible and competent, without the preliminary proof necessary in case of confessions.

7. Criminal law ⚡532(2), 1153(6)—Whether confessions voluntary is for court and not to be disturbed but for abuse.

Question whether confessions were freely and voluntarily made is preliminary one, addressed to court's discretion, exercise of which will not be disturbed, in absence of showing of abuse.

8. Criminal law ⚡520(1)—State need not also show that officer accompanying sheriff had not induced confessions.

Contention that statements in nature of confessions were not admissible unless it also be shown that officer who accompanied sheriff in returning prisoner had not induced them, held without merit, where sheriff purported to testify fully in the matter, and where defendant made no claim that, the other officer attempted to procure confession.

9. Homicide ⚡300(12)—Instruction on murder omitting accident and intent held not objectionable.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

John Connelly, also known as Joe Kelly, was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur M. Bundy and J. E. Ebert, both of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Ray Manwell, Dist. Atty., of Marysville, for the People.

SEAWELL, J. The defendant, John Aloysius Connelly, was, on the 27th day of June, 1924, by an indictment returned against him by the grand jury of the county of Yuba, this state, accused of the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed by him in said county of Yuba on or about the 6th day of February, 1922, by unlawfully and premeditatedly taking the life of one Francis Heenan. The defendant was indicted under the name of Joe Kelly, alias John Connelly, but at the trial he claimed his true name to be as first above stated.

In due time he was placed upon trial for said crime, and the jury returned a simple verdict of murder in the first degree against him. The court thereupon pronounced the judgment which the law imposes in such cases, to wit, the death penalty. From the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The several specifications of error made by appellant will be noticed as the importance of the same may require. The facts of the case are simple, and briefly narrated are:

At about the hour of 9 o'clock p. m. February 6, 1922, an armed man, identified by a number of persons as the defendant, entered a soft-drink parlor in which intoxicating liquor was sold as well as soft drinks, known as the Canteen saloon, in the city of Marysville, for the purpose of committing a robbery. Within a small private room, which is a part of said saloon premises, the entrance to which was by way of a gate or opening in the bar, were seated two mutual friends and acquaintances of the barkeeper. These persons were out of the line of vision of any one entering the saloon from the front doors. The barkeeper was at the moment of defendant's entry engaged in conversation at the bar with a third party, who fled from said premises and was not present at the trial. All of the persons in the place when the entry was made by the bandit, four in number, except the one who fled, were natives of Greece. The defendant, according to the testimony of three eyewitnesses, entered one of the double swinging doors and advanced as near to the barkeeper as the bar would permit. He was not masked. The barkeeper was behind the bar, and the defendant, pointing a pistol at him, commanded him to hold up his hands, which the barkeeper either declined to do or was slow in complying with the command, and the defendant thereupon said, "Come on; I will blow your brains out." The barkeeper testified that as the defendant put the pistol to his face he "ducked" and the pistol was discharged, the bullet passing close to him, but the distance was not definitely fixed. The barkeeper then ran to the private room, where his two acquaintances were, and attempted to unlock a door that opened into the street, without success. The evidence indicates that a money safe was in this room. The defendant followed the barkeeper into the private room as quickly as physical barriers would permit, and, with drawn revolver, ordered all three of the men to throw up their hands. The order was complied with. Some conversation took place as to the safe. The barkeeper's statement is to the effect that the defendant asked as to the location of the safe, while the other men in the room, one of whom spoke superior English, testified that the barkeeper told the defendant that he could not open the safe; that he had no key. At any rate the defendant compelled all of the men to follow him from the private room and take positions behind the bar. The cash register was on the back bar, and the barkeeper was ordered to open it. He declined and told the defendant to open it himself, which he did with his left hand after some manipulation, keeping the pistol all the while pointed at the barkeeper and requiring all present to continue to keep their hands up. About $100 in coin and currency was taken from the cash register. The defendant then retired from behind the bar, backing toward the swinging door entrance with the pistol leveled at the barkeeper, and compelling the latter to follow him at a distance of 4 or 5 feet as he was backing toward the door. The distance from the bar to the swinging doors was in the neighborhood of 15 feet.

When the defendant arrived at a point very close to the swinging doors, the deceased, who was a police officer of the city of Marysville and attired in a uniform of his rank, entered. The officer, before he entered, had been informed that a robbery was being committed in the place. As the officer entered the door he said to the defendant, who was near to him, "Now, what are you doing here?" or "What's going on here?" or made some such inquiry. Instantly the defendant threw his gun upon the officer and fired a shot, which pierced the body of the officer and cut the arch of the aorta causing almost instant death. The officer uttered an exclamation merely and reeled to the floor, dead. The bullet had passed through his body. The defendant fled and was pursued by the barkeeper, who had been handed the officer's pistol by one of the men who were in the saloon during the robbery. In the pursuit he lost sight of the defendant and returned to the saloon. The news of the death of the officer aroused the citizens, many of whom joined in a search for the bandit. At about 1:40 o'clock on the following morning, P. D. Scandalis, a member of the searching party, met the defendant, who was traveling slowly with a roll of blankets upon his back, and upon stopping him and making a search of his person and roll of blankets for arms, permitted him to go his way. The defendant was walking at a slow, hobbling gait, and claimed to be shivering from cold, and begged the witness to let him go, as he was looking for a place to lie down. His conduct was unusual. He gave as an excuse for being out at that hour of the night that the officers had chased him from a box car. He was cursing the officers and said he wished he had a gun. The defendant, according to the witness, appeared to be very careful of his hat. In fact, he had taken his hat off. This was the last seen of the defendant in this state by any one who was able to identify him as the suspect until he was arrested near Douglas, state of Wyoming, and returned to Marysville some two years after the homicide.

The defendant, according to his own story, left Marysville on the morning of February 7, 1922, and made his way to Oroville, thence to Portola, where he was storm bound for a period of three days, and thence to Ogden, Cheyenne, and finally to Caspar, Wyoming. At Oroville and other places he read in the press an account of the murder and a description of the bandit suspected of having committed the crime, whose name was given as Joe Kelly. He admitted that he was known by the name of Joe Kelly, but, as the description of the murderer did not fit him, except as to his name, and as to his hair being gray, he continued to make his way out of the state. Upon leaving Marysville he assumed and retained the name of Farley. At Portola he disposed of his hat and bought a cap. His effort at the trial to create the impression that had the description of the suspect which he had read in the papers fitted him he would have returned to disprove any suspicion that may have been cast upon him was wholly inconsistent with the excuse he offered for continuing his flight from the state, to wit, that the slaying of a popular officer had aroused a bitter feeling in the public mind, which made it dangerous for any one who might be accused of the crime, and the further disadvantage that he would have been put to by reason of having suffered a former conviction for felony, were odds against which, though innocent, he could not hope to prevail.

In addition to the direct testimony given by the three persons that were held in duress by the unmasked defendant for something like ten minutes while he was executing the robbery, a fourth person, who was a waiter in a local coffee house, and who was well acquainted with the defendant, was an eyewitness to a part of the crime. This witness, at the time the first shot was fired, was engaged in conversation with the officer who was killed a few minutes later, at a point not more than 160 feet distant from the Canteen saloon. At the report of the pistol shot this witness and the officer started to investigate the report. The witness preceded the officer slightly, and as he came to the place that was being robbed he paused and looked through a window and observed the defendant behind the bar in the act of taking the money from the cash register drawer and putting it into his pocket. Defendant had the pistol in his hand. The witness warned the officer, who was approaching the saloon door, that it was a holdup, and to look out. The officer entered the saloon hurriedly, while the witness lagged a little behind. As the officer entered he made some inquiry as to what was going on, and the defendant immediately pointed the pistol at him and fired, with the result already related. The defendant, as he fled, passed quite near to the witness, with the pistol smoking in his hand, and disappeared into the darkness. The witness, who had known the defendant quite well for some time past, said that he had a good view of the defendant's face, both while he was behind the bar committing the robbery and as he passed by him leaving the saloon.

A fifth witness, who had served time in the Montana state prison at the same time that the defendant was serving on a felony conviction—1916-1918—and who was well acquainted with the latter, was brought from the Montana state prison, where he was serving a second term, to testify in the case. His testimony was that he met the defendant twice during the evening on which the murder was committed. The first time was at the hour of about 6:30 o'clock, and the second time was at about 8:45 o'clock, as the witness was returning to his home after having attended a picture show. The defendant was then talking with a friend called Gimp Riley, and, as the witness approached the two, they engaged him in conversation. The defendant said to him if he wanted to see some fun to "stick around." The witness asked what he was going to do, and he replied that he was going to make Parades place "elevate," and then he was going to "get the wop joint on the corner." Upon being asked what he meant by the term "wop joint," he replied that he meant the Canteen saloon. He exhibited to the witness a white-handled pistol which he was carrying in the inside pocket of his coat. The witness at the time was engaged as a janitor in a local church, and on the following day he reported the matter to a parish priest and to the sheriff and the district attorney of the county and gave them a description of the defendant. An intensive search was made, but the defendant could not be found in or about Marysville. That the defendant fled the state and concealed his identity to avoid meeting the charge of having murdered the officer there is not the slightest room for doubt.

[1] The evidence in the case, if believed, positively established the guilt of the defendant. Four eyewitnesses testified to the robbery, three of whom actually witnessed the shooting, and the fourth saw a pistol in the hand of the defendant immediately before the shot was fired and saw smoke issuing from it as the defendant held it in his hand as he left the place where the killing occurred immediately after the fatal shot was fired. A fifth witness testified to the planning and preparation of the robbery by the defendant. To this may be added other incriminatory and corroboratory circumstances arising from the defendant's conduct and flight immediately following the shooting.

[2] Appellant assails the character of the principal witnesses for the people, on the ground that one was serving a second term in a penitentiary, the second was an admitted violator of the National Prohibition Act and two others, by reason of their presence in and patronage of the Canteen saloon, were aiding and abetting the violation of said act. We are also reminded of the claim made that the barkeeper, in particular, identified another person as the bandit shortly after the homicide was committed. Two or three persons, including newspaper representatives, testified that the description given by the barkeeper, and by two other witnesses to the killing, did not tally with the defendant in some important physical respects, and the clothing worn by the defendant did not agree with the wearing apparel described by said witnesses. It is true that shortly after the killing and barkeeper leaned strongly to the opinion that a person who was detained as a suspect was the person who had committed the crime. He explained, however, that while the resemblance was strong, the suspect had the appearance of being quite a bit younger than the defendant. At any rate, the suspect was not held upon the identifications made by any of the witnesses to the shooting. The barkeeper, from a number of photographs shown him, selected the photograph of the defendant as being the picture of the man who actually committed the murder, and from the moment he first saw the defendant he was very positive in his identification. The other two witnesses were reasonably certain with their identification of the defendant. The waiter, who was conversing with the officer at the time the first shot was fired, and who observed him through a window in the act of committing the robbery, and then again as he left the place of crime, was positive in his identification.

While discrepancies or inaccuracies may have occurred in the attempts of the several witnesses to reproduce descriptively the features and lineaments of the defendant from mental pictures, nevertheless, when the defendant was brought into their presence, each one identified him as the person who took the life of the officer. They had had ample time to observe his features, bodily movements, and, in addition thereto, had heard him speak. Ordinarily the power to accurately describe human features is with most persons a limited power, and therefore on questions of identification, except in special instances, much must depend on the intelligence and honesty of the person called upon to make the identification by personal observation of the person to be identified. It is not reasonably probable that there could exist in the instant case a mistake as to the identity of the defendant and his relation to the murder charged against him. This was a matter wholly within the province of the jury, and, there being ample evidence to sustain an implied finding to that effect, we are not at liberty to disturb it. Counsel for appellant urges the commission of error in admitting in evidence what he terms confessions of guilt made by the defendant to C. J. McCoy, sheriff of Yuba county, both while the defendant was being transported from Wyoming to Yuba city in the custody of said officer and while he was detained in the Yuba county jail awaiting trial.

There are three answers to this claim of error: First, the record does not show that the statements or admissions made by the defendant—save possibly in one instance and for this the cross-examination of the sheriff by appellant's counsel was responsible—amounted to confessions; second, the admissions or statements objected to as confessions were made prior to the advice, which the court ruled fell within the rules of exclusion, given by the sheriff to the defendant and which was made the ground on which the court held that whatever was thereafter said in the nature of a confession by the defendant to the sheriff or district attorney was inadmissible; third, if the admission complained of amounted to a confession, the court, in the exercise of its discretion by admitting the evidence objected to, determined it to be legally free and voluntary. And we cannot say under the evidence herein that it committed an abuse of discretion in so doing.

The fraud and imposition claimed to have been practiced upon the defendant as an inducement to influence or obtain a confession from him consisted in the sheriff telling the defendant that the finger prints made upon the cash register had been taken, and that they corresponded with the prints of the defendant. As a matter of fact, an attempt was made by Hart S. Schroeder, Jr., the state identification and microanalytical expert, to take the finger prints, but it was known to the sheriff that no reliance could be placed upon them as other finger prints had been superimposed upon the cash register. The expert said that they may have been the prints of the defendant or "of any person." Like error is claimed because of the admission of testimony given by the sheriff to the effect that the defendant had told the sheriff that he, defendant, had read in the newspapers that he knew he was wanted for murder, and that he was glad that he was arrested, as he had been keeping out of the way of the officers for a long time, and it had been a hard strain on him. In this connection he stated to the sheriff that he "had lung and kidney troubles, and it didn't make much difference to him now." The sheriff admitted that he told the defendant exactly the evidence the state had against him and gave him the names of the witnesses. The defendant narrated his flight, and said that it was his intention at one time to let his beard grow; he also said he was going to make his "getaway" if he possibly could. His words in this respect were: "You can't blame a man in the same condition I am if a chance comes up to make a getaway." Also the defendant admitted that he bought the cap at Portola for the purpose of disguising his identity. The concluding portion of the testimony, to which appellant particularly objects as having influenced the defendant in making the statement or admissions claimed to have been made by him, but which he denied making at the trial, as found in the record, are:

"I (sheriff) told him I had located certain witnesses. He said to me, 'you have all the witnesses?' And I said, 'Yes.' He said: 'I have been identified by all of them?' Then he said: 'I think I will go upstairs and enter a plea of guilty. What do you think the judge will do with me?' I told him the judge would hang him. Then he went on and told me that he didn't think he had a chance, and he wanted me to send for the district attorney, and I told him the district attorney was out of town. Then I said to him, 'Why don't you make a confession to the district attorney?' Then he said to me, 'I think I will have you send for my lawyers, so I can tell them I am going to plead guilty.'"

The sheriff then left and did not return until several hours thereafter. The defendant then requested him to send for the district attorney. Upon the arrival of the district attorney, the defendant, sheriff, and district attorney went into the sheriff's private office. At this point in the proceedings the court announced that the objection as to any conversation or any part of any conversation that may have taken place between the defendant, the district attorney, and the sheriff would be sustained on the ground that the inquiry made by the sheriff of the defendant, to wit, "Why don't you make a confession to the district attorney?" amounted to advice and counsel coming from one in authority and was, therefore, inadmissible. Whatever was said by any of the parties to the conversation was not told. Later it developed that the request of the defendant to be taken to the district attorney's office occurred before the sheriff asked why he did not make a confession to that officer, but the court's ruling was not changed.

[3] On cross-examination, counsel for the defendant drew from the sheriff by direct interrogatory the following answer on a specific subject not touched upon by the district attorney:

"Q. Didn't you say to him on one of your visits to him prior to July 3d in substance this: 'Joe, I don't think you are a cold-blooded murderer; the way I figure it out is this: You had a gun you are not used to, and in the scuffle it accidentally went off, and that is the way he was killed.' Didn't you make that statement to him? A. 'I did; yes.'"

Upon redirect examination the district attorney attempted to fix the time in the order of events when the above question was asked and answer given; that is, whether it was prior or subsequent to the time the defendant was asked why he did not confess to the district attorney, which occurred on July 3. The witness answered that he did have a conversation with the defendant in regard to a "gun" before July 3. The court, in an effort to straighten out the confused situation, said: "You make any explanation you desire." The witness then proceeded:

"I told him, I says, 'Joe, I don't think you are a cold-blooded murderer; you had a gun, one of these guns you fan, you can't cock it; the only way you can do is hold the trigger back?' He says, 'I think that is the way it happened,' but I told him all the time he was talking to me, when he was talking about going up stairs and pleading guilty, I told him if he went up there the judge would hang him.'"

This testimony seems to have been brought out without objection on redirect examination, and no motion was made to strike it out. As a part of the subject-matter was brought out by the defense, it was proper for the witness to tell all that was said on that subject, even though the balance was not favorable to the defendant.

Objection was also made to the testimony of the witness Scandalis, which was directed to a conversation which he had with the defendant at the county jail on July 19 while he was there for the purpose of delivering some article of merchandise to another prisoner. The objection was made on the ground that anything he may have said in the nature of a confession was influenced by the advice that the sheriff had given to the defendant on July 3, and therefore inadmissible. It was shown by preliminary examination that the witness was in no way connected with any of the law or peace officers and the court admitted the evidence. The witness remarked to the defendant that a report was on the streets that he was going to confess, and asked him if the report was true. The witness' answer was:

"He told me he would confess if he knew the judge would give him life, but he knew the judge was going to hang him; that is why he wouldn't confess."

[4] The untrue statement made to the defendant by the sheriff to the effect that the finger prints taken from the cash register corresponded with his was not legally sufficient to justify the exclusion of the statements subsequently made by the defendant. While the indulgence in deceptive methods or false statements is not morally justifiable or a commendable practice, this alone would not render even a confession of guilt inadmissible. In the recent case of People v. Castello et al. (Cal. Sup.) 229 P. 855, we had occasion to review the text-books and the decisions of this court on this particular subject, and adopted the following paragraph as a sound exposition of the principle:

"The fact that a confession was procured by the employment of falsehood by a police officer, detective, or other person does not alone exclude it; nor does the employment of any artifice, deception or fraud exclude it, if the artifice or fraud employed was not calculated to procure an untrue statement. Neither does the fact that a confession was obtained by a promise of secrecy render it incompetent, if there was no motive to produce a false statement." 16 C. J. 729.

[5-7] We are of the opinion that none of the statements made by the defendant amounted to a confession of guilt. At no time did he admit his guilt. His statements may be regarded as some evidence of a consciousness of guilt, but this does not bring them within the definition of a "confession." In People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 P. 15, a confession is defined as "a person's declaration of his agency or participation in a crime. The term is restricted to acknowledgments of guilt. People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151; People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 632; People v. Le Roy, 65 Cal. 613; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 170." While the defendant did not deny the commission of the crime, as the defendant did in the Ammerman Case, he made no confession of guilt. The rule is that the admission of the truth of matters which, while they do not themselves involve guilt, but when connected with other facts tend to prove guilt, does not render the proof of such matters inadmissible. Proof of such admissions is competent without the preliminary proof. People v. Ammerman, supra, and cases cited therein.

As we have before stated, the only statement that could in any sense be regarded as a confession was the statement concerning the discharge of the pistol, which was brought into the case as heretofore explained. All other statements were guarded as to a confession, and the one last specifically mentioned is not a definite confession of guilt. But even though the admissions be regarded as confessions, the question as to whether they were freely and voluntarily made was a preliminary question addressed to the trial court, and its discretion will not be disturbed in the absence of a showing that the court abused its discretion. The statement made by the defendant to the witness Scandalis, to the effect that he would enter a plea of guilty if assured by the judge that no graver judgment would be pronounced than life imprisonment, was not a confession of guilt. Moreover, the court found that it was freely made.

[8] There is no merit in the contention that the testimony of the sheriff as to the statement made to him by the defendant was not admissible, unless it should also be shown by Officer Booth, who assisted the sheriff in bringing the defendant to Yuba county, that said officer had not induced the defendant in any way to make said statements to the sheriff. The sheriff purported to testify fully as to all that was done or said by him in the matter. No serious contention was made at the trial that any statement or confession was made to Booth in the absence of the sheriff. The defendant took the witness chair in his own behalf, and testified to conversations had with the sheriff, but made no claim that Booth had at any time or in any manner attempted to procure a statement or confession from him. There was nothing surreptitious in Booth's absence from the trial.

[9] We have examined the assignments of error presented by the defendant as to the court's rulings on questions of evidence and we are satisfied that no prejudicial errors were committed. Exception is taken to that portion of the court's charge which reads as follows:

"Therefore, if any one kills an officer while such officer is lawfully making or endeavoring to make an arrest, or properly or in lawful manner doing any other official act, the homicide so committed can neither be excused as an act of self-defense, nor mitigated on the ground of provocation, but is deemed to have been done with malice in willful defiance of public justice, and such killing is murder.

"I instruct you that if you find from the evidence of a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the deceased, Francis Heenan, was at the time of the alleged homicide a public officer of the city of Marysville, and that he was then and there properly and in lawful manner endeavoring to arrest defendant upon a felony charge of which he had reasonable ground to believe defendant guilty, and if you should further find beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that said defendant, then and there knowing himself to be charged with a felony, and in order to avoid such arrest upon such felony charge, did then and there shoot and kill said Francis Heenan, then I charge you that such killing cannot be excused as an act of self-defense nor mitigated on the grounds of provocation."

The objection made to the criticized instructions is that they omitted to except killing by accident or from any cause which did not show an intent to kill. There was absolutely no evidence tending to show that the killing was accidental. Besides, the court instructed the jury fully as to excusable and justifiable homicide. The jury was further instructed as to intent, and told that in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence. Read with other instructions there could have been no misunderstanding as to the elements essential to constitute murder. The defendant denied the killing, and there was no evidence offered which tended to show self-defense, or justifiable or excusable homicide or manslaughter. The instructions contain a full, fair, and complete exposition of the law of murder, and informed the jury that it was within their discretion to relieve the defendant of the extreme penalty of the law.

[10] Upon the motion for new trial the defendant offered to call to the witness stand certain of the jurors to prove by them that in arriving at their verdict they acted under a misapprehension of the law, believing that the court had the discretion of fixing the punishment at life imprisonment; also during their deliberation they disagreed upon the interpretation of the law, and that they had asked that they be allowed to speak with the court. The district attorney not being available, they decided the question for themselves without the aid of further instructions from the court. As before remarked the instructions were full and complete on every phase of the law essential for the guidance of the jury. Besides, it is the well-settled rule in this state that a juror cannot impeach his verdict except where it is the result of the resort to the determination of chance. People v. Azoff, 105 Cal. 632, 39 P. 59; People v. Soap, 127 Cal. 408, 59 P. 771; De Cou v. Howell as Ad'm, etc., 190 Cal. 741, 214 P. 444. A long list of authorities, definitely settling the law in this respect might be cited.

We have examined the record with care, and find that no prejudicial error was committed in the trial of the case.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MILLER et al. v. BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 8012.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1925. Rehearing Denied March 26, 1925.)

1. Constitutional law §81—Police power indispensable prerogative of sovereignty and, though not illimitable, develops to meet changing conditions.

The police power of a state is an indispensable prerogative of sovereignty and, though not to be lightly limited, is not illimitable, and its application depends on whether it is reasonably necessary to promote public health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the people, and it develops within reason to meet changing conditions.

2. Municipal corporations §601—"Zoning" regulations defined.

In its original and primary sense, "zoning" is simply the division of a city into districts and prescription and application of different regulations in each district which are divided into two classes: Those regulations having to do with structural and architectural designs of buildings; and those which prescribe use to which buildings within certain designated districts may be put.

3. Municipal corporations §601—Zoning ordinance valid, when necessary to promote public welfare.

A zoning regulation is a valid exercise of police power which is necessary to subserve ends for which police power exists, namely, promotion of public health, safety, morals, and general welfare.

4. Municipal corporations §601—Scope of zoning ordinance stated.

Zoning ordinance has much wider scope than mere suppression of offensive uses of property, and acts not only negatively but constructively and affirmatively for promotion of public welfare.

5. Municipal corporations §63(2)—Court required to determine whether zoning ordinances are arbitrary and discriminatory.

In determining validity of zoning ordinance, courts are required to determine, in addition to need thereof, whether or not they are arbitrary and discriminatory and have any reasonable tendency to promote public health, safety, morals, and general welfare.

6. Municipal corporations §601—Zoning plan, if equably applied, is within police power.

The regulations of development of city under a comprehensive zoning plan tends to promote general welfare of community, and the adoption and enforcement of such a plan, when fairly conceived and equably applied, is within scope of police power.

7. Municipal corporations §63(2) — Court must determine whether zoning ordinance is necessary and impartially applied.

Duty of court, in considering validity of zoning ordinance, to determine whether method of classification and districting is reasonably necessary to public welfare, health, safety, morals, or general welfare, and whether it has been applied fairly and impartially in each instance.

8. Municipal corporations §601 — Establishment of private residential district by zoning plan within police power.

The establishment, as part of a comprehensive zoning plan, of strictly private residential districts, from which are excluded and absolutely prohibited apartments, tenements, general public enterprises, and like structures, is a legitimate exercise of police power.

9. Constitutional law §48—Every intendment indulged in favor of validity of exercise of police power and not nullified, unless it clearly has no relation to public health, safety, etc.

A large discretion is vested in Legislature with reference to exercise of police power, and every intendment is to be indulged in favor of its validity, and it is only when it probably has no substantial relation to public health, safety, morals, and general welfare that it will be nullified by the court.

10. Municipal corporations §601—Establishment of residential district is for general welfare.

The establishment of a strictly private residential district, as part of a comprehensive zoning plan, is for general welfare of the community, because it tends to promote and perpetuate the American home.

11. Municipal corporations ☞63(2) — Court will not interfere with establishment of residential district in absence of abuse of discretion.

It is primarily province of municipal body to which zoning function is committed to draw line of demarcation in establishing residential zoning district, and courts cannot interfere with discretion in absence of clear showing of abuse thereof.

12. Municipal corporations ☞601 — Zoning plan should provide for future extensions and modifications.

A comprehensive zoning plan should provide for extensions and modifications of existing features, as unforeseen changes make necessary, to perfect and perpetuate such plan.

13. Evidence ☞23(1)—Judicial notice taken that execution of zoning plan requires time.

It is matter of common knowledge that a comprehensive zoning plan cannot be made in a day, and therefore court may take judicial notice that it will take much time to work out details of plan, and that it would be destructive if, during incubation of plan, parties should be permitted to enter on course of construction which might defeat ultimate execution of plan.

14. Municipal corporations ☞601—Emergency zoning ordinance held valid exercise of police power.

That a comprehensive zoning plan had not matured to point of being an existing ordinance at time that an emergency zoning ordinance was enacted does not detract from validity of emergency zoning ordinance, on theory that zoning ordinance may not be ultimately enforced, as presumption that council will not fail in performance of official duty must prevail, and hence such emergency zoning ordinance, being part of comprehensive plan which has relation to welfare of city, must be held to be a valid exercise of police power.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by George Lee Miller and another against the Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles and Charles H. Treat and another, as members of said board, to compel issuance of permit to construct a four-flat building in a residence district. From the judgment denying writ, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. W. Bearman and W. L. Engelhardt, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Lucius P. Green, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This proceeding in mandamus was instituted in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles to compel the respondents the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles to issue to plaintiffs a permit to erect a four-family flat dwelling on a tract of land located on West Adams street in said city. At the time the plaintiffs first made application to the board for a building permit, an existing zoning ordinance of said city did not prohibit the erection of four-family flat dwellings in residence district No. 20, wherein plaintiffs' lot was located. A permit for the erection of such building was therefore issued. Shortly thereafter the permit was canceled and revoked by said board, for the reason that the city council of Los Angeles was contemplating a comprehensive zoning plan, covering the entire city and that, as a part of that comprehensive zoning scheme, and in keeping therewith, an ordinance would be enacted prohibiting the erection or construction of four-family flats in that part of the city wherein the plaintiffs' property was located. On September 1, 1921, this action was instituted by the filing of a complaint to compel the issuance of a permit. On September 6, the city council of Los Angeles passed an emergency ordinance, No. 42510 (New Series), which declared it to be unlawful "for any person, firm, or corporation to erect, or construct, alter or maintain, or cause or permit to be erected, constructed, altered, or maintained with the residence zone hereby created any building or premises which shall be used for, or designed or intended to be used for, housing more than two families together with its usual accessories."

The only defense interposed by the board to the issuance of the writ was the existence of the last-mentioned ordinance. The trial court held said ordinance to be a valid exercise of the police power of the municipality and denied the writ of mandate sought by the plaintiffs. From this judgment plaintiffs appeal. No point is made that the board has not the power to revoke a permit once it has been duly issued, nor that the ordinance, if valid, may not operate retroactively to nullify a permit previously issued.

At the threshold of the discussion it may be well to state that in other jurisdictions the question has been presented of whether or not the power to pass a particular zoning ordinance has been delegated to a municipality, but that question is not raised here, obviously for the reason that the power to do so is conferred upon municipalities in California by the fundamental law of the state and by a legislative enabling act, entitled:

"An act to provide for the establishment within municipalities of districts or zones within which the use of property, height of improvements and required open spaces for light and ventilation of such buildings, may be regulated by ordinance." Stats. 1917, p. 1419.

The constitutional grant of power to the municipalities is to be found in section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides that:

"Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

The enabling act of 1917 declares that:

"For the public interest, health, comfort, convenience, preservation of the public peace, safety, morals, order and the public welfare, the city council, board of trustees or other legislative body of any incorporated city and town of California, hereinafter referred to as the council, may by ordinance create or divide the city into districts within some of which it shall be lawful and within others of which it shall be unlawful to erect, construct, alter or maintain certain buildings, or to carry on certain trades or callings or within which the height and bulk of future buildings shall be limited. The council may by ordinance regulate, restrict and segregate the location of industries, the several classes of business, trades or callings, the location of apartment or tenement houses, clubhouses, group residences, two-family dwellings, single family dwellings and the several classes of public and semi-public buildings, and the location of buildings or property designed for specified uses, and may divide the city into districts of such number, shape and area as the council may deem best suited to carry out the purposes of this act. * * * For each such district regulations may be imposed designating the class of use that shall be excluded or subjected to special regulations and designating the uses for which buildings may not be erected or altered, or designating the class of use which only shall be permitted. * * *" Stats. 1917, p. 1419, §§ 1, 2.

It may also be noted, at the outset, that the ordinance in question is prohibitory in its nature and that the prescribed prohibition is absolute. The ordinance does not attempt to designate and regulate the materials to be used in the buildings, nor does it purport to regulate the height, area, and architectural design of such buildings as may be erected within the designated district. It prohibits the construction of any building, irrespective of height, area, bulk, structural design or architectural features, "designed or intended to be used for the housing of more than two families." It is, in short, purely prohibitory zoning directed solely to use and occupation. The sole question presented is whether or not the ordinance in controversy is a rightful exercise of the police power conferred upon municipalities.

[1] The police power of a state is an indispensable prerogative of sovereignty and one that is not to be lightly limited. Indeed, even though at times its operation may seem harsh, the imperative necessity for its existence precludes any limitation upon its exercise save that it be not unreasonably and arbitrarily invoked and applied. Hadacheck v. Sebastian, 239 U. S. 394, 36 S. Ct. 143, 60 L. Ed. 348, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 927; District of Columbia v. Brooke, 214 U. S. 138, 149, 29 S. Ct. 560, 53 L. Ed. 941. It is not, however, illimitable and the marking and measuring of the extent of its exercise and application is determined by a consideration of the question of whether or not any invocation of that power, in any given case, and as applied to existing conditions, is reasonably necessary to promote the public health, safety, morals (Railroad Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 470, 471, 24 L. Ed. 527; Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. Ed. 989), or general welfare of the people of a community (Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. Ill., 200 U. S. 561, 592, 26 S. Ct. 341, 50 L. Ed. 596, 4 Ann. Cas. 1175). In short, the police power, as such, is not confined within the narrow circumscription of precedents, resting upon past conditions which do not cover and control present day conditions obviously calling for revised regulations to promote the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the public; that is to say, as a commonwealth develops politically, economically, and socially, the police power likewise develops, within reason, to meet the changed and changing conditions. What was at one time regarded as an improper exercise of the police power may now, because of changed living conditions, be recognized as a legitimate exercise of that power. This is so because:

"What was a reasonable exercise [of this power] in the days of our fathers may to-day seem so utterly unreasonable as to make it difficult for us to comprehend the existence of conditions that would justify same; what would by our fathers have been rejected as unthinkable is to-day accepted as a most proper and reasonable exercise thereof." Streich v. Board of Education, 34 S. D. 169, 147 N. W. 779, L. R. A. 1915A, 632, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 760.

In its inception the police power was closely concerned with the preservation of the public peace, safety, morals, and health without specific regard for "the general welfare." The increasing complexity of our civilization and institutions later gave rise to cases wherein the promotion of the public welfare was held by the courts to be a legitimate object for the exercise of the police power. As our civic life has developed so has the definition of "public welfare" until it has been held to embrace regulations "to promote the economic welfare, public convenience, and general prosperity of the community." Chicago, B. & Q. R. v. Illinois, supra. Thus it is apparent that the police power is not a circumscribed prerogative, but is elastic and, in keeping with the growth of knowledge and the belief in the popular mind of the need for its application, capable of expansion to meet existing conditions of modern life, and thereby keep pace with the social, economic, moral, and intellectual evolution of the human race. In brief, "there is nothing known to the law that keeps more in step with human progress than does the exercise of this power" (Streich v. Board of Education, supra), and that power "may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage, or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare" (Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 31 S. Ct. 186, 55 L. Ed. 112, 32 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1062, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487).

There can be no question but that there is a prevailing and preponderating sentiment in favor of necessary and reasonable zoning. The growth of this sentiment has been rapid and widespread. The first comprehensive zoning ordinance was that of New York City enacted in 1916. According to a recent bulletin of the United States Department of Commerce, 35 states and the District of Columbia have adopted this form of regulation; 221 municipalities have been zoned and over 22,000,000 inhabitants, aggregating 40 per cent. of the urban population of this country, are living in zoned territory. The rapidity of the growth of the sentiment in favor of comprehensive zoning, coupled with the extensive and successful application of the idea, are evidence of its present and potential value for the promotion and perpetuation, along broader and better lines, of the moral and material welfare of a people.

[2] So thoroughly has the value of zoning been demonstrated that no longer is the constitutionality of the principle open to question. The books abound with cases upholding the constitutional right to zone and sanctioning the principle upon which that right is founded. In its original and primary sense, zoning is simply the division of a city into districts and the prescription and application of different regulations in each district. Roughly stated, these regulations, which may be called "zoning regulations," are divided into two classes: (1) Those which regulate the height or bulk of buildings within certain designated districts, in other words, those regulations which have to do with structural and architectural designs of the buildings; and (2) those which prescribe the use to which buildings within certain designated districts may be put. Both modes of regulation have received the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States. In Welch v. Swasey, 214 U. S. 91, 29 S. Ct. 567, 53 L. Ed. 923, the constitutionality of the right to district a city and set up different regulations with respect to the height of buildings in each district was upheld. In Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 S. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 S. Ct. 730, 28 L. Ed. 1145; Reinman v. Little Rock, 237 U. S. 171, 35 S. Ct. 511, 59 L. Ed. 900; and Hadacheck v. Sebastian, 239 U. S. 394, 36 S. Ct. 143, 60 L. Ed. 348, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 927, it was held that by the exercise of the police power certain occupations could be restricted to certain defined portions of a city.

In California it is well settled that there is no objection to zoning ordinances as such. There are many decisions in this jurisdiction upholding the right to zone for use. Thus it has been held that laundries, livery stables, lumber yards, brickyards and undertaking establishments may be restricted to certain districts. Ex parte Moynier, 65 Cal. 33, 2 P. 728; In re Hang Kie, 69 Cal. 149, 10 P. 327; Grumbach v. Leland, 154 Cal. 679, 98 P. 1059; Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 118 P. 714; In re Montgomery, 163 Cal. 457, 125 P. 1070, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 130; Ex parte Hadacheck, 165 Cal. 416, 132 P. 584 L. R. A. 1916B, 1248 [affirmed in Hadacheck v. Sebastian, supra]; Sam Kee v. Wilde, 41 Cal. App. 528, 183 P. 164; Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, 41 Cal. App. 520, 183 P. 230; Brown v. City of Los Angeles, 183 Cal. 783, 192 P. 716.

[3, 4] It is conceded, as indeed it must be, by the opponents of the ordinance in controversy here, that it is within the police power, by zoning, to banish nuisances and "near-nuisances" from certain districts. It is disputed, however, that the police power may be extended by any zoning ordinance, comprehensive or otherwise, to the regulation and isolation of vocations, business enterprises, and residential uses which are not intrinsically obnoxious. A perusal of the decisions in California, which have upheld the prohibition and segregation of certain businesses by means of zoning, indicates that the court has not limited the power to zone to nuisances per se, and has held that certain business establishments, harmless in themselves, may become "near-nuisances" because of the character of the neighborhood in which they are operating. In Ex parte Quong Wo, supra, the court justified the exclusion of a certain type of laundry from a residential district upon the theory that a laundry is "of such a nature that it may be confined in the lawful exercise of the police power within defined limits in a city." This is tantamount to saying that, whenever the recognized purposes for which the police power may be called into play are subserved either by exclusion or segregation of any business, it may be thus regulated. This is but another way of saying that any zoning regulation is a valid exercise of the police power which is necessary to subserve the ends for which the police power exists, namely, the promotion of the public health, safety, morals, and general welfare. It will thus be seen that the police power, as evidenced in zoning ordinances, has a much wider scope than the mere suppression of the offensive uses of property (Des Moines v. Manhattan Oil Co., 193 Iowa, 1096, 184 N. W. 823, 188 N. W. 921, 23 L. R. A. 1322), and that it acts, not only negatively, but constructively and affirmatively, for the promotion of the public welfare (Bacon v. Walker, 204 U. S. 311, 27 S. Ct. 289, 51 L. Ed. 499).

Much is said about the constitutional guaranties attaching to the ownership of property in the individual. In this behalf it will be noted that:

"It is thoroughly established in this country that the rights preserved to the individual by these constitutional provisions are held in subordination to the rights of society. Although one owns property, he may not do with it as he pleases, any more than he may act in accordance with his personal desires. As the interest of society justifies restraints upon individual conduct, so also does it justify restraints upon the use to which property may be devoted. It was not intended by these constitutional provisions to so far protect the individual in the use of his property as to enable him to use it to the detriment of society. By thus protecting individual rights, society did not part with the power to protect itself or to promote its general well-being. Where the interest of the individual conflicts with the interest of society, such individual interest is subordinated to the general welfare. If in the prosecution of governmental functions it becomes necessary to take private property, compensation must be made. But incidental damages to property resulting from governmental activities, or laws passed in the promotion of the public welfare, are not considered a taking of the property for which compensation must be made." Carter v. Harper, 182 Wis. 148, 196 N. W. 451; Chicago, B. & Q. R. v. Illinois, supra.

[5, 6] It may be taken as now well settled that courts are required in considering the validity of zoning ordinances to determine, in addition to the need thereof, whether or not they are arbitrary and discriminatory in their conception and application, and whether they have any reasonable tendency to promote the public morals, health, safety, or general welfare and prosperity of a community. It may be safely said, we think, that it is the consensus of opinion that the regulation of the development of a city, under a comprehensive and carefully considered zoning plan, does tend to promote the general welfare of a community, and there is no doubt, it seems to us, that the adoption and enforcement of such a plan, when fairly conceived and equably applied, is well within the scope of the police power. The increase of our urban population makes regulation necessary. As the congestion of our cities increases, likewise do the problems of traffic control and police, fire, and health protection. Comprehensive and systematic zoning aids in the successful solution of these problems and obviously tends thereby to affirmatively promote the public welfare. Decisions upon the constitutionality of comprehensive zoning are not numerous, but the weight of authority upon the subject is, however, strongly in favor of the constitutionality of comprehensive zoning. Lincoln Trust Co. v. Williams Building Corp., 229 N. Y. 313, 128 N. E. 209; Ware v. City of Wichita, 113 Kan. 153, 214 P. 99; State ex rel. Carter v. Harper, supra; In re Opinion of Justices, 234 Mass. 597, 127 N. E. 525;

State ex rel. Civello v. City of New Orleans, 154 La. 271, 97 So. 440, 33 A. L. R. 260; Spector v. Building Inspector of Milton (Mass.) 145 N. E. 265; Brett v. Building Commissioner of Brookline (Mass.) 145 N. E. 269; State ex rel. Morris v. Osborn, 22 Ohio N. P. Reports (N. S.) 549.

[7] It cannot be gainsaid, however, that many municipalities, evidently upon the theory that zoning is a panacea for civic ills, have, under the guise of zoning, sought to enact and enforce unreasonable and discriminatory ordinances. Some of these attempted regulations have been palpably for the exclusive and preferential benefit of particular localities. The duty, therefore, devolves upon the courts to determine in each instance whether or not the ordinance, either in whole or in part, is invalid. In the determination of this problem two questions present themselves: (1) Is the scheme of zoning as a whole sound, that is to say, is the method of classification and districting reasonably necessary to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare? and (2) has the scheme of classification and districting been applied fairly and impartially in each instance? In the instant case it is conceded that the district in question is strictly residential and that if strictly residential districts may be established, plaintiffs have no cause of complaint.

[8] This brings us naturally to the question of whether or not there may be legally established, as a part of a comprehensive zoning plan, strictly private residential districts from which are excluded and absolutely prohibited general business enterprises, apartments, tenements, and like structures. We are of the opinion that it may be done; that the establishment of such districts as a part of a systematic and carefully considered and existing zoning plan is a legitimate exercise of the police power delegated to the municipality.

[9] It is scarcely necessary to reiterate here the well-recognized principle that courts are loathe to substitute their judgment as to the necessity for a particular enactment for the legislative judgment as to the need of such enactment with reference to the exercise of the police power. A large discretion is vested in the legislative branch of the government with reference to the exercise of the police power. Mehlos v. Milwaukee, 156 Wis. 591, 146 N. W. 882, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1009, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1102; Carter v. Harper, supra. Every intendment is to be indulged by the courts in favor of the validity of its exercise and, unless the measure is clearly oppressive, it will be deemed to be within the purview of that power. It is only when it is palpable that the measure in controversy has no real or substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare that it will be nullified by the courts. The courts may differ with the Legislature as to the wisdom and propriety of a particular enactment as a means of accomplishing a particular end, but as long as there are considerations of public health, safety, morals, or general welfare which the legislative body may have had in mind, which could have justified the regulation, it must be assumed by the court that the legislative body had those considerations in mind and that those considerations did justify the regulation. State ex rel. Civello v. City of New Orleans, supra. In Ex parte Hada-check, supra, the court held in effect that, when the necessity or propriety of an enactment was a question upon which reasonable minds might differ, the propriety and necessity of such enactment was a matter of legislative determination.

That there are reasonable minds which are of the belief that a regulation creating and establishing strictly residential districts is necessary and proper is evidenced by the passage of such ordinances in such widely varying parts of the Union as Massachusetts, Louisiana, New York, Kansas, Iowa, and Wisconsin. In each of these states the problem of the validity of the establishment of a strictly residential district was before the highest court of those respective jurisdictions and in each case such ordinance was held to be within the scope of the police power.

An enabling act of the state of Massachusetts authorized cities and towns by ordinance to provide:

"That certain kinds of dwelling houses and tenement houses shall be restricted to specified parts of the city or town, or shall be excluded from specified parts of the city or town, or that dwelling houses or tenement houses situated in specified parts of the city or towns shall conform to certain regulations in respect to their construction or use which do not apply to such buildings in other parts of the city or town."

It further provided:

That the city or town might be divided "into districts or zones, and the construction and use of buildings in each district or zone may be regulated. * * *" G. L. c. 40, § 25.

The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts held that these provisions of the act were not contrary either to the state or the federal Constitution. In re Opinion of Justices, 234 Mass. 597, 127 N. E. 525. See, also, Building Inspector of Lowell v. Stoklosa (Mass.) 145 N. E. 262.

The fact that Massachusetts may be the only state which has authorized the passage of zoning laws by constitutional provisions does not detract from the value of the Massachusetts cases as authority. In the cases last cited the act was held not to be within the inhibitions of the federal Constitution. Inasmuch as the provisions of the federal Constitution relating to police power are similar to those of our own state Constitution, the reasoning of those cases and those decisions are applicable to the precise question presented here. Carter v. Harper, supra.

The Court of Appeals of New York, in Lincoln Trust Co. v. Williams Building Corporation, supra, held the adoption of a zoning resolution creating three districts—residential, business, and unrestricted—to be a valid exercise of the police power. The Iowa Supreme Court, in Des Moines v. Manhattan Oil Co., 193 Iowa, 106, 184 N. W. 823, 188 N. W. 921, held that a zoning ordinance establishing a restricted residential district was not in contravention of a state statute nor the federal Constitution. And the Supreme Court of Kansas, in Ware v. City of Wichita, supra, held that cities could plan and create reasonable zoning districts for the future systematic development of the city and provide therein for residential, commercial, and industrial districts. The Supreme Court of Louisiana pointed out, as do almost all of the cases dealing with the subject, the considerations of public health, safety, morals, and general welfare upon which a zoning ordinance, providing for the creation of residential, commercial, and industrial districts, may be based. State ex rel. Civello v. City of New Orleans, supra. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in a carefully considered opinion, has likewise upheld, and for much the same reasons, the validity of residential zoning districts. Carter v. Harper, supra.

The case of State of Ohio ex rel. Max Morris v. C. M. Osborn, 22 Ohio N. P. (N. S.) 549, presents the precise point in controversy here and hence is particularly pertinent. While the decision is not one of a court of last resort, nevertheless we are in accord with the reasoning of the court in refusing a writ of mandamus sought by the petitioner to compel the building inspector to issue him a permit to erect certain apartment houses in a neighborhood zoned as an exclusive single and double family residence property district.

There are some decisions which do not uphold the validity of a zoning ordinance establishing strictly residential districts. We are of the opinion, however, that the better reasoned cases are in favor of the validity of comprehensive zoning which establish strictly private home districts and that the most which can be said of the cases to the contrary is that they merely show that this is a question upon which reasonable minds may differ.

[10] In addition to all that has been said in support of the constitutionality of residential zoning as part of a comprehensive plan, we think it may be safely and sensibly said that justification for residential zoning may, in the last analysis, be rested upon the protection of the civic and social values of the American home. The establishment of such districts is for the general welfare because it tends to promote and perpetuate the American home. It is axiomatic that the welfare, and indeed the very existence, of a nation depends upon the character and caliber of its citizenry. The character and quality of manhood and womanhood are in a large measure the result of home environment. The home and its intrinsic influences are the very foundation of good citizenship, and any factor contributing to the establishment of homes and the fostering of home life doubtless tends to the enhancement, not only of community life, but of the life of the nation as a whole.

The establishment of single family residence districts offers inducements, not only to the wealthy, but to those of moderate means to own their own homes. With ownership comes stability, the welding together of family ties, and better attention to the rearing of children. With ownership comes increased interest in the promotion of public agencies, such as church and school, which have for their purpose a desired development of the moral and mental make-up of the citizenry of the country. With ownership of one's home comes recognition of the individual's responsibility for his share in the safeguarding of the welfare of the community and increased pride in personal achievement which must come from personal participation in projects looking toward community betterment.

It is needless to further analyze and enumerate all of the factors which make a single family home more desirable for the promotion and perpetuation of family life than an apartment, hotel, or flat. It will suffice to say that there is a sentiment practically universal that this is so. But few persons, if given their choice, would, we think, deliberately prefer to establish their homes and rear their children in an apartment house neighborhood rather than in a single home neighborhood. The general welfare of a community is but the aggregate welfare of its constituent members, and that which tends to promote the welfare of the individual members of society cannot fail to benefit society as a whole.

The entrance of one apartment house or flat into a district usually means the entrance of others, and, while it may mean an enhancement of value of the adjacent property for the building of similar structures, it detracts from the value of neighboring property for home building. The man who is seeking to establish a permanent home would not deliberately choose to build next to an apartment house, and it is common experience that the man who has already built is dissatisfied with his home location and desires a change. In other words, the apartment house, tenement, flat, and like structures tend to the exclusion of homes. The home owner may move to another district, but this may not be a sufficient solution of his problem, for if no protection can be given to strictly home districts—such as is contemplated by a comprehensive and properly constructed zoning plan—he may be forced by the ever-increasing encroachment of apartments and flats to relinquish, if not altogether abandon, the benefits emanating from a permanent home site.

Of course, the establishment of exclusive residence districts does not mean that all members of a community will perforce be compelled to live in individual homes. It simply means that, by a comprehensive zoning plan, such uses will be segregated to districts best suited to their development with benefit to their own locality and without detriment to the strictly home districts.

We do not wish to unduly emphasize the single family residence as a means of perpetuating the home life of a people. There are many persons, who, by reason of circumstances, find apartment, flat, or hotel life necessary or preferable. Undoubtedly many families do maintain ideal home life in apartments, flats, and hotels; and it is also undoubtedly true that in many single family dwellings there is much of dissension and discord. It cannot be gainsaid, however, that the presence of families is usually not encouraged in apartments, flats, and hotels, and that people having children are discriminated against and in some instances actually barred. It is also a well-recognized fact that apartments, flats, etc., are noted for their transient occupancy. All these influences tend to militate against the permanence and stability of home life.

[11] What has been said about the desirability of encouraging home life in single family dwellings as an element in the promotion of the general welfare of a community may not apply with equal force to a regulation which relates to two-family dwellings. Nevertheless the reasoning in that behalf is not wholly inapplicable to zoning regulations, having as their basis the general welfare of the community, which permit the two-family dwellings in strictly residential districts. A two-family dwelling requires no radical change of architectural design and does not entail any added burdens over the single family residences in the way of fire or health protection or the exercise of those civic safeguards on the part of the body politic which become necessary in localities where many large apartment houses are permitted to prevail. Moreover, the permitting of two-family dwellings does not radically change the character of the neighborhood, which by proper zoning regulations may be devoted to residential purposes. It should require no argument to show the clear distinction between permitting a two-family dwelling and permitting a 20 or even 10 family apartment house.

or a number of either in a residential neighborhood. Somewhere the line of demarcation must be drawn, and it is primarily the province of the municipal body to which the zoning function is committed to draw that line of demarcation, and it is neither the province nor the duty of courts to interfere with the discretion with which such bodies are invested in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of that discretion. In short, as previously indicated, we are not permitted to substitute our judgment for the legislative judgment. Brown v. City of Los Angeles, supra.

It is insisted upon behalf of the appellants that the ordinance in controversy is not what is usually designated as a general zoning ordinance, but is one creating a single exclusive residence zone. On the other hand, it is insisted upon behalf of the respondents that the ordinance is part and parcel of a comprehensive zoning plan, because the ordinance itself declares:

That it was enacted "in contemplation of and in conformity with a general zoning ordinance covering the entire city of Los Angeles and which will create residence, business, industrial and other zones covering the territory within said city in a comprehensive manner; that the district described in this ordinance is provided for in advance of the general zoning ordinance, for the reason that it is a portion of the district which is to be of the highest residential class under such general ordinance; that there are at present no buildings in said district which violate the provisions of this ordinance; and that the best interest and general welfare of the community will be served and the general city plan preserved by the maintenance of this district in this condition."

[12] Obviously, the purpose of comprehensive zoning is the attainment of unity in the construction and development of a city, along lines of reasonable regulations which tend to promote the health, safety, morals, and general welfare of the community, and it is equally obvious that to accomplish this purpose there must be definitely in the minds of the makers of comprehensive zoning a plan, in outline at least, sufficiently extensive so that when embodied in an enacted ordinance a reviewer thereof may say with confidence that it will redound to the welfare of the city as a whole and that any part of that plan is reasonably related thereto. Of course, a comprehensive zoning plan should contemplate and provide for the planning from time to time of the execution of further details, extensions, and such modifications of existing features as unforeseen changes, occurring in the civic conditions, make necessary to the perfection and perpetuation of the plan.

[13] It is a matter of common knowledge that a zoning plan of the extent contemplated in the instant case cannot be made in a day;

therefore we may take judicial notice of the fact that it will take much time to work out the details of such a plan and that obviously it would be destructive of the plan if, during the period of its incubation, parties seeking to evade the operation thereof should be permitted to enter upon a course of construction which might progress so far as to defeat in whole or in part the ultimate execution of the plan.

[14] It follows, it seems to us, that the fact that comprehensive zoning in the instant case had not matured to the point of being an enacted and existing ordinance, at the time the emergency ordinance in the instant case was enacted, does not detract from the validity of the latter ordinance upon the theory that there could be no assurance that the contemplated zoning ordinance would be ultimately enacted and enforced. The good faith of the council in enacting the ordinance in question is not challenged; nor is it asserted that the council will not proceed in good faith to the enactment of a general zoning ordinance and, in the absence of any issue concerning the good faith of the council, the presumption of fair dealing on the part of the council and the further presumption that they will not fail in the performance of an official duty must prevail. That being so, it may be fairly said, we think, that the ordinance in question, being, as it declares, an initial unit in the general zoning of the city, is part and parcel of a comprehensive plan which has relation to the welfare of the city as a whole and therefore it must be held that the ordinance in question is a valid exercise of the police power.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZAHN et al. v. BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.
(L. A. 7822.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1925.
Rehearing Denied March 26, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚡601—Zoning ordinance, based on consideration of public welfare, valid exercise of police power.

An ordinance enacted pursuant to a general comprehensive zoning plan, and based on consideration of public health, safety, morals, or general welfare, if applied fairly and impartially, is a valid exercise of police power.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡625—Inclusion of property, in zone restricted to residential purposes, held not arbitrary, unreasonable, or discriminatory.

Findings of referee held not to sustain contention that inclusion of that portion of city in which petitioners' property is situate, in zone restricting use to residential purposes, was arbitrary, unreasonable, and discriminatory.

3. Municipal corporations ☞601—Zone, restricted to residential purposes, held not better suited for business purposes.

Fact that district, placed in zone restricted to residential purposes, is a main artery for large amount of traffic, productive of noise and confusion, did not show that such district was better suited for business than residential purposes, especially where ~~large~~ portion of district was unoccupied, and much of it had been restricted against business by voluntary act of subdividers.

4. Municipal corporations ☞625—Ordinance, creating zone restricted to residential purposes, not void because business districts permitted at convenient intervals.

Fact that, at convenient intervals along zone restricted to residential purposes, property was zoned for business purposes, thus providing adequate business districts to serve immediate needs of particular neighborhoods, did not render zoning ordinance void as being unreasonable or discriminatory.

5. Municipal corporations ☞625—That inclusion of property, in zone restricted to residential purposes, depreciates value, not controlling.

Fact that inclusion of petitioners' property, in zone restricted to residential purposes rather than in zone restricted to business purposes, depreciates its value, is not of controlling significance, as every exercise of police power is apt to affect adversely property interest of somebody, and provisions of St. 1917, p. 1419, concerning conservation of property values has reference to value as a whole, and not to any particular piece of property.

6. Municipal corporations ☞601—Zoning district may permit existing uses.

It is not necessary for the purpose of establishing zoning districts that existing uses shall be removed.

7. Municipal corporations ☞601—Power to zone not limited to protection of established districts.

The power of city council to zone is not limited to protection of established districts, but zoning in its best sense must also look forward in development of new districts according to comprehensive plan, having welfare of city as its basis.

8. Municipal corporations ☞626—Classification of quasi residential and business districts held not inherently discriminatory.

A classification whereby one zone was restricted to quasi residential district, character of which is not destroyed by occupants conducting professional business in their homes, and another to business district, held not inherently discriminatory, and necessity for such classification is largely within legislative judgment of city council.

9. Municipal corporations ☞63(2)—Court will not interfere with legislative judgment as to zoning ordinance, unless unreasonable.

Where zoning plan was fairly conceived and adopted, and it was not conclusively shown that its application and consequences are unreasonable, court cannot substitute its judgment for legislative judgment that ordinance has reasonable relation to general welfare of community.

10. Constitutional law ☞70(3)—Exercise and application of police power within legislative discretion.

Where a situation presents proper field for exercise of police power, its extent and application is largely within legislative discretion.

11. Municipal corporations ☞63(2)—Court will not, except in clear case, interfere with zoning ordinance.

Every intendment is to be made in favor of zoning ordinances, and courts will not, except in clear cases, interfere with exercise of power thus manifested.

Application for writ of mandate by Hector N. Zahn and another requiring the Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles and Charles H. Treat and others, members thereof, to issue permit for construction of a building. Writ denied.

Hill & Morgan, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Lucius P. Green, Asst. City. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. The petitioners presented to this court in the first instance a petition for a writ of mandate, commanding the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles to issue a permit for the construction of a business building upon the property of the petitioners, situate on the south side of Wilshire boulevard, between Cochran street and Duns-muir avenue, in said city. Thereafter an alternative writ was issued by this court and the proceedings transferred to the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 1, for hearing and decision. In that court, after issues joined upon the petition and the answers thereto, a referee was appointed pursuant to stipulation of all of the parties to take testimony and return to the court his findings of fact. A transfer of the cause to this court, after hearing and determination by the Court of Appeal, brought to this court the entire record, which included the findings of the referee, and they therefore will be accepted and approved by this court as if they were returned here in the first instance.

The petition for the writ attacks two ordinances of the city of Los Angeles, viz. Ordinance No. 42666 (New Series), amended by Ordinance No. 44668 (New Series), otherwise known as the general and comprehensive zoning ordinance of said city, and Ordinance No. 46250 (New Series), which provides for the establishment of a setback line on Wilshire boulevard, between Bronson avenue and the west city boundary of the city of Los Angeles.

The general and comprehensive zoning ordinance, Ordinance No. 42666 (New Series), covers practically the entire area of the city's sphere of activities and is entitled:

"An ordinance providing for the creation in the city of Los Angeles of five (5) zones, consisting of various districts, and prescribing the classes of buildings, structures and improvements in said several zones and the use thereof; defining the terms used herein, prescribing the penalty for the violation of the provisions hereof, and repealing certain ordinances."

The five zones were designated respectively as zones A, B, C, D, and E. By said ordinance, it is provided that in zone A no building shall be erected for any other use than that of a "single-family" dwelling. It is provided that in zone B no building shall be erected "which is designed, arranged or intended to be occupied or used for any purpose other than dwellings, tenements, hotels," and similar uses. In zone C it is provided that no building shall be erected "which is designed, arranged or intended to be occupied or used for any purpose other than a store or shop for the conduct of a wholesale or retail business," and like uses. In zone D it is provided by the ordinance that no building shall be erected therein which is designed or intended to be occupied or used for other than variously designated trades, occupations, and industries such as chlorine manufactories, glue factories, etc. In zone E the property may, by the provisions of the ordinance, be devoted to any lawful use.

The said general comprehensive zoning ordinance, Ordinance No. 42666 (New Series), was adopted by the city council on the 18th day of October, 1921, at which time the tract of land on which is located the property of the petitioners herein was outside of the limits of the city of Los Angeles. On February 28, 1922, by proceedings duly had, said tract was annexed to the city of Los Angeles. On the 21st day of September, 1922, the city council by an ordinance known as Ordinance No. 44668 (New Series), amended said Ordinance No. 42666 (New Series), and thereby included a considerable area lying along Wilshire boulevard and including the petitioners' property within zone B, from which zone, as previously indicated, stores are excluded. By the same amendment, the city council placed a certain region lying along La Brea avenue within zone C, within which zone stores of various kinds are permitted.

Thereafter the petitioners filed an application with the city council requesting that the council declare an exception to the restrictions of said ordinance with respect to the property of the petitioners and adopt an ordinance permitting the construction and erection of a business building by the petitioners upon their property. The request of the petitioners was referred by the city council to the public welfare commission of the council for investigation and report with the result that the commission reported that:

"We believe that Wilshire boulevard is destined to become a show street when widened and beautified as contemplated and the encroachment of business upon this boulevard is at this time unnecessary and would be a great detriment to the future residential development of this thoroughfare, and we therefore recommend that the request be denied and filed."

This report of the public welfare commission was on July 19, 1923, unanimously adopted by the city council.

The petitioners on the 25th day of July, 1923, made application to the board of public works, asking that a permit be issued allowing them to construct upon their said property on Wilshire boulevard a one-story business building. The board of public works refused the permit upon the ground that the provisions of Ordinance No. 42666 (New Series), as amended by Ordinance No. 44668 (New Series), forbade the erection in zone B of that class of building for which a permit was sought and that, by section 12 of said ordinance, the board of public works was forbidden to issue a permit for the erection, construction, or establishment of any building in any of the zones contrary to the provisions of said ordinance. The permit was refused upon the further ground that the plans and specifications for said building filed with the application showed that the building was not proposed to be set back a distance of 15 feet from the street line of Wilshire boulevard as provided in Ordinance No. 46250.

In view of the conclusion which we ultimately reach concerning the validity of the ordinance prohibiting the petitioner from building a business building in the zone in question, it will not be necessary for us to decide at this time the question as to whether or not the particular setback ordinance in question here is valid.

Two contentions are made by the petitioners against the validity of Ordinance No. 42666, known as the general and comprehensive zoning ordinance, as amended by Ordinance No. 44668, which amendment placed petitioners' property in zone B, viz.: (1) That the enactment and enforcement of an ordinance by a municipality which divides a city into zones and prohibits the construction in certain zones upon private property of buildings for business purposes without regard to whether the particular use is a nuisance per se, or may become a nuisance by reason of the location of the business or the manner and the method in which it is conducted, constitutes an unlawful exercise of the police power; and (2) that the ordinance in the instant case is unreasonable and discriminatory and contravenes the provisions of the zoning enabling act of 1917 which provides that the council, in designating the class of use to be permitted in each district, "shall give reasonable consideration, among other things, to the character of the district, its peculiar suitability for particular uses, the conservation of property values and the direction of building development in accord with a well-considered plan." Stats. 1917, p. 1419, § 2.

[1] The first contention of petitioners was involved in the case of Miller v. Board of Public Works, L. A. No. 8012, 234 P. 381. That case involved the question of whether or not zoning of any character, comprehensive or otherwise, save and except for the purpose of prohibiting nuisances or "near-nuisances" was a valid exercise of the police power. That case has this day been decided and it is held therein that an enactment by a municipality of an ordinance, pursuant to a general comprehensive zoning plan, based upon considerations of public health, safety, morals, or the general welfare, applied fairly and impartially, which ordinance regulates, restricts, and segregates the location of industries, the several classes of business, trade, or calling and the location of apartment or tenement houses, clubhouses, group residences, two-family dwellings, and the several classes of public and semipublic buildings, is a valid exercise of the police power. See, also, In re Opinion of Justices, 234 Mass. 597, 127 N. E. 525; State ex rel. Carter v. Harper, 182 Wis. 148, 196 N. W. 451, 33 A. L. R. 269; State ex rel. Civello v. New Orleans, 154 La. 271, 97 So. 440, 33 A. L. R. 260; Ware v. City of Wichita, 113 Kan. 153, 214 P. 99; City of Des Moines v. Manhattan Oil Co., 193 Iowa, 1096, 184 N. W. 823, 188 N. W. 921, 23 A. L. R. 1322; Spector v. Building Inspector of Milton (Mass.), 145 N. E. 265.

A consideration of the findings of the referee in the instant case is necessary to a determination of the second contention of the petitioners; i. e., that the particular ordinance in controversy is so unreasonable and discriminatory as to be beyond the purview of the police power.

The findings of the referee relative to the situation of the petitioners' property and the conditions existing upon Wilshire boulevard, and the territory adjacent thereto, are as follows:

"That, at the time of the adoption and approval of each and all of the ordinances hereinbefore referred to and at the present time, the aforesaid Wilshire boulevard was and is a main thoroughfare extending through a portion of the city of Los Angeles to and through a large portion of the county of Los Angeles, and from there to other cities and municipalities, and to the Pacific Ocean in the city of Santa Monica. That said boulevard was and is a main artery for a tremendous amount of automobile and vehicular traffic between the said city of Los Angeles and said other communities. That, at all hours of the day and during most of the hours of the night, said boulevard is filled with traffic of every description, including automobile trucks and other vehicles engaged in commerce between said communities, and engaged in other commercial activities. That said Wilshire boulevard is one of the main arteries of travel of the city of Los Angeles. That said automobile traffic creates a great deal of noise, confusion, and congestion along said Wilshire boulevard where the property of petitioners is situated and for long distances in either direction from said property. That there is not located along Wilshire boulevard within one mile in either direction from said property any dwelling house, tenement, hotel, lodging or boarding house, church, private club, public or semipublic institution of any kind, railroad station, or other structure or improvement permissible under B zone, except that there is located on a lot on Wilshire boulevard near said property an old farm house. That there are several real estate offices located along Wilshire boulevard near said property. That on the southeast corner of Cochran avenue and Wilshire boulevard across the street from the property of the petitioners there is a brick store building which at the time of passage of said zoning ordinance was occupied by a grocery store and a market. That on the south side of Wilshire boulevard at the corner of Wilshire and Mansfield avenue, six blocks east of the property of petitioners, there was at said time located a fruit stand. That at the intersection of La Brea street and Wilshire boulevard there is located a two-story brick business block. On the southeast corner of Wilshire and La Brea there is located a real estate office. That on the northeast corner of Wilshire and La Brea streets there is located an oil station with a real estate office adjoining. That on the property of petitioners there is located a real estate office. That all of said buildings above referred to were located on said property at the time said zoning ordinance went into effect, except the brick building on the southwest corner of Wilshire and La Brea. That the property of the petitioners described in paragraph II of said petition would have a market value of from 100 per cent. to 200 per cent. greater than it now has if said property could be used for business purposes. That as to the property fronting on said Wilshire boulevard which is restricted against use for business purposes by deed, the effect of placing property of petitioners and other property unrestricted by deed along Wilshire boulevard in zone C would be to depreciate the market value of said property so long as said deed restrictions should remain in effect. That, under the provisions of said ordinance, the property fronting on said Wilshire boulevard at the intersection of what is known as La Brea avenue, and on either side thereof for a distance of one block, has been selected, designated, and placed within what in said ordinance is referred to as a 'C zone' district, wherein may be constructed buildings and structures for business purposes. That the property of the said petitioners is located in a tract which adjoins said property so placed, as aforesaid in said C zone. That said La Brea avenue has been dedicated as a through street from Hollywood on the north to several miles south of Wilshire boulevard. That said La Brea avenue is improved from Hollywood on the north to three or four blocks south of Wilshire boulevard on the south, with a paved street, said pavement being about three or four miles long, and that southerly from said point said street was, at that time of the passage of the said zoning ordinance, dedicated, but that no improvement had been made thereon and that said street was at said time impassable, that the property fronting on La Brea avenue to the north of Wilshire boulevard for a distance of approximately two miles is almost entirely unimproved and undeveloped, and that Pico street is a street in the city of Los Angeles running east and west approximately a mile south of Wilshire boulevard; that the property fronting on La Brea street from Wilshire boulevard to Pico boulevard is entirely unimproved and undeveloped. That the property of said petitioners is as well adapted to business purposes and uses as is said other property along La Brea street. That, except for a few real estate offices, none of the buildings on said Wilshire boulevard within a mile from either direction from the property of the said petitioners are set back from the street line of said Wilshire boulevard. That petitioners have taken every step and means provided in said ordinance and within their power under the laws of the ordinances of the city of Los Angeles to obtain relief from the legislative body of the said city of Los Angeles, and have heretofore filed an application with the city council of said city calling the attention of said city council to the conditions existing upon said boulevard as herein set forth, and requesting that the said city council, pursuant to section 4 of said ordinance, declare an exception to the restrictions of said ordinance with respect to the property of said petitioners, and to, pursuant to the provisions of said section 4 of said ordinance, adopt an ordinance permitting the construction and erection of a business building which the said petitioners propose to construct and erect upon their property. That said city council, at a regular meeting thereof held on the 19th day of July, 1923, acted upon the said request of said petitioners by unanimously adopting the report of the public welfare commission of the council relative to said request, which said report is as follows: (The referee's report here quotes said committee report, which closed as follows: 'Your committee desires to state that we believe that Wilshire boulevard is destined to become a show street when widened and beautified as contemplated and the encroachment of business upon this boulevard is at this time unnecessary and would be a great detriment to the future residential development of this thoroughfare and we therefore recommend that the request be denied and filed'). That, prior to the adoption of said Ordinance No. 44668 (New Series), by which ordinance section 2-a-56 was added to said Ordinance No. 42666 (New Series), as aforesaid, making the district in which the petitioners' property is located a part of B zone of said city, the said district where said property is located had not been zoned and no restrictions by law had been established preventing said property from being used for business purposes. That before the adoption of said Ordinance No. 44668 (New Series), as aforesaid, the city planning commission of the city of Los Angeles had drafted a map, and had recommended to the said city council of said city the adoption of said map as part No. 7 of the zone map of said city by which said property of the said petitioners and property in that vicinity was shown to be restricted against use for business. That thereupon, to wit, on the 5th day of August, 1922, the petitioners herein and other property owners petitioned the said city council protesting against the placing of said property fronting on said Wilshire boulevard in zone B; that on the 7th day of August, 1922, the said city council of said city, at a regular meeting, considered the protest of said petitioners and others, and thereupon the following proceedings were had: * * * (The referee's report here sets forth those proceedings, wherein the city council sustained the protest and voted to place in zone C the property fronting on Wilshire boulevard, from La Brea avenue to westerly city limits. But the referee's report further shows that thereafter the city council received certain communications from citizens protesting against the placing of said territory in zone C; that on the 17th day of August, 1922, after considering said protests, the city council reconsidered its action of August 7th.)

The referee further finds:

"That Pico street is a street in the city of Los Angeles running east and west and traversing said city for almost its entire length and running westerly through the city of Los Angeles and a part of the county of Los Angeles to the Pacific Ocean. That said Pico street has a double track street car line almost to Rimpau boulevard. That said Pico street is improved with pavement for practically its entire length, to the ocean, and is also a street on which there is a great deal of automobile traffic, but that the automobile traffic on said Pico street is not as heavy as on said Wilshire boulevard. That said Pico street and the property abutting thereon for a considerable distance west of Rimpau boulevard is lower in elevation than said Wilshire boulevard and the property abutting thereon. That west of Rimpau boulevard there are fewer business houses and more residences fronting in Pico street than there are fronting on Wilshire boulevard. That included in the term 'business houses' on both Pico street and Wilshire boulevard are real estate offices. That said Pico street for its entire length inside the city of Los Angeles has been placed in zone C. That said Pico street easterly from said Rimpau boulevard is well built up with business houses. That Wilshire boulevard easterly from Rimpau for a distance of approximately three miles was originally built up with high class residences. That before the adoption of said zoning ordinance a number of these residences had been converted into restaurants, lodging houses and tea rooms. That there are on said Wilshire boulevard in the course of construction at the present time easterly of said Rimpau boulevard four or five large apartment houses. That the Ambassador Hotel occupies a tract of land fronting on said Wilshire boulevard about two miles east of Rimpau boulevard, and that there are located in said Ambassador Hotel various shops and merchandising establishments. That said hotel is located several hundred feet south of said Wilshire boulevard. That on the corner of Wilshire boulevard and Vermont avenue, a distance of approximately two miles east of said Rimpau boulevard, there is now in course of construction a large business block. That at the intersection of Wilshire boulevard and Western avenue, a distance of about one mile east of said Rimpau boulevard, there are one brick business building and two real estate offices. That Western avenue and Vermont avenue aforesaid have been placed in zone C. That Cochran avenue on which the property of petitioners abuts is, southerly from Wilshire boulevard, a paved and well-traveled street, and that said Cochran avenue does not extend north of said Wilshire boulevard. That there is no car line in Wilshire boulevard for its entire length. That both Pico boulevard and Wilshire boulevard westerly from Rimpau avenue traverse sections of the city of Los Angeles which at this time are but sparsely built up and inhabited, but which are in the course of rapid upbuilding and development. That within the last two years throughout the city of Los Angeles there has been a large amount of development and building, of all kinds. That all the property covered by part No. 7 of the zone map and the extension thereof to the city limits of the city of Los Angeles, so far as the same has been subdivided, is in the course of an extremely rapid development, and that a great many residence buildings have been and are now being erected thereon, except as hereinabove in these findings stated. That there is in the city of Los Angeles a department of the city known as the city planning commission and that G. Gordon Whitnall is and has been, since the creation of said commission in 1920, the secretary consultant of said commission. That immediately upon its creation said city planning commission undertook a study of the entire city of Los Angeles, district by district, for the purpose of enacting a comprehensive zoning plan throughout the said city. That in each district hearings were had and the proposed zone map was posted and public hearings had. That thereafter each of said maps was considered by said city planning commission and presented to the city council with the recommendation of city planning commission. That thereafter the council adopted the ordinances covering the zoning of property in said city of Los Angeles, covering the districts included in said maps. That the zoning maps covering the property in question in this action were prepared and adopted and presented to the council by the said city planning commission, pursuant to the above plan. That the proceedings before the city council with respect to the zoning of the property involved in this action are such as have been heretofore in these findings set forth in full."

[2] These findings of the referee do not in our opinion sustain the contention of the petitioners that the inclusion of that portion of Wilshire boulevard in which their property is situate in zone B was arbitrary, unreasonable, and discriminatory. On the contrary, we are satisfied that the council did take into consideration the character of the boulevard and that its designation of the uses for which property fronting on Wilshire boulevard might be devoted was appropriate and proper.

Succinctly state, the objections urged by the petitioners as showing an abuse of the discretion of the council are (1) that Wilshire boulevard is better adapted to business than to residential purposes; (2) other adjacent territory is zoned for business which is not better suited for business than is Wilshire boulevard; (3) the value of petitioners' property will be depreciated if it is retained in zone B; (4) property devoted to business uses at the time of the adoption of the ordinance are permitted to continue; (5) the territory in which petitioners' property is situate is not an established residential district; and (6) there is no natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction between the classes of uses permitted in zone B and those prohibited.

[3] The findings of the referee do not show that Wilshire boulevard is better adapted for business than for residential purposes. True, the finding of the referee is that Wilshire boulevard is "a main thoroughfare extending through a portion of the city of Los Angeles to and through large portions of the county of Los Angeles, and from there to other cities and municipalities, and to the Pacific Ocean in the city of Santa Monica," and is "a main artery for a tremendous amount of automobile and vehicular traffic between the said city of Los Angeles and said other communities." This is not necessarily proof that the boulevard is fit only for business. The requirements of a traffic boulevard are that traffic shall be kept moving; whereas it is common knowledge that on business streets traffic is retarded. This naturally arises from the necessity of stopping and parking on business streets. The inevitable result would be that if Wilshire boulevard should become a business street, it would lose much of its usefulness as a main artery for traffic between Los Angeles and the neighboring cities and municipalities. The fact that there is a large volume of traffic upon Wilshire boulevard which necessarily must be productive of incidental noise and confusion is not conclusive that said boulevard is clearly unadapted to use for residential purposes of the character contemplated in zone B. The circumstance that many very large and expensive apartment houses have already been constructed upon this boulevard is in itself substantial evidence that the boulevard is not unadapted to use for such purposes.

The council in designating the class of use to be permitted in the various districts was required to consider among other things "the character of the district, its peculiar suitability for particular uses." The report of the referee that the region along said boulevard which had been included in zone B was largely unoccupied territory, there being within that area but one store building used for a grocery store and market erected prior to the inclusion of the tract in zone B, and few real estate offices and one oil station, shows that the region was not unsuitable for residential purposes. Moreover, the fact, as found by the referee, that, aside from the 14 blocks along said Wilshire boulevard west of Rimpau street, all other subdivided frontage along said boulevard has been restricted against business by the voluntary act of the subdividers, would tend to negative petitioners' contention that Wilshire boulevard is particularly suited for business.

[4] The objection to the ordinance as unjust and discriminatory because of the fact that property in adjacent territory is included in zone C is not well taken. The petitioners attack the ordinance in this particular upon three grounds: (1) That property fronting on La Brea avenue, which intersects Wilshire boulevard at right angles close to petitioners' property, is zoned for business; (2) that Pico street, which runs parallel to Wilshire boulevard and through the same general territory is likewise zoned for business; and (3) that Wilshire boulevard for a block on each side of La Brea avenue is zoned for business. We are of the opinion that the placing of these properties in zone C is supported by valid reasons. With reference to the contention that it was unreasonable to zone La Brea avenue for business uses and Wilshire boulevard for residential uses, it appears from the report of the referee that, at convenient intervals along Wilshire boulevard, streets intersecting Wilshire boulevard at right angles have been zoned for business. Thus Vermont avenue, which is approximately three miles from La Brea avenue and Western avenue which is approximately two miles from La Brea avenue, have been zoned to business uses. This was done in order to serve the business needs of the adjacent residential territory. It was therefore but natural and logical in the carrying out of a harmonious plan that the council should zone La Brea avenue for business purposes since it was a main thoroughfare crossing Wilshire boulevard at right angles, and was approximately two miles from Western avenue. There was thus provided at convenient and reasonable intervals adequate and convenient business districts "to serve the reasonable immediate needs of each particular neighborhood." Ware v. City of Wichita, supra.

As to the contention that discrimination was shown by the council in placing Pico street in zone C, the findings of the referee show that Pico street is well adapted for business for the reason that it runs through a lower and less attractive territory than Wilshire boulevard and is served by a double street car line.

It is apparent that the reason for the inclusion of two blocks in Wilshire boulevard where La Brea avenue intersects it in zone C was to avoid a situation which would otherwise have resulted of placing business property and residential property within the same block. In short, it was thus zoned in order that residential uses on Wilshire boulevard would not be forced to abut upon business uses on La Brea avenue. In this situation it may not be said that the ordinance is void for the reason that petitioners' property is zoned for residential uses; whereas business structures are permitted in other localities within the city similarly circumstanced as the property of the petitioners. As was said in Brown v. City of Los Angeles, 183 Cal. 783, 192 P. 716:

"The mere fact that outside of the * * * district there was other property similar in nature and character would not justify the court upon ascertaining that fact to substitute its judgment for the legislative judgment. The boundary line of a district must always be more or less arbitrary, for the property on one side of the line cannot, in the nature of things, be very different from that immediately on the other side of that line."

See, also, Hadacheck v. Los Angeles, 165 Cal. 416, 132 P. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248.

Thus viewed, the ordinance in the instant case is not an arbitrary attempt of the city authorities to discriminate between the uses of property in one territory and the use of property permitted in another of similar description, but, on the contrary, the districts created by the ordinance and its various amendments appear to be established by a rational general rule.

[5] The fact that the inclusion of the petitioners' property in zone B rather than in zone C depreciates its value is not of controlling significance. Every exercise of the police power is apt to affect adversely the property interest of somebody. Spector v. Building Inspector of Milton (Mass.) 145 N. E. 265, 267. The provisions of the enabling act concerning the conservation of property values have reference to the property value in the district as a whole and not to any particular piece of property. It is to be noted in this behalf that the finding of the referee is that the value of other property along Wilshire boulevard which has been restricted against uses for business purposes by deed will be depreciated if the tract of land in which petitioners' property is located be included in zone C.

[6] As to the objection that the ordinance was not retrospective, but permitted the continuance of existing uses, it will suffice to say that for the purpose of zoning it is not necessary that existing uses shall be removed. Spector v. Building Inspector of Milton, supra. The ordinance was enacted with the purpose of directing the present and future development of the city and no attempt was made to remold its past development. To have required, preliminarily to an enactment for future development, that all past development, not in harmony therewith, should be removed, might be impractical. That the council did not attempt such a task has no tendency to show discrimination against property to be developed in the future.

[7] The power of the city council to zone is not limited in our opinion to the protection of established districts. To so hold would be to defeat in a large measure the very purpose of zoning which is to control future development in the best interest of the city. Zoning in its best sense looks, not only backward to protect districts already established, but forward to aid in the development of new districts according to a comprehensive plan having as its basis the welfare of the city as a whole.

[8] With reference to the contention that the class of uses permitted in zone B is based upon no intrinsic, natural, or constitutional distinction, it will suffice to say that there is an obvious distinction between the type of buildings which the ordinance permits to be erected in zone B and a business block which is not permitted in said zone. It is apparent that zone B provides for what may, in a manner of speaking, be called a quasi residential district the character of which is not destroyed by the mere fact that the occupants of the residences permitted therein may keep offices for the transaction of professional business in their homes. Such classification of uses is not inherently discriminatory and the creation of and the necessity for such classification is a matter largely within the legislative judgment of the city council.

Incidentally the point is made in opposition to the writ to the effect that the provisions of the ordinance in question purporting to authorize and empower the city council upon request of a property owner within a given zone to except his property from the operation of the ordinance as applied to that zone is unreasonable, discriminatory, and makes provision for arbitrary action, without laying down any rule for the guidance or determination of the council's action. We do not deem it necessary to decide this question, for the reason that the provision referred to is clearly severable from the other provisions of the general ordinance, and, if that provision should be held to be invalid, such holding would leave the remainder of the ordinance unimpaired.

It is not claimed that the council, in arriving at the result which it did in the enactment of the ordinance in question, acted unfairly or without due deliberation and without notice to all who might be interested in the subject-matter of the ordinance. It will be noted, as previously indicated, that the findings show that, upon the creation of the city planning commission of the city of Los Angeles, a study was undertaken by the commission of the entire city, district by district, for the purpose of the enactment by the city council of a comprehensive zoning ordinance; that the maps of the proposed zones were posted and public hearings had; that such zone maps after due consideration were presented to the city council with the recommendation of the city planning commission; that in the instant case the petitioners were given an opportunity to be heard before the city council; and that the inclusion in zone B of the territory in which petitioners' property is located was made upon the recommendation of the public welfare commission of the city council, to whom the protest of the petitioners had been referred for investigation.

[9] That the zoning plan as adopted was fairly conceived and consummated is not questioned, nor is it claimed that the manner and method of including and excluding certain properties therein and therefrom was arbitrary; and, it not appearing, prima facie, from the undisputed and admitted facts that the ordinance in its application and its consequences is unreasonable, we are foreclosed from substituting our judgment for the legislative judgment that the purpose and perfection of the ordinance in question had reasonable relation to the general welfare of the community. Des Moines v. Manhattan Oil Co., 193 Iowa, 1096, 184 N. W. 823, 188 N. W. 921, 23 A. L. R. 1322.

[10, 11] It must be conceded that, where a given situation admittedly presents a proper field for the exercise of the police power, the extent of its invocation and application is a matter which lies very largely in legislative discretion (Carter v. Harper, 182 Wis. 148, 196 N. W. 451), and we are well satisfied that the weight of authority dealing with the subject of zoning may now be regarded as establishing that "every intendment is to be made in favor of zoning ordinances, and courts will not, except in clear cases, interfere with exercise of power" thus manifested. See Building Inspector of Lowell v. Stoklosa (Mass.) 145 N. E. 262; Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 25 S. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169. In Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra, it was said:

"That courts are loathe to substitute their judgment as to the necessity for a particular enactment for the legislative judgment as to the need of such enactment with reference to the exercise of the police power. A large discretion is vested in the legislative branch of the government with reference to the exercise of the police power. * * * Every intendment is to be indulged by the courts in favor of the validity of its exercise, and, unless the measure is clearly oppressive, it will be deemed to be within the purview of that power. It is only when it is palpable that the measure in controversy has no real or substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare that it will be nullified by the courts."

It follows from what has been said, based upon the unchallenged and undisputed facts of the instant case, that the ordinance in controversy cannot be held to be an unreasonable and discriminatory exercise of the police power and that it must be held to be a valid enactment.

The writ is denied.

Ex parte WHITE. (Cr. 2707.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞601—Establishment of residential district by zoning plan valid exercise of police power.

The establishment of strictly residential district, pursuant to general comprehensive zoning plan, which has reasonable relation to public health, safety, morals, or general welfare, is a valid exercise of police power.

2. Municipal corporations ☞601 — Zoning must be reasonably necessary and related to public welfare.

Zoning must be reasonably necessary and related to the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of community, and must be either expressly founded on finding by board of trustees, or other governing body of municipality, that such zoning is necessary to general welfare of municipality.

3. Municipal corporations ☞625—Zoning ordinance creating unrestricted district in business district held unreasonable.

Where an ordinance zoned a town into two districts, one residential and the other business, and made provision as to latter, by designating a portion as an "unrestricted district," but such "unrestricted district" was fully occupied by a gasoline station and restaurant, effect was to grant monopoly to business establishments already situated in such unrestricted district, and therefore constituted an unreasonable restriction, rendering ordinance invalid; it not being a proper application of police power.

In Bank.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by G. T. White, directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Atherton, to secure release of petitioner from custody after conviction of violation of zoning ordinance. Petitioner discharged.

John E. Springer, of Palo Alto, for petitioner.

Arthur Redington, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The petitioner herein seeks his release on habeas corpus after judgment of conviction rendered in the recorder's court of the town of Atherton, county of San Mateo, upon a charge of misdemeanor, to wit, violation of Ordinance 23 of said town.

Succinctly stated, the undisputed facts of the case, shown by the return to the writ and the petition for the writ, employed as a traverse, and the stipulations of the respective parties to the proceedings, are these:

Said Ordinance 23 is a zoning ordinance which divides the town of Atherton into two zones designated as "the residence district" and "the unrestricted district." Section 4 (a) of said ordinance provides that in the unrestricted district "the premises therein and the buildings now or hereafter to be placed thereon may be devoted to any lawful use, but subject to the ordinance of this municipality and to the regulations of its board of health." Section 4 (b) thereof provides that in the residence district "no piece, parcel, lot or premises, and no building thereon, shall be used, and no building shall be constructed or altered thereon which is arranged, intended or designed to be used for any of the following purposes, viz.: Store, shop, retail or wholesale business house, factory, hotel, boarding house, hospital, private school, sanitarium, public garage, undertaking parlor, gasoline or oil station, amusement enterprise for profit, or other structure for the conduct therein of trade or business."

This ordinance was enacted on the 21st day of November, 1923, after proceedings duly and regularly had and taken, under and in pursuance of an act of the Legislature entitled:

"An act to provide for the establishment within municipalities of districts or zones within which the use of property, height of improvements and required open spaces for light and ventilation of such buildings, may be regulated by ordinance." Stats. 1917, p. 1419.

Thereafter, while said ordinance was in operation, the petitioner herein built a small structure to be used as a real estate office in the residence district of the town of Atherton, as said residence district is defined by said ordinance, and proceeded to transact business therein.

The town of Atherton is a municipal corporation of the sixth class, situate in the county of San Mateo. It extends east and west, across the state highway (El Camino Real) for an average distance of about $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles and extends north and south along the highway for an average distance of about 1 mile. It includes within its limits not less than 2,500 acres of land. The zone limited by the ordinance in question as an "unrestricted district" contains less than 1½ acres, which has a street frontage of only 436 feet, and which was at the time of the enactment of the ordinance and now is fully occupied to the exclusion of other business, by a gasoline service station and a restaurant. The building of the petitioner was erected after the passage of the ordinance, and was located upon a lot within the district zoned by said ordinance for residential use upon the west side of and fronting upon the state highway about midway between the north and south boundaries of the town and about 400 feet south of the southerly boundary of the "unrestricted district." Excepting for the territory embraced within the "unrestricted district," as defined by said ordinance, the territory of said town is devoted to residential uses and comprises a suburban community of homes. Between the "unrestricted district" and petitioner's building are located three separate residences, and opposite said building and on the east side of the highway are two large residential tracts upon each of which the owner thereof resides and has his home. About 100 feet south of the petitioner's said building and on the same side of the highway is another large residential tract upon which the owner thereof resides and has his home, and to the west of petitioner's building are other residential lots occupied by people who have their own homes thereon. Outside of the boundaries of said town and in close proximity thereto are locations where business is conducted, with ample space available for additional business houses. Thus, at Menlo Park, which is situated about ¾ of a mile south of petitioner's premises, in unincorporated territory, there is a well-settled business district; and at Five Points, about one mile to the north of petitioner's premises, there is another well-settled business district; and at other places upon the state highway outside of the territorial boundaries of the town of Atherton, but in the vicinity thereof, there are other well-defined business areas where business is now being conducted, and in any of which places space is available for the erection of other business structures for the conduct of business therein. The population of the town of Atherton is variously estimated to be between 600 and 1,000 persons.

Petitioner contends that his imprisonment is unlawful by reason of the fact that the ordinance under which he was convicted is invalid. Petitioner bases his claim of the invalidity of the ordinance upon two grounds: (1) The unconstitutionality of any ordinance establishing strictly residential districts from which all business enterprises are excluded; and (2) the unreasonableness of the provisions of the particular ordinance in controversy with reference to the unrestricted district.

[1] The decision in the case of Miller v. Board of Public Works (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 381, L. A. No. 8012, wherein it was held that the establishment by a municipality of a strictly residential district pursuant to a general comprehensive zoning plan which had reasonable relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare, is a valid exercise of the police power, and is not in contravention of the fundamental law of the state, renders petitioner's first contention no longer tenable.

We are of the opinion, however, that petitioner is correct in his second contention.

[2] As has been pointed out in the cases of Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra, and Zahn v. Board of Public Works (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 388, this day decided, the right to zone may be resorted to upon a proper invocation of the police power, but such zoning must be reasonably necessary and reasonably related to the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the community. Of course, it goes without saying that such zoning must either expressly or impliedly be founded upon a finding by the board of trustees, or other governing body of the municipality, that such zoning is necessary to the general welfare of the community.

[3] It appears in the instant case that the board of trustees undertook to zone the town into two districts, one of which was devoted to residential uses and the other to business uses. This was in effect a legislative finding that the maintenance of both such districts was necessary to the public welfare. It was the duty, therefore, of the board of trustees when zoning the town to make adequate provision for both such uses. That adequate provision for the business district was not made is at once apparent. It is true that some provision was made for business; that is to say, 1½ acres out of 2,500 acres was designated as an "unrestricted district" in which buildings to be "devoted to any lawful use" might be constructed. But it is apparent from the fact that the "unrestricted district" was already fully occupied by a gasoline station and a restaurant to the exclusion of new business uses that the board of trustees was limiting the "unrestricted district" to business enterprises already established and to the exclusion of any future business development. The ordinance in effect grants a monopoly to the business establishments already situate in the 1½ acres of the "unrestricted district." In other words, under the guise of regulating business and segregating it to a particular district, the ordinance in fact prohibits all business save and except that of the favored two already established.

Of course, we are not called upon here to find and definitely decide what proportion of the territory of the town of Atherton may be reasonably allocated to business uses; but we are satisfied and do decide that, under the admitted facts of the instant case, the area allotted by the ordinance in question for business purposes in the town of Atherton is so small as to be an unreasonable restriction. Consequently, the ordinance cannot be sustained upon the theory that it is a proper invocation and application of the police power of the state.

Provision is made in the ordinance that, if any section, subsection, sentence, clause, or phrase of the ordinance is for any reason held to be unconstitutional, illegal, or otherwise invalid, such decisions shall not affect the remaining portions of the ordinance. Inasmuch as the vice of the ordinance permeates the entire scheme thereof, it must be held that the entire ordinance is void. The objection to the ordinance may be eradicated by the board of trustees of the town of Atherton, who, when so doing, will, doubtless, "give reasonable consideration, among other things, to the character of the district, its peculiar suitability for particular uses, the conservation of property values and the direction of building development in accord with a well-considered plan." Stats. 1917, p. 1419, § 2.

The ordinance being invalid, it follows that petitioner's conviction and subsequent imprisonment was unlawful, and he must be released from custody.

The petitioner is discharged.

PEOPLE v. MONTEREY FISH PRODUCTS CO. (S. F. 11376.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 4, 1925.)

1. Fish ⚡9—Statutes ⚡77(3)—Act excluding every one but packers of fish for human consumption from using or selling food fish for use in reduction plant held not invalid.

St. 1919, p. 1204, § 5, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, § 1, prohibiting use of food fish for reduction purposes, except that those engaged in catching, packing, or preserving fish or fish products for human consumption may use such fish in reduction plant or sell them for that purpose by obtaining permit, held not invalid, as unreasonable and discriminatory as against one operating reduction plant exclusively.

2. Statutes ⚡64(1)—When invalid proviso invalidates statute, stated.

Generally, when proviso in nature of exception to general statute is invalid, general provisions of statute are not invalidated thereby, unless provisions of exception are so intimately and inherently related with general provision that latter would not have been enacted without former.

3. Constitutional law ⚡48—All presumptions and intendments are in favor of statute attacked as discriminatory.

When act is attacked as discriminatory or unreasonable, all presumptions and intendments are in favor of reasonableness and fairness of legislative action.

4. Constitutional law ⚡48—Legislative decision as to distinctions warranting classification not overthrown unless palpably arbitrary.

Legislative decision as to what is sufficient distinction to warrant classification will not be overthrown by courts, unless it is palpably arbitrary.

5. Fish ⚡12—Public policy of state to protect and conserve food fish.

Public policy of state as declared by St. 1917, p. 1673, and St. 1919, p. 1203, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, in relation to food fish, is to protect, conserve, and devote them to purposes of human consumption.

6. Constitutional law ⚡62—Act prohibiting use of food fish in reduction plant held not invalid as vesting arbitrary discretion in fish commission.

St. 1919, p. 1203, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, prohibiting use of food fish in reduction plant, is not invalid as vesting in fish commission arbitrary authority and unguided discretion in designating percentage of excess fish which canners may take, as exercise of discretion is made dependent on hearing and findings.

7. Constitutional law ⚡62—Legislature may confer discretion on administrative body, provided its exercise is controlled.

The Legislature may confer on administrative board or officer a large measure of discretion, provided its exercise is controlled by rules prescribed therefor.

8. Fish ⚡9—Act regulating disposition of food fish held to apply to individual market fishermen.

St. 1919, p. 1203, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, prohibiting use of food fish in reduction plant except by permission of fish and game commission in certain cases, is not in conflict with St. 1917, p. 1673, and prohibits diversion of fish by individual market fisherman, who is unable to sell his catch, matter not prohibited by earlier statute.

9. Fish ⚡12—"Reduction plant," within act regulating taking of food fish, applies to plant reducing fish into products not for human consumption; "reduce."

Within St. 1919, p. 1203, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, prohibiting use of food fish in reduction plant except by permission in certain cases, "reduction plant" is any plant engaged in reduction of fish into products not intended to be used, and not in fact used, for human consumption; such as poultry food; "reduce" being to bring to a certain state or condition by grinding, pounding kneading, and rubbing.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reduce.]

10. Fish ☞12—Fishing for reduction plant held "waste" of food fish.

Fishing with direct purpose of delivering catch to reduction plant held "waste" of fish caught, within St. 1919, p. 1203, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, which includes use of fresh food fish for any purpose other than human consumption.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Waste.]

11. Fish ☞3—Title to fish vested in state.

Title to and property in fish, within state waters, are vested in state, and held by it in trust for the people.

12. Constitutional law ☞70(3)—Question as to measures best adapted to conserve and protect fish is for Legislature.

Subject only to constitutional limitations against discrimination, Legislature, to conserve and protect fish, may pass such laws as to it seem wise, and question what measures are best adapted to that end is for its determination.

13. Fish ☞1—Fish subject only to such qualified private ownership as Legislature permits.

Fish in public waters of state can become subject of private ownership only in such qualified way, to such limited extent, and subject to such conditions and limitations as Legislature may impose.

14. Fish ☞17—Fishermen catching fish in violation of law acquire no title and can convey none.

Where fish are taken in violation of law, those who catch them acquire no title and can convey none in view of St. 1917, p. 1674, § 4.

15. Fish ☞12—Use of food fish by reduction plant held nuisance.

Use of food fish by reduction plant, in violation of St. 1919, p. 1203, § 4, and section 5, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, § 1, is such obstruction to free use of property in fish as to interfere with comfortable enjoyment thereof by the people and as such constitutes nuisance, and hence finding that such use caused no damage to state suing for injunction was unauthorized.

16. Appeal and error ☞954(3)—Whether remedy at law is adequate at first instance is question of fact for trial court.

Question whether remedy at law is adequate is in first instance for trial court, and remains so if evidence is conflicting or opposing inference may reasonably be drawn therefrom.

17. Injunction ☞89—Injunction proper remedy for illegal use of food fish.

As to relegate state to action for damages for reduction plant's illegal use of food fish would be to defeat pro tanto legislative policy of conserving fish for human consumption, injunction is proper remedy to restrain such use, though such use has not appreciably depleted the supply of such fish.

18. Injunction ☞103—Criminal prosecution for illegal use of food fish not adequate remedy.

Criminal prosecution for violation of St. 1919, p. 1203, as amended by St. 1921, p. 459, by illegal use of food fish in reduction plant, affords no adequate remedy for invasion of state's property right in fish, so as to defeat injunction.

19. Fish ☞12—Finding sardines accepted by reduction plant were unfit for human food held immaterial.

In suit to enjoin reduction plant's illegal use of food fish, finding that sardines accepted and received by defendant were unfit for human food was immaterial, in light of uncontradicted testimony and admission by defendant that it was also engaged in receiving at its plant fish fit for human food.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Fred A. Treat, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against the Monterey Fish Products Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robt. W. Harrison, Deputy Atty. Gen., and B. D. Marx Greene, of Berkeley, for appellant.

R. D. Duke, of San Francisco, and C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to procure an injunction restraining the defendant from causing or permitting preventable waste of fish fit for human consumption by using the same in a reduction plant for the conversion thereof into fish meal and fish oil. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant is engaged in the business of operating a reduction plant for the manufacture of fish meal and fish oil and fertilizer, and that during the present seasonal run of sardines it has received, is receiving, and threatens in the future to receive from persons without written permission from the fish and game commission sardines fit for human consumption and is using the same for reduction purposes, thereby permitting and causing preventable deterioration and waste thereof; that defendant threatens to continue to so receive and reduce fish fit for human consumption at its reduction plant unless restrained therefrom, and will thereby cause preventable deterioration and waste of food fish caught within the waters of this state and great and irreparable loss and damage to the people of the state; that there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law; and that the acts of defendant, if permitted to continue, will be such an obstruction to the free use of property as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment thereof by the people of the state.

The defendant in its answer admits that it is engaged in the business of manufacturing fish meal and fish oil, but denies practically all of the remaining allegations of the complaint. The issues thus framed were narrowed somewhat by the express admissions of counsel for defendant at the commencement of the trial as follows:

"The only issues that are raised by this answer concern the averment in the complaint that the defendant is engaged in operating a reduction plant. We admit that we are manufacturing fish meal and fish oil, but deny that we are operating or manufacturing fertilizer. We admit we have received fish [fit for human consumption] from persons who have no permit from the fish commission, and we intend to continue to do so. We deny we are causing preventable deterioration or waste of fish, and we deny that our use of fish is depleting the supply of sardines, and we also deny that there is no adequate remedy at law. We deny that formal averment in the complaint that there is great and irreparable injury due to these acts. Our claim is that fish meal and fish oil are fit for human consumption. It is not a deterioration or waste of fish as those terms are meant in the statute and it is not a reduction plant within the statute."

The trial court found in favor of the defendant upon these issues. Appellant contends that the findings thus made are contrary to the evidence; that the judgment is against law in that it is not supported by the findings, and particularly that the conclusions of law are in violation of the rules laid down in the recent case of People v. Stafford Packing Co. (Cal. Sup.) 227 P. 485. The respondent contends that the findings are in accordance with the evidence and that the judgment is sustained by the findings, but places its principal reliance upon two contentions which were neither discussed nor considered in the Stafford Packing Company Case, supra, namely: First, that the statute upon which plaintiff relies is unconstitutional; and, second, that this statute, even if constitutional, is not applicable to the situation involved herein, which is governed by a different statute.

The statute upon which the appellant relies is:

"An act to conserve the fish supply in California by empowering the fish and game commission to regulate and control the handling of fish or other fishery products for the purpose of preventing deterioration or waste. * * * Stats. 1919, p. 1203.

Section 4 thereof provides:

"No person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of catching, buying, selling, canning, packing or preserving fish, shall suffer or permit, or cause any preventable deterioration, or willfully do any act that might cause deterioration or waste of any fish caught or taken within or without the waters of this state and brought into this state, and no person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of catching, buying, selling, canning, packing or preserving fish or other fishery products shall sell or offer for sale or delivery, or deliver any fish or other fishery products, to any reduction plant or divert fish or other fishery products for reduction purposes without first having written permission from the fish and game commission, and no reduction plant shall accept or receive any fish, other than fish offal, from any person, firm or corporation without such written permission."

Section 5 thereof, as amended (Stats. 1921, p. 459), provides:

"No person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of taking or catching food fish or other fishery food products shall take or catch or kill more fish or other fishery products than the boat or boats owned or operated by said person, firm or corporation can handle and deliver to the fresh fish dealer in a condition fit for human consumption, or to a canner, packer or preserver of fish in a condition fit to be canned or packed or preserved for human consumption. * * * It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to buy or sell or receive or use any kind or species of fish fit for human consumption for reduction purposes except fish offal; provided, that any person, firm or corporation engaged in taking, catching or dealing in fresh fish or fishery products for human consumption or any person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of canning, packing or preserving fish for human consumption desiring to sell or deliver or use in a reduction plant any fish fit for human consumption shall file an application * * * with the fish and game commission setting forth the kind or species and quantity of fish to be sold, delivered or used in a reduction plant. [Here follow procedural provisions for a hearing thereon.] If after hearing evidence upon said application it shall appear that there is no market for the fish referred to in said application and that the taking or using of said fish in a reduction plant will not tend to impair or deplete said species of fish an order may be made by the board of fish and game commissioners granting the privilege to take, catch or kill and deliver to or use in a reduction plant during a calendar month an amount of said fish not to exceed twenty-five per cent. of the amount any such applicant, person, firm or corporation can can or pack or preserve for human food during a calendar month. Said order shall not be granted for a period longer than a seasonal run of said kind or species of fish mentioned in said order."

[1-4] It is respondent's contention that this act, and particularly section 5 thereof, is unconstitutional, for the reason that it excludes every one except those who are engaged in taking, catching, dealing in, packing, or preserving fish or fish products for human consumption from the privilege of using any such fish in a reduction plant, and at the same time it expressly provides for the granting of such privilege to these favored classes. Respondent argues that there exists no natural, constitutional, or intrinsic basis for this classification and that the same is therefore arbitrary, unreasonable, and discriminatory and constitutes special legislation, violating the prohibition of both the state and federal Constitutions, citing Van Harlingen v. Doyle, 134 Cal. 53, 66 P. 44, 54 L. R. A. 771; Ex parte Sohneke, 148 Cal. 267, 82 P. 956, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, 113 Am. St. Rep. 236, 7 Ann. Cas. 475; Connolly v. Union S. P. Co., 184 U. S. 563, 22 S. Ct. 431, 46 L. Ed. 679; Bailey v. People, 190 Ill. 28, 60 N. E. 98, 54 L. R. A. 838, 83 Am. St. Rep. 116; Schaezlein v. Cabaniss, 135 Cal. 466, 67 P. 755, 56 L. R. A. 733, 87 Am. St. Rep. 122; Hewitt v. Board, 148 Cal. 594, 84 P. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315. It may be doubted that these objections, which apply only to the proviso contained in the statute would, if well founded, be of any avail to respondent herein. The general provisions of the act in question purport to prohibit all persons from using fish fit for human consumption (except fish offal) for reduction purposes. The proviso purports to except to a limited extent certain classes of persons from the operation of the general prohibition, upon the conditions therein specified. It may be argued with much reason that if the exception thus attempted be invalid because of its arbitrary and discriminatory character the result thereof would be to annul the exception, leaving the general prohibitory provisions of the act unimpaired. This result would in no way improve respondent's position. The general rule is that when a proviso in the nature of an exception to a general statute is invalid, the general provisions of the statute are not invalidated thereby, unless it clearly appears that the provisions of the exception are so intimately and inherently related to and connected with the general provisions to which it relates that the Legislature would not have enacted the latter without the former. 5 Cal. Juris. § 655 et seq., and cases cited. Counsel for respondent have advanced no reasons for the adoption of such a conclusion with respect to the statute here under consideration. However, we are not disposed to hold that the exception now under consideration is discriminatory or unreasonable. When a legislative enactment is attacked upon this ground, all presumptions and intendments are in favor of the reasonableness and fairness of the legislative action (5 Cal. Juris. § 628 et seq., and cases cited), and the decision of the Legislature as to what is a sufficient distinction to warrant the classification will not be overturned by the courts unless it is palpably arbitrary (Id. § 832 et seq., and cases cited).

[5-7] The public policy of this state in its relation to the food fish within its waters has been clearly, consistently, and unmistakably manifested throughout the history of its fish and game legislation. It aims at the protection and conservation of food fish for the benefit of the present and future generations of the people of the state and the devotion of such fish to the purposes of human consumption. In confirmation thereof we need only refer to the provisions of the act of 1919 and the amendment thereof in 1921, supra, and to the provisions of the act of 1917, relied upon by respondent herein (Stats. 1917, p. 1673). It is plain that the purpose and intent of both of these acts is to prohibit preventable waste of food fish, to discourage, and so far as practicable to prevent, the use thereof for any purpose other than human consumption, and to affirmatively encourage the use thereof for this purpose. With this item of public policy in mind, it is apparent that the purpose of the proviso which is here claimed to be unreasonable and discriminatory is to aid and encourage those who are engaged in catching and preparing fish for human consumption, and that no reason exists for the giving of such aid and encouragement to those who are engaged in diverting food fish to other uses. It is to the interest of the people of the state that the packing plants engaged in the packing and preparing of fish for human consumption shall be operated efficiently and economically, so that the price of their product to the consumers thereof may be kept down. A packing plant can be operated most efficiently and economically when it is enabled to operate steadily at a constant rate of output approaching its maximum capacity. But when the fishermen start out to make a catch no one can foretell with exactitude the size of the catch which they will take. Therefore, in order to insure so far as practicable that the catch for each day shall approximate the capacity of the packing plant, the act provides that the fish and game commission may, after a hearing, give the packer a permit which will enable him to engage for the taking of a specified quantity of fish in excess of his packing capacity, and upon occasions when such excess quantity is brought in to use the same for reduction purposes. The purpose of this is to allow the packer a certain leeway or margin of safety to enable him so far as practicable to operate his packing plant regularly and at capacity. There is no reason for allowing to the operator of a reduction plant, who is not packing fish for human consumption, any margin or leeway whatsoever, because he is forbidden to take any fish fit for human consumption for use in his reduction plant. This presents to our minds a reasonable and natural basis for the distinction made in the act between the two classes of operators, and it is not necessary to discuss the other reasons therefor which are suggested by counsel for appellant. There is no merit in the claim of respondent that the effect of this act is to prohibit the legitimate business of conducting a reduction plant by one who is not engaged in packing fish for human consumption. The act does not prohibit the operation of a reduction plant, nor does it prohibit the use therein of fish not fit for human consumption or of fish offal. It prohibits only the use in such a plant of fish fit for human consumption. If the respondent is in fact engaged in a legitimate business, it is not prohibited by this act from continuing the same. On the other hand, if respondent is engaged in the taking and use in its reduction plant of fish fit for human consumption, it is violating the law and is not engaged in a legitimate business. There is no merit in the contention that the act is invalid for the reason that it purports to vest in the commission arbitrary authority and unguided discretion in that it may allow one canner to take 25 per cent. and another 5 per cent. and another 1 per cent. of excess fish. The act confers discretion upon the commission, it is true, but such discretion is neither unguided nor uncontrolled. Its exercise is made dependent upon the findings of fact after a hearing "that there is no market for the fish referred to in said application and that the taking or using of said fish in a reduction plant will not tend to impair or deplete said species of fish." It is apparent that there may be varying circumstances of time, place, method of catching fish, location where they are to be found with relation to the location of the cannery, etc., which may legitimately justify the allowance of a larger leeway in one case than in another. The Legislature may, without violating any rule or principle of the Constitution, confer upon an administrative board or officer a large measure of discretion, provided the exercise thereof is guided and controlled by rules prescribed therefor. Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 213 P. 983, and cases cited.

[8] Under its second point, supra, respondent contends that it is not governed or affected by the act of 1919, which we have been considering herein, but that it is acting pursuant to and by virtue of authority expressly granted to it by the act of 1917, supra (Stats. 1917, p. 1673). Section 5 of this act provides that the state market director is authorized to regulate and control the business of buying, selling, and otherwise disposing of fresh food fish, and that such fish may not be bought, sold, or disposed of except in accordance with the provisions of the act. Section 7 thereof makes it unlawful to destroy food fish in excess of 50 pounds per day, or to divert any food fish to any use other than human consumption without the written consent of the market director. This is followed by a proviso that—

"Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply * * * to any individual market fisherman who is unable to sell for human consumption fish he has caught and who within forty-eight hours after the destruction or diversion of said fish shall report to the state market director the number of pounds and varieties of fish and how disposed of. * * *

Respondent argues that this proviso is in effect an express grant to market fishermen, under the circumstances there mentioned, of the right and authority to destroy or divert the fish caught by them, and that, incidentally and by necessary implication, it is a grant to respondent of the right to use such fish in its reduction plant; that the later act of 1919 does not expressly repeal this act; and that under well-established rules of statutory construction it should not be construed as effecting such repeal by implication. This view of the law was evidently adopted by the trial court, as it made a finding that all of the sardines accepted and received by the defendant were caught by the individual market fishermen who were unable to sell them for human consumption. We are not in accord with this view. There is no conflict between the two acts as to the matter here under consideration. The 1919 act covers a field of legislation not at all covered by the 1917 act. The earlier act contains certain prohibitions against the destruction or diversion of food fish which are by its terms expressly made inapplicable to the individual market fisherman who is unable to sell for human consumption fish he has caught. The later act contains other and broader prohibitions which apply to all persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the business of catching fish. This of necessity includes the individual market fisherman who was excepted from the operation of the earlier act. There is no merit in the claim that the earlier act grants to or confers upon such market fisherman a substantive right to destroy or divert fish caught by him. It does no more than this: It omits to prohibit him from so doing. The earlier act expressly negatives the contention that it is applicable to the situation here in question by the proviso that "nothing in this section shall be construed to apply * * *" thereto. In short, the later statute covers a field not covered by the earlier and there is no conflict in this respect between the two. The diversion of fish by the individual market fisherman who is unable to sell his catch is not prohibited by the earlier statute, but it is prohibited by the later one. We conclude, therefore, that the statute of 1919, as amended in 1921, is the statute which governs the respective rights and obligations of the parties hereto and that it is not invalid by reason of any of the matters which have been suggested herein. This brings us to a consideration of the points upon which appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment.

[9] In findings 1 and 2 the court found that—

"It is not true that the defendant is or ever was engaged in the business of operating a reduction plant for the manufacture of fish meal, fish oil, and fertilizer, * * * or is now accepting or receiving sardines at any reduction plant, or is, or ever was, using said fish for reduction purposes."

As we have noted, the defendant expressly admitted at the commencement of the trial that it was engaged in the business of operating a plant for the reduction of fish into fish oil and fish meal. It contended, however, that this does not constitute a reduction plant as that expression is used in the statute because of the fact that the resulting products—fish oil and fish meal—were not sold by the defendant to be used, and were not used, as fertilizer, but were sold to be used, and were in fact used, as poultry food. In short, it is defendant's contention that a plant which is engaged in the reduction of fish to fish oil and fish meal is a reduction plant only when those products are used as fertilizer and is not a reduction plant when the products are used as poultry food. The trial court evidently concurred with and adopted this contention, as it is the only theory upon which these findings are explicable. Respondent asserts that—

"To 'the man in the street' the term 'reduction plant' signifies a place where dead animals, garbage, offal and waste material are converted into fertilizer of the soil. * * *"

We are not aware of this fact, if it be a fact. We find no authority, either among the lexicographers or the law-writers or the decided cases, for so narrow and restricted a definition. The verb "reduce" is defined by Webster as follows:

"To bring to a certain state or condition by grinding, pounding, kneading, rubbing, etc.; as, to reduce a substance to powder, or to a pasty mass; to reduce fruit, wood or paper rags to pulp."

The Standard Dictionary gives a substantially similar definition. It is true, as suggested by respondent, that this word has also other and widely variant meanings, but no other approved definition thereof has been suggested as being in any wise appropriate to the context of the statute here in question. This court has defined the word "reduce," when applied to the mining industry, as meaning "to bring to a specified form or condition, as, to reduce a rock to powder, or, to deprive an ore of nonmetallic constituents," and has held that the word "reduction," used in this connection, means the separation of metals from their ores. In re Martin, 157 Cal. 60, 106 P. 239. In that case it was also held that the phrase "smelters and other institutions for the reduction or refining of ores or metals," when contained in a penal statute, is sufficiently comprehensive to include a quartz mill in which the operation consisted solely of crushing ore and then washing the same. The process used by defendant herein, briefly described, consists in cooking the fish, separating and removing therefrom the major portion of the oil and water content thereof, and grinding the residue to a meal or powder known as fish meal. Precisely the same process is used in those plants which are operated for the reduction of fish for use as fertilizer, except that in the latter case the meal may be ground to a finer powder than is desirable for poultry food, and except, further, that when the product is to be used as fertilizer fish may be used in such an advanced stage of decomposition as would render the product unfit for poultry food. Having in mind the manifest policy of the act, which is the conservation of fish for the purpose of human consumption, we have no doubt that the expression "reduction plant," as used therein, is at least sufficiently inclusive to apply to any plant engaged in the reduction of fish into other products which are not intended to be used, and are not in fact used, for human consumption. In this view of the law there is no basis in the evidence for the quoted findings numbered 1 and 2, and the same conclusion applies to the first portion of finding No. 4, to the effect that—

"It is not true that the defendant threatens to accept or receive sardines at any reduction plant, or threatens to use such fish for reduction purposes. * * *"

[10-13] Finding 3 and a portion of finding 4 are to the effect that it is not true that the defendant has, or is now permitting or causing, or threatening to permit or cause preventable or other deterioration or waste of fish caught within the waters of this state. It is clear from the terms and provisions of the statute that the term "waste" as there used was designed to include and to apply to the use of fresh food fish for any purpose other than human consumption. There was uncontradicted testimony at the trial from one of defendant's witnesses that two fishermen, named by him, were engaged in fishing with the direct purpose of delivering their catch to the defendant for use in its reduction plant. There was other testimony, uncontradicted, as to the number of tons of fresh fish which had been delivered by these two fishermen to the defendant upon specified dates shortly prior to the trial. This was not only a violation of the prohibitory provisions of the statute, but we think that it constituted preventable waste within the meaning thereof.

The court further found that it is not true that any use made of such fish by the defendant will cause any loss or damage to the people of the state of California, or will be such an obstruction to the free use of property as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of property by the people of the state of California, or that the defendant threatens to continue to commit any wrongful act. These findings are apparently predicated upon the conclusion of the learned trial judge that the defendant in using fresh food fish in its reduction plant was exercising a right granted to it by the statute of 1917, supra, and therefore committed no wrong. Of course, if the defendant were in fact acting within its legal rights and committing no wrong, the plaintiff could not in contemplation of law be damaged thereby. But, as we have seen, the statute of 1917 confers no such right. The title to, and property in, the fish within the waters of the state are vested in the state of California and held by it in trust for the people of the state. Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 529, 16 S. Ct. 600, 40 L. Ed. 793; People v. Truckee Lumber Co., 116 Cal. 397, 48 P. 374, 39 L. R. A. 581, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183; In re Phoebovius, 177 Cal. 238, 170 P. 412; People v. Stafford Packing Co., supra. The Legislature may dispose thereof as to it may seem best, subject only to constitutional limitations against discrimination. Within those limitations the Legislature, for the purpose of conserving and protecting fish, may pass such laws as to it seem wise, and the question what measures are best adapted to that end is for its determination. Ex parte Kenneke, 136 Cal. 527, 69 P. 261, 89 Am. St. Rep. 177; In re Phoebovius, supra. Such fish can become the subject of private ownership only in such qualified way, to such limited extent, and subject to such conditions and limitations as the state through its Legislature may see fit to provide and impose. In re Phoebovius, supra; Paladini v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 369, 173 P. 588.

"It is, therefore, evident that what the people of the state own they can alienate on such terms as they choose to impose, and that this power of regulation continues so long as such fish or game are the subject of trade or transfer." Paladini v. Superior Court, supra.

[14, 15] In section 4 of the act of 1917, supra (Stats. 1917, p. 1674), the Legislature imposed the following limitations:

"No such fish shall be caught, taken or killed in any manner or at any time except that the person so catching, taking or killing or having the same in his possession, irrespective of the manner in which they were obtained, shall by such act or possession thereby consent that the title to such fish shall be and remain in the state of California for the purpose of regulating and controlling the use and disposition of same after such catching, taking or killing, except that the title to such fish legally taken shall vest in the person so taking or possessing them, subject to the restrictions and provisions of law."

It follows that if the fish were taken in violation of law, the fisherman who caught them acquired no title thereto, and even if they were taken lawfully, a sale thereof to defendant for use in its reduction plant would convey no title thereto, and the title would still remain in the state. The use of fish which was admittedly made by the defendant herein was not merely a violation of prohibitory provisions of a statute, but was also a wrong committed against the property right of the plaintiff. It was such an obstruction to the free use of property as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment thereof by the people of the state of California and as such constituted a nuisance. People v. Truckee Lumber Co., supra; People v. Stafford Packing Co., supra. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that such use of fish by the defendant did not or will not cause any loss or damage to the plaintiff, and this finding is therefore contrary to the evidence.

[16] This brings us to the question whether or not the damage and injury so inflicted upon the plaintiff, and which the defendant admittedly threatens to continue to so inflict, is or will be irreparable in such sense as to entitle the plaintiff to injunctive relief. This question is so intimately bound up with the question of the availability of an adequate remedy at law that the two may well be considered together. The court found:

"It is not true that the plaintiff has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. * * *

As we pointed out in the Stafford Case, supra, this is in the first instance a question for the trial court, and if the evidence is conflicting, or if opposing inferences may reasonably be drawn therefrom, it still remains a question of fact for the trial court. There still remains for review upon appeal, however, the question whether there is any substantial evidence to support the finding thereon. The court also found:

"That the supply of sardines in the Bay of Monterey, and generally along the Pacific Coast, is practically inexhaustible, and that the quantity heretofore taken from the Bay of Monterey during the seasonal run of sardines has not appreciably depleted said species of fish, but on the contrary said species is upon the increase."

Appellant vigorously assails this finding as unsupported by, and contrary to, the evidence. But we are inclined to disagree with this contention. There was evidence that the supply of sardines in the vicinity of the Bay of Monterey had not been appreciably depleted up to the time of trial. There was also evidence to the effect that the size of the catch in this vicinity has increased since 1919. There was no evidence that the supply is practically inexhaustible or that the species is on the increase, except as these facts might be inferred from the testimony above adverted to. There was also testimony, not substantially contradicted, to the effect that if unrestricted fishing of sardines in the coastal waters of this state for the reduction thereof into fertilizer and poultry food is permitted, the supply will not merely be depleted, but will be practically exhausted as a result thereof. But as this was in the nature of opinion evidence and as the facts upon which the opinion was predicated are nowise conclusive, we are not prepared to say that the trial court was bound to accept this testimony at its face value. We conclude that this finding is not unsupported by the evidence, but we do not regard it as determinative of the present question. The only other remedy suggested by respondent as available to appellant herein is an action at law for damages. It is apparent that the amount of damages which would compensate plaintiff for the destruction of its fish and the diversion thereof to uses other than human consumption would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, of ascertainment. This is particularly true in the light of the circumstances that the state owns the fish, not in a private or proprietary capacity, but in its sovereign capacity and as a trustee for the people of the state.

[17-19] It is further apparent that to relegate the state to an action for damages would be to defeat pro tanto the legislative policy of conserving the fish of the state for human consumption. As was suggested in Hulbert v. California, etc., Cement Co., 161 Cal. 239, 118 P. 928, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 436, to permit the defendant to continue the taking and destruction of the property of plaintiff even though the defendant be required to pay the full value thereof as damages, would be in effect to allow and to legalize the unauthorized seizure and taking of property for a use other than a public use. The remedy which was suggested in the Stafford Case, supra, as an adequate remedy at law, to wit, the revocation of defendant's permit, is inapplicable herein because this defendant has no permit which is subject to revocation. It is operating without a permit and in violation of the law. The circumstance that it may be prosecuted criminally for a violation of the penal provisions of the statute affords no adequate remedy for the civil wrong, which consists of an invasion of plaintiff's property right. People v. Truckee Lumber Co., supra; People v. Stafford Packing Co., supra. We conclude that there is no adequate remedy at law available to the plaintiff herein, and this conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider plaintiff's contention that under subdivision 1 of section 526, Code of Civil Procedure, it is not required to show great or irreparable injury in order to entitle itself to injunctive relief. The finding of the trial court "that large quantities of the sardines which have been accepted and received by the defendant were unfit for human consumption * * *" is immaterial in the light of the fact that it was proven by uncontradicted testimony and expressly admitted by defendant that it was also engaged in receiving and using in its reduction plant large quantities of fish which were fit for human consumption.

For the reasons above indicated, the judgment is reversed.

70 Cal. App. 724

NEW YORK OVERSEA CO., Inc., v. WARFIELD-PRATT-HOWELL CO.
(Civ. 5081.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 24, 1925.)

1. Sales ⚡54—Agreement of parties in contract of sale will be given full effect.

Where contract of sale is simple and unambiguous, agreement of parties will be given full effect.

2. Sales ⚡71(3)—Contract to sell 200 tons, 10 per cent. under or over, held to confer option on seller within limits defined.

Under contract to sell about 200 tons of sugar defining "about" as 10 per cent. under or over, seller held to have option of delivering within quantitative limits expressed, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1448, 1449.

3. Sales ⚡71(3) — Bad faith not involved, where seller merely insisted on full benefit of contract.

Under contract for 200 tons of sugar, 10 per cent. under or over, insistence of seller on delivering 220 tons, held not to involve element of bad faith, although market value at time of delivery was less than contract price, as seller was merely insisting on full benefit of contract.

4. Sales ⚡71(3)—Seller entitled to recover, where only 200 out of 220 tons offered were accepted.

Under contract for sale of about 200 tons of sugar, "about" being defined in contract as 10 per cent. under or over, seller held entitled to recover, in action for damages for breach, where only 200 out of 220 tons offered were accepted.

5. Appeal and error ⚡842(2)—Conclusion of law, stated as finding of fact, not binding on appellate court.

In action for damages for breach of contract of sale, finding as to amount required to be delivered under contract, though stated as finding of act, is not binding on appellate court; it being merely erroneous conclusion of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by the New York Oversea Company, Inc., against the Warfield-Pratt-Howell Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to render judgment for plaintiff.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ira S. Lillick and Theo. M. Levy, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANDGON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against it in an action brought to recover something over $5,000, damages suffered by reason of the failure of defendant to accept and pay for 20 tons of sugar, alleged to have been purchased by said defendant from the plaintiff. The only question presented at the trial and upon appeal is as to whether the quantity of sugar in question was purchased by defendant under the admitted contract between the parties. This contract contained the following provisions pertinent to our inquiry: After naming the buyer and seller, and the commodity sold, it continued:

"Quantity: (About) two hundred (200) tons (each 2,240 pounds)."

The price was then specified and other conditions, immaterial here, after which appears the following:

"It is understood that, where the word 'about' appears in this contract, it shall mean 10 per cent. over or under."

Many of the facts were agreed to by stipulation of the parties. No question is made as to the quality of the sugar nor as to the fulfillment of any of the conditions binding upon the seller, and it is agreed that, upon the arrival of the vessel containing the sugar, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant 220 tons of the same. Two hundred tons were accepted and paid for by the defendant. However, the price of sugar had decreased between the time of the signing of the contract and the arrival of the sugar in San Francisco, and the defendant objected to accepting the maximum amount called for by the contract. It was agreed that the 20 tons of sugar in dispute should be sold at the market price and the defendant's liability for the difference between that amount and the price it had contracted to pay for the sugar should be submitted to the court.

[1] The trial court concluded that the contract provisions hereinbefore quoted obligated the defendant to accept only 200 tons of sugar. Respondent seeks to support this decision by citing cases in which such terms as "about" and "more or less" were used in connection with the specification of an amount of merchandise, but in all of those cases the definition of such terms was not agreed upon by the parties and therefore the contracts presented some ambiguity, some opportunity for judicial construction. Such cases are not in point here, because, as appellant points out, the parties have exactly defined their terms, and such definition is as binding a part of their contract as any other part. There is no situation presented in the instant case which invites construction of the contract. The contract is simple and unambiguous, and the invariable rule in this and every other jurisdiction, under such circumstances, is to give full effect to the agreement of the parties.

[2] It is appellant's position that the contract in this case gave the seller an option to deliver any amount of sugar between 180 and 220 tons. Reliance is placed upon the following cases: Wheeler v. New Brunswick & Canada Railroad, 115 U. S. 29, 5 S. Ct. 1061, 1160, 29 L. Ed. 341, in which it was said:

"We concur with the circuit court in holding that, when Wheeler & Co. say we have bought of you (the railroad company) 'from 2 to 600 tons for delivery in New York or New Haven between August 1st and October 1st,' they agreed to accept any amount of old rails between those limits. The company was selling old rails. It knew that by August it would have 1,000 tons. It did not know how much more they would have by October 1st. It intended to secure the sale of what it might have, between 200 and 600 tons. Besides, as it was bound to do the first act in performance of the contract by delivering the iron, the option, if there was one, was with the railroad company."

Another case closely analogous to the present one is Standard Sugar Refinery v. Castano (C. C.) 43 F. 279. There the contract was for a sale of 700 to 800 tons of sugar. The seller chartered a vessel which carried more than 800 tons of sugar. When the vessel arrived the price of sugar had risen and the seller tendered the buyer 700 tons of sugar out of the cargo. The buyer claimed that it was entitled to more than 700 tons, but accepted 700 tons and litigated his right to a larger amount. The court said:

"The only question in this case is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover any damages for breach of the contract which was made. The contract called for a cargo of from 700 to 800 tons of sugar. It appears that 700 tons of sugar were delivered to the plaintiff at the contract price. * * * I am of opinion, as the defendants might have performed their contract by shipping a cargo of 700 tons, that in assessing damages for a breach of the contract they may select that alternative which is the least burdensome to themselves."

In the case of Pennsylvania Sugar Co. v. Czarnikow-Rionda Co., 245 F. 913, 158 C. C. A. 201, the sale was of 25,000 to 30,000 bags of Cuban sugar. In the correspondence between the parties the word "cargo" was used. The seller shipped 32,000 bags from Cuba to Philadelphia. The price of sugar having increased before the arrival of the same, the buyers claimed that the use of the word "cargo" entitled them to more than 25,000 bags. The court decided against this contention and said:

"And this leads to the question, How much sugar did the Pennsylvania Company buy? If the word 'cargo' were not in the contract, the answer would be plain, namely, from 25,000 to 30,000 bags, at the seller's option."

In the case of Illinois Glass Co. v. Three States Lumber Co., 90 Ill. App. 599, the sale was of 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 feet of lumber. The court there said:

"We can discover no ambiguity in the contract, and it seems to us remarkably clear and free from any fault of that character. Inasmuch, then, as appellant's counsel have argued the case upon the theory that by the terms of the contract appellant had a legal right to call upon appellee to deliver to appellant, free on board of the cars at Alton, as well as at Cairo, 4,000,000 feet of lumber, and upon failure to so make the delivery, appellee became liable to appellant for a breach of the contract, and as appellee's counsel have argued the case upon an exactly opposite theory as to the delivery of the extra 1,000,000 feet over 3,000,000 feet, we feel it may be unjust to the parties not to consider and determine the only question actually raised in the case by them, which is, with which party did the option rest, to complete the sale of the 1,000,000 feet of lumber above 3,000,000 feet? It is well-settled law, that parties may make contracts binding only on one side at the time when entered into, but which may thereafter become binding on both sides at the option of one of the parties to it, and the contract sued on in this case is of that character; but the option to make the contract complete was not given to either party in express terms, and assuming for the present that, from anything appearing in the contract, it was not given by implication, it remains only for the law to declare with whom the option rests. On this question there seems to be scarcely any disagreement among the authorities, as substantially all hold to a rule that would give the option to appellee, since it would have to do the first act to make the contract complete, by delivering the lumber"—citing many authorities.

It seems well settled by the foregoing authorities that, where parties make a contract for the purchase and sale of merchandise between certain limits, the option is with the seller to determine the amount to be delivered by him within those limits. Upon the same principle, when parties have used the word "about" in their contract, and have exactly defined such term, the option is with the seller to deliver within the quantitative limits expressed by the definition of such term. It is said in Williston on Sales, § 464:

"The addition of the qualifying words 'about,' 'more or less' and the like, in such cases, is only for the purpose of providing against accidental variations arising from slight and unimportant excesses or deficiencies in number, measure, or weight. If, however, the qualifying words are supplemented by other stipulations or conditions which give them a broader scope or a more extensive significance, then the contract is to be governed by such added stipulations or conditions."

And now coming to our own state, appellant cites the case of Jacobson Reimers Co. v. Tozai Co., 42 Cal. App. 178, 183 P. 466. There the contract was for the purchase and sale of choice dressed turkeys "numbering from 200 head up to 1,200." No turkeys were delivered and action was brought for damages for breach of contract. The court said:

"What then, is the rule governing alternative obligations? Counsel seem to have explored the cases and the text-books with diligence for light, and the written opinion of the learned trial judge shows that he examined with much care the authorities upon the question. The provisions of our Civil Code seem to have been overlooked, although they apparently state the rule applicable to the present case:

"If an obligation requires the performance of one of two acts, in the alternative, the party required to perform has the right of selection, unless it is otherwise provided by the terms of the obligation." Civ. Code, § 1448.

"If the party having the right of selection between alternative acts does not give notice of his selection to the other party within the time, if any, fixed by the obligation for that purpose, or, if none is so fixed, before the time at which the obligation ought to be performed, the right of selection passes to the other party." * * * Id. § 1449.

"Referring to the number of turkeys to be delivered, the language of the obligation is, 'numbering from 200 head up to 1,200,' and, as to the time of delivery, the obligation is 'between now (its date) and Thanksgiving' (November 29th). Plainly, the statute gave defendants the right to deliver any number of turkeys from 200 to 1,200 'between' the date of the obligation and November 29th. Defendants, admittedly, neither offered to nor did deliver any number of turkeys 'between now and Thanksgiving,' or at all, but, as the court found, refused to deliver any. In such case, by the terms of the statute, 'the right of selection passes to the other party.'"

There is no claim that the election as to the quantity of sugar ever passed to the buyer in the instant case, for it was stipulated that, upon the arrival of the sugar at San Francisco, the seller tendered to the buyer 220 tons.

It would seem that the citation of further authority is unnecessary, but it is interesting in considering the question before us to find our position sustained by an English case closely analogous to the instant case. In re Thornett and Fehr, etc., [1921] 1 King's Bench, 219. There the contract was for the sale of "200 tons, 5 per cent. more or less" of tallow. The court said:

"The third question is whether, as a matter of law, the arbitrators ought to treat the contract as being a contract for 200 tons, or whether they are at liberty at their discretion to treat it as a contract for 190 tons or 210 tons or any number of tons falling between those limits. The answer to that question is that the contract is for the number of tons specified in the document; that is, for '200 tons, 5 per cent. more or less.' That means that the sellers would be performing their obligation under the contract if they delivered 5 per cent. less than the 200 tons or 5 per cent. more than the 200 tons. It is a provision which is inserted into the contract for the sellers' protection, and it gives them a margin within which to deliver, so that they are not bound to deliver exactly 200 tons, but within 5 per cent. of the quantity, whether more or less. Their legal obligation under the contract was to deliver at least 190 tons, and if they had delivered 190 tons, they would have performed the contract; that is to say, they would have delivered the quantity which could be enforced against them under the contract. In my opinion the damages which can be claimed against the sellers in this case are not damages for nondelivery of 39 tons, the balance between 161 and 200 tons, but for nondelivery of 29 tons allowing for the 5 per cent. less than the 200 tons. Although one is naturally much impressed by the view of the board of appeal who are familiar with contracts of this kind, I do not think we can give effect to their view that the phrase '5 per cent. more or less' operates only to cover incidental or unimportant variations from the quantity stated in the contract. There could not be an inquiry if the sellers had delivered within 5 per cent. more or less of the 200 tons as to whether the delivery of the 5 per cent. more or less was occasioned by accident or inadvertence or whether it was a deliberate act. The truth is that it was intended by the contract to give the sellers an option of delivering either 5 per cent. more or 5 per cent. less than the 200 tons, or any quantity between those limits."

[3] The contention of the respondent in the case before us that the tender of the maximum amount of sugar after the price had decreased was evidence of bad faith is without legal force. The most that can be said of this aspect of the case is that it indicated a lack of generosity; but we cannot charge a seller with bad faith in a legal sense because he insists upon the full benefit of a contract which he has made. Such procedure is the usual course of business and the buyer must have known when he signed the contract that the seller would probably elect to furnish the minimum or maximum amounts called for thereunder according to whether the price of sugar increased or declined. There is no element of either good or bad faith involved in the transaction, since the seller is merely insisting upon the express and unambiguous provisions of his contract with the defendant.

[4, 5] The findings of fact are such as to warrant the entry of a judgment thereon for the appellant herein, the plaintiff in the trial court. They follow, for the most part, the stipulation of the parties as to the matters therein recited, including the making of the contract, its terms, the tender of 220 tons of sugar and payment for 200 tons, the difference of $5,095.94 between the contract price of 20 tons of sugar and its selling price in the open market after the refusal of the defendant to accept the same. The finding that 2,009 bags of sugar containing approximately 200 tons were marked with certain letters, while the remaining 20 tons tendered to defendant were marked with different letters is immaterial. Respondent urges this circumstance upon our attention as an evidence of bad faith; but, as we have stated, we do not consider such an issue involved in the case. The statement in the findings that the sale between the parties provided for by the terms of the contract was for 200 tons of sugar is a conclusion of law. We are of the opinion that no judicial construction of this contract was permissible since its terms are clear and unambiguous, and it is also true that any conclusion as to its legal effect is not binding upon this court as a finding of fact.

The findings of fact binding upon appeal demand a judgment for the appellant for $5,095.94. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment for plaintiff in accordance with the views herein expressed.

CALIFORNIA LAW & ADJUSTMENT CO.
v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4996.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California. Jan. 28, 1925.)

1. Justices of the peace $\S$ 167(3)—Statute held to authorize dismissal of appeal from justice court, and not of action.

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 981a, relating to dismissal, where party appealing from justice court fails to bring appeal to trial within one year, refers to a dismissal of the appeal, and not of the action, notwithstanding actual words of act.

2. Justices of the peace $\S$ 166(3)—Petitioner held estopped from demanding dismissal of appeal from justice court, not brought to trial within required time.

Petitioner held estopped from demanding under mandatory provisions of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 981a, a dismissal of an appeal from justice court, not brought to trial as required, within one year from date of filing of appeal, where petitioner himself before the expiration of the year caused the case to be set after such expiration.

Original application for writ of mandate by the California Law & Adjustment Company against the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles and Elliot Craig as Judge thereof. Writ denied, and proceeding dismissed.

Earle P. Thompson, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. On petition for writ of mandamus to compel the dismissal of an appeal from a justice's court.

[1] According to section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure, added to that code by the Legislature at its 1923 session, it becomes the duty of a superior court to dismiss any appeal from a justice's court, "where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal in said superior court, unless such time be otherwise extended by a written stipulation by the parties to the action filed with the clerk of the superior court to which the appeal is taken." The actual wording of the section is that all such actions must be dismissed; but it is settled by decision, based upon a consideration of the context and of the purposes of the enactment, that the dismissal referred to and intended is a dismissal of the appeal and not of the action. Meier v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 227 P. 490, 493.

[2] The petitioner here shows that in September, 1923, in a justice's court of Los Angeles township, it obtained judgment against one Hiro Kakiuchi in the sum of $210.22; that the defendant appealed from said judgment on questions of both law and fact; that the appeal papers were filed in the superior court on October 17, 1923; "that on the 3d day of December, 1923, the attorney for petitioner caused said case to be set for trial in the respondent court on the 4th day of December, 1924." Petitioner further alleges that on December 4, 1924, when the case was called for trial, petitioner moved for dismissal of the appeal upon the ground that the defendant had failed to bring the appeal to trial within one year from the date upon which the appeal had been filed; that respondent court denied said motion, and the trial of said action then proceeded, and judgment was given in favor of the defendant.

Petitioner says that the appealing party failed to bring the appeal to trial within the required time limited by the statute, and that the time for trial was not otherwise extended by any written stipulation by the parties to the action filed with the clerk of the superior court. Upon these facts petitioner claims that he is entitled to a writ of mandate requiring that respondent court vacate its judgment rendered at the trial in the superior court, and dismiss the appeal from the justice's court.

It must be conceded that the section 981a is mandatory in its requirement of dismissal of an appeal under the conditions stated therein, and that to bring an appeal to trial is more than merely to cause it to be set for trial. Boyd v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co.

185 Cal. 344, 346, 197 P. 58. Nevertheless we think that the writ ought not to issue. It was the petitioner himself who, at a time prior to the expiration of the year named in the statute, caused the case to be set for trial on December 4, 1924, which was after the expiration of the year. If such action on the part of the plaintiff, shown by the record of the court, and now admitted by him in his petition, is not the legal equivalent of a written stipulation on his part duly filed with the clerk, then at least petitioner should be estopped to take advantage of the defect.

It appearing to us that the petition does not show a right to the demanded relief, it is ordered that the said petition be denied, and the proceeding is dismissed.

BROWN et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4806.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 26, 1925.)

1. Certiorari $\hookrightarrow$ 70(1)—Final "judgment" rendered, when announced by court and entered on minutes.

In certiorari proceeding where no issue of fact was tendered, final judgment held rendered, where court ordered that writ "be and is hereby denied," as this completely disposed of proceeding; "judgment" being not what is entered, but what is ordered and considered, and being defined under Code Civ. Proc. § 577, as "the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Judgment (In Law).]

2. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 270—Judgment has full force and effect on rendition, irrespective of entry.

Judgment has full force and effect as final judgment on rendition, irrespective of entry in judgment book, which is mere ministerial act of clerk.

3. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 282 — Judgment need not be signed by judge.

Signature of judge gives no additional validity to judgment, being merely to afford clerk a sure means of correctly entering what court has adjudged which is not necessary, where judgment as pronounced and spread upon minutes is in itself a sufficient guide to enable clerk to enter correctly in judgment book.

4. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 271—Clerk held to have duty to enter final judgment.

In certiorari proceeding where court rendered final judgment, denying the writ, clerk held to have duty of entering same in judgment book, as such judgment is not in that class mentioned in Code Civ. Proc. § 581.

5. Mandamus ☞ 14(1)—Clerk cannot be compelled to enter judgment, where no demand was made.

Where court had rendered final judgment, but clerk had not entered it in judgment book, he could not be compelled to do so by writ of mandate, where it did not appear that any demand had ever been made upon him, or that he had refused.

6. Mandamus ☞ 152—Clerk cannot be compelled to enter judgment in proceeding against judge alone.

In proceeding for writ of mandate to compel judge to enter judgment which he had rendered in judgment book, which was duty of clerk, latter could not be compelled, where he was not party to proceeding.

7. Evidence ☞ 82—Presumption is that court will do what law demands of it.

Presumption is that court will do what law demands of it, as and when the occasion arises.

Application by A. C. Brown and others for a writ of mandate against the Superior Court of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and another. Denied.

Bauer, Wright & Macdonald, Alexander Macdonald, and Henry R. Schultheis, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Bruce Mason and Denio & Hart, all of Long Beach, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an original application to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court for Los Angeles county, and the Hon. C. W. Guerin as judge thereof, to cause a formal judgment to be signed and entered in a certiorari proceeding wherein it was sought to review the action of the city council of the city of Long Beach in an annexation matter.

The application for the writ of mandate discloses the following: The petitioners here were the petitioners in the certiorari proceeding. On the day when they filed their application in the superior court for the writ of certiorari that court made an order, directed to the city council of the city of Long Beach, ordering that body to show cause why the writ of certiorari should not issue. A hearing on the order to show cause was had, the question whether the writ should issue was argued and submitted, and on May 29, 1924, the court caused an order to be entered on its minutes as follows:

"Petition for writ of certiorari, heretofore submitted, in Department 25, Hon. C. W. Guerin then presiding, it is now ordered that the Writ of Certiorari be and the same is hereby denied."

Thereafter, petitioners, on notice duly served and filed by them, moved the superior court to sign and to cause to be filed and entered a formal judgment denying their application for the writ of certiorari. This the court refused to do. The clerk of the superior court has not been made a party to the present proceeding. It does not appear that any demand was ever made upon the clerk to make entry in his judgment book of the judgment which was announced by the court and spread upon its minutes; nor does it appear that he has ever refused to make such entry.

[1-3] Petitioners contend that the order which the superior court caused to be spread upon its minutes denying the writ of certiorari is not a final judgment, and that they are entitled to have such final disposition made of the proceeding, by way of a formal judgment, as will enable them to take an appeal. Respondents, on the other hand, contend that the order which the court made and caused to be entered in its minutes is a final judgment, and that its entry in the judgment book is not a duty which the law imposes upon the court or the judge thereof, but is a ministerial act which the law specially enjoins upon the clerk as a duty resulting from his office.

We think that a final judgment was made by the court, i. e., was "rendered," when the order of May 29, 1924, was announced and entered in the minutes. "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding." Code Civ. Proc. § 577. No answer was filed in the certiorari proceeding, and no issue of fact was tendered. Consequently no findings were required, and therefore the judgment was "rendered" when the decision was announced by the court and spread upon its minutes. Crime v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 488, 26 P. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 706, 707, 109 P. 91; Smith v. Ross, 57 Cal. App. 191, 207 P. 55. Its entry in the judgment book is not essential to its effectiveness.

The Code recognizes that the "rendition" of a judgment and its "entry" are different stages which operate as initial points from which other acts may be begun or other rights acquired. Gray v. Palmer, 28 Cal. 419, 420. Thus the right to issue execution attaches from the time of the entry of the judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 681); but an appeal is effective if taken at any time after the rendition of the judgment, but not later than 60 days after its entry. (Section 939, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1915 [St. 1915, p. 205]). A like provision is contained in section 1715. See Estate of Stone, 173 Cal. 675, 161 P. 258. Though the statute makes the entry of the judgment the initial point for the commencement of some acts or for the acquirement of some rights, and its rendition the initial point for the commencement of other acts or the acquirement of other rights, the judgment has full force and effect as a judgment, regardless of the mere ministerial act of entering it in the judgment book. Mr. Freeman, in his work on Judgments, declares (vol. 1, § 38) that—

“A judgment is not what is entered, but what is ordered and considered.”

The judgment is the judicial act of the court; its entry in the judgment book, which affords the highest record evidence of its existence, is but the ministerial act of the clerk. That which the court performs judicially, or orders to be performed, is not to be avoided by the action or want of action of the court's ministerial officers; and, if the judgment as rendered finally determines the rights of the parties to the action or proceeding, it is as complete when it is pronounced by the court as when it is entered and recorded by the clerk as required by the statute. In re Cook, 77 Cal. 220, 17 P. 923, 19 P. 431, 1 L. R. A. 567, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267; Id., 83 Cal. 415, 23 P. 392; Otto v. Long, 144 Cal. 144, 146, 77 P. 885; In re Clarke, 125 Cal. 388, 395, 58 P. 22; Fresno Estate Co. v. Fiske, 172 Cal. 583, 597, 598, 157 P. 1127. Nor is it necessary that the judgment be signed by the judge. The judge's signature gives it no additional validity. 14 Cal. Jur. p. 914; Crim v. Kessing, supra. The principal object of the judge's signature is to afford the clerk a surer means of correctly entering what the court has adjudged. But that was not necessary in the instant case, for here the judgment as pronounced by the court and as spread upon its minutes was in itself a sufficient guide to the clerk to enable that officer to perform his ministerial duty to enter the correct judgment in the judgment book. This is all that was necessary. Broder v. Conklin, 98 Cal. 364, 33 P. 211.

Since neither signing by the judge nor entry by the clerk is an essential prerequisite to the validity of a judgment, and since an appeal is not ineffective merely because it is taken before the entry of the judgment, it follows that the order which was spread upon the minutes of the court in the certiorari proceeding must be held to be a final judgment if its language amounts to a final determination by the superior court of the rights of all parties to the proceeding. The order contains all the effective words of a judgment. It declares that—

“It is now ordered that the writ of certiorari be and the same is hereby denied.”

Such language is in its nature and essence that of a final judgment. The order finally and entirely disposes of the whole case. It clearly shows that the court had determined the rights of the parties to the proceeding by declaring that the writ of certiorari be and that it is denied. It completely disposes of the proceeding in which it was made, so far as the court which made it is concerned. As was said by Mr. Justice Shaw in Dollenmayr v. Pryor, 150 Cal. 3, 87 P. 616:

“The most verbose statement could not state the determination more accurately or effectually.”

Nothing whatever remained to be done except to enter the judgment in the judgment book. But that was a ministerial duty of the clerk, and no further judicial action was left for the court.

[4] If the clerk has not already entered the judgment which was rendered by the court in the certiorari proceeding, it is his duty to do so. That judgment is not a judgment of dismissal. It is not of the class of judgments mentioned in section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As we have stated, no answer was filed by the defendants in the certiorari proceeding, and therefore no issue of fact was joined. At the hearing on the order to show cause, the superior court was called upon to try an issue of law. It determined that issue, with the result that it rendered a judgment to the effect that its writ of review do not issue. The situation is somewhat analogous to that which exists when the court renders a judgment for the defendant after having made its order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend. Such a judgment is not one of dismissal within the meaning of section 581.

[5, 6] But, though we think it the duty of the clerk to enter in his judgment book the judgment as pronounced by the court and entered in its minutes, we cannot compel that officer to make such entry—assuming that he has not already done so—and this for two reasons: First, it does not appear that any demand was ever made upon the clerk to enter the judgment, or that he has ever refused to make such entry; second, he is not a party to this proceeding. The person upon whom the duty is enjoined by the statute is a necessary party to the proceeding. Peck v. Board of Supervisors, 90 Cal. 384, 27 P. 301. A refusal by the clerk to enter the judgment would be in no sense a refusal by the court. State ex rel. v. District Court, 125 Minn. 522, 146 N. W. 480.

[7] It doubtless is true that, whenever the clerk refuses to enter the judgment as rendered, the superior court, whose officer he is, should order him to make the entry. If there were anything here to show that the superior court had refused to perform its duty to coerce a recalcitrant clerk, it is quite possible that we could compel that court to perform such duty by issuing our mandate directing it to order its clerk to enter the judgment. Havens v. Stewart, 7 Idaho, 298, 62 P. 682. See, also, the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harrison in People v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 479, 46 P. 383. But until the clerk refuses to enter the judgment in the book kept by him for that purpose, no duty rests upon the superior court to take coercive measures with respect to that officer. The presumption is that the superior court will do what the law demands of it, as and when the occasion arises.

Our conclusion is that the application for the writ of mandate fails to show that either of these respondents has ever refused to perform any act which the law specially enjoins upon the court, or upon Judge Guerin as a duty resulting from his office as judge.

The alternative writ of mandate is discharged and the application for the peremptory writ of mandate is denied.

MYERS v. HARRINGTON et al.
(Civ. 2864.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 22, 1925.)

1. Bastards ⚡16—No legal obligation on father to support illegitimate child prior to adoption of statute to that effect.

Prior to adoption of Civ. Code, § 196a, relating to action against father for maintenance of illegitimate child, there was no legal obligation resting on father of an illegitimate child to furnish it support, or give it an education.

2. Bastards ⚡54—To enforce obligation of father to support illegitimate child, parentage must be established.

To enforce obligation of father, under Civ. Code, § 196a, to maintain an illegitimate child, fact of parentage must be established.

3. Bastards ⚡69—Parentage, necessity of, and ability to support may all be determined in action against father for maintenance of illegitimate child.

In action against father, under Civ. Code, § 196a, to compel maintenance of illegitimate child, fact of parentage and question of necessity of support and ability to support may all be inquired into and determined in one proceeding.

4. Divorce ⚡310—Decree in divorce suit for maintenance of minor child a continuing one, and does not abate at death of parent against whose estate maintenance is made charge.

Where a decree has been entered in a divorce proceeding, pursuant to Civ. Code, § 138-140, providing for maintenance during minority, such decree is a continuing one and does not abate by death of parent against whose estate maintenance is made a charge.

5. Divorce ⚡293—To charge estate of father with maintenance of child, there must have been action for divorce and entry of final judgment therein.

The right to compel a father to support minor infant under Civ. Code, §§ 138-140, and remedies afforded thereby, are dependent upon an action for divorce and final judgment therein, and do not exist and cannot be enforced if by death of one of parents divorce proceedings abate prior to entry of judgment.

6. Descent and distribution ⚡1—Duty to public precedes enjoyment of bounty by devisees or heirs.

Duty to public precedes mere enjoyment of a bounty by devisees or heirs.

7. Descent and distribution ⚡1—Succession and transmission of property matter of legislative grant and not natural right.

The succession or transmission of property is a matter of legislative grant and not merely a natural right, and any property so taken may be charged by Legislature with any burden it may impose.

8. Executors and administrators ⚡429—Statutes giving right to sue estate of father for maintenance of child held not to be incorporated in statute relating to suit against father for maintenance of illegitimate child.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1428, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 26 and 1493, right to sue an administrator or executor of an estate, as provided in Civ. Code, § 205, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1582, 1584, is a privilege extended by Legislature, and necessarily excludes all actions not mentioned, and hence, even though a correct construction of such statutes gives counties right to subject parent's estate to support and maintenance of minor child when he is about to become a public charge, it does not permit reading into Civ. Code, § 196a, relating to suit against father for maintenance of illegitimate child, similar grant of authority, as language of section 196a contains no provisions affecting estate of deceased person.

9. Bastards ⚡19—Proceedings relating to illegitimate children and their support legal and not equitable in nature.

Proceedings under Civ. Code, § 196a, relating to support of illegitimate children by putative father, are legal and not equitable in character.

10. Bastards ⚡31—At common law proceeding against father for maintenance of illegitimate child abated at death of father.

Under the common law, proceedings against putative father to compel maintenance of illegitimate child abated upon the death of putative father.

11. Bastards ⚡31—Common-law rule that action against father for maintenance of illegitimate child abates at father's death has not been changed.

The common-law rule that proceedings against putative father to require maintenance of illegitimate child abate on death of putative father has not been changed, and hence a proceeding under Civ. Code, § 196a, abates at death of father.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by Jack Myers, by May Vaughn, guardian ad litem, against Tennent Harrington, administrator of the estate of Edward B. Myers, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred C. Peterson, of San Francisco (Alfred J. Hennessy, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Atran & Sheets, of Colusa, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This action is based upon section 196a of the Civil Code, and is prosecuted for the purpose of securing a judgment or decree providing for the maintenance of an illegitimate minor child out of the estate left by its putative father. A demurrer filed by the defendants to the plaintiff's complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and from the judgment entered, following the sustaining of the demurrer, the plaintiff appeals.

The allegations of the complaint are to the effect that the plaintiff, Jack Myers, is an illegitimate child of Edward B. Myers and one Norine Vaughn; that the said Edward B. Myers died testate prior to the birth of the plaintiff herein; that, by the last will and testament of said Edward B. Myers, all of his estate, both real and personal, was devised to the defendant Jake Myers; that the mother of the plaintiff, Norine Vaughn, is without means to furnish the plaintiff adequate support, maintenance, and education suitable to his station in life, and that the sum of $100 per month is necessary for said purpose, and that a charge should be placed upon the estate of the said Edward B. Myers, payable out of the same, until the said minor shall have reached the age of majority. A detailed description of the real estate left by the said Edward B. Myers at the time of his death is set forth in the complaint.

While the argument of counsel in this case has been both learned and interesting, a decision of the questions involved rests almost entirely upon the provisions of the Codes. Section 196a, Civil Code, relating to the support of an illegitimate child, reads:

"The father as well as the mother, of an illegitimate child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. A civil suit to enforce such obligations may be maintained in behalf of a minor illegitimate child, by his mother or guardian, and in such action the court shall have power to order and enforce performance thereof, the same as under sections 138, 139 and 140 of the Civil Code, in a suit for divorce by a wife."

Section 138 of the Civil Code, referred to in section 196a, empowers the court, during the pendency of an action for divorce, or at the final hearing thereof, or at any time thereafter during the minority of the child of the marriage, to make such order for the custody, care, education, maintenance, and support of such minor child as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time modify or vacate the same. Section 139 is similar in purport as to the power of the court to provide for maintenance. Section 140, Civil Code, relates to procedure, and also to the remedies which may be adopted to enforce the judgment or decree of the court by providing for the giving of security, the appointment of a receiver, or by other remedy applicable to the case. Section 205 of the Civil Code has for its purpose the enforcing of maintenance of minor children. It reads:

"If a parent chargeable with the support of a child dies, leaving it chargeable to the county, and leaving an estate sufficient for its support, the supervisors of the county may claim provision for its support from the parent's estate by civil action, and for this purpose may have the same remedies as any creditors against that estate, and against the heirs, devisees, and next of kin of the parent."

[1-3] Section 200 of the Civil Code is also called to our attention, but the fact that the mother of an illegitimate, unmarried minor is entitled to its custody, services, and earnings does not, we think, have any particular bearing upon the obligation imposed by section 196a, Civil Code. Prior to the adoption of this last-mentioned section there was no legal obligation resting upon the father of an illegitimate child to furnish it support or give it an education. In 1913, however, the Legislature of this state added this section to the Code and thenceforth it became the mutual obligation of both the father and mother. In the enforcing of the obligation, it is, of course, necessary to establish the fact of parentage. The section fixing this obligation upon the father of an illegitimate child does not, in and of itself, presuppose that a judgment decreeing the fact of parentage must first be had and obtained before any suit may be maintained for maintenance or support. There appears to be no valid reason why the fact of parentage and the question of the necessity of support and, also, of the ability to support may not all be litigated and determined in one proceeding. In other words, if the action can be maintained provided for under the terms of section 196a, all the facts and circumstances necessary to support a judgment or decree for maintenance and support may be inquired into and determined, and the enforcement thereafter of the judgment depends entirely upon the rights and interests which the illegitimate minor has acquired in and to the property of his putative father, and the liens or charges upon and against the property of the putative father that may have been adjudged and decreed.

In divorce proceedings and the remedies there provided which are made applicable to actions seeking maintenance for illegitimate children, it has frequently been held that the power of the court is a continuing one until the minor child of which the court has jurisdiction requires no further aid or payment out of a parent's property, and it seems that this power does not necessarily terminate with the death of the parent whose property has been charged with such support. In Stone v. Bayley, 75 Wash. 184, 134 P. 820, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 429, the Supreme Court of Washington, in considering the statute of that state, which authorizes courts in divorce proceedings to make provisions for minor children, thus expresses its views:

"This statute clearly recognizes the power of the court to burden the property for the benefit of children. Under this statute we have repeatedly held that jurisdiction of the court was a continuing one 'so long as there is a minor child whose maintenance and welfare are provided for in the decree.' Poland v. Poland, 63 Wash. 597, 116 P. 2; Fickett v. Fickett, 39 Wash. 38, 80 P. 1134; Dyer v. Dyer, 65 Wash. 535, 118 P. 634. The power of the court is not confined to the imposition of a mere personal claim. King v. Miller, 10 Wash. 274, 38 P. 1020. In the absence of statutory inhibition, it is the general rule that such provisions for support do not necessarily terminate upon the father's death. 'A decree directing a father to provide for the support of his minor children until the further order of the court is not necessarily discharged by his death.'"

[4] The opinion of the Supreme Court of Washington is a learned and comprehensive one, fully supported by the authorities stated, and clearly establishes the rule that, when a decree has been entered providing for maintenance during minority, it is a continuing one and does not abate simply by the death of the parent against whose estate such maintenance is made a charge. The very terms of section 140 of the Civil Code include the idea of making provision for a continuing period by the requirement of the giving of security, or the appointment of a receiver, or by other remedy applicable. To the same effect is the rule laid down in section 309, Ruling Case Law, page 484, where it is stated:

"There is no sound reason why the estate of a father should not be charged with the obligation to provide support for his minor children after his death," etc.

[5] These remedies, however, are attendant upon the prosecution of an action for divorce and the entry of final judgment therein. "It is well settled that an action for divorce does not survive the death of either party." 1 Cal. Jur. p. 74, § 44. In such event, other provisions of the Code must be relied upon whenever maintenance is sought for minor children. The various provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the maintenance of the widow and minor children, or of the minor children, are the only ones which are peculiarly and particularly enforceable by and on the part of those directly interested, and for whose support and maintenance allowances or money payments are sought.

Our attention has been called to another section of the Civil Code, which, under certain contingencies, gives certain public authorities the right to prosecute actions for support of minor children. We refer to section 205 of the Civil Code, supra. It would seem that this section can only be invoked when the minor has become, or is about to become, a public charge, and has been left unprovided for by a deceased parent chargeable with its support. In this particular, we do not find that the Code makes any distinction between a legitimate and an illegitimate minor child, because, as we have seen, the first section of 196a charges the father as well as the mother with such support. The language is:

"The father as well as the mother, of an illegitimate child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances."

[6, 7] The word "must" is obligatory in its meaning and fixes the duty definitely, and under section 205, it would seem that unless the right is otherwise barred when such child has become, or is about to become, a public charge, the property of either one of the parents may be proceeded against for the purpose of reimbursing the public on account of the circumstances attendant on the support of such minor child. The section itself purports to reach out and give authority to take the estate of the deceased parent from the heirs, devisees, or next of kin. In other words, the duty to the public precedes the mere enjoyment of a bounty by devisees or heirs. It has been frequently held that succession or the transmission of property is a matter of legislative grant, and not merely a natural right, and hence it would follow that any property so taken may be charged by the Legislature with any burden that the wisdom of the Legislature may impose. The section with which we are dealing, however, is limited in its terms as to who may prosecute such an action. It will be observed that this right or privilege is given to the supervisors of the county and not to any one coming under the terms and provisions of section 196a of the Civil Code. Section 196a does not purport to reach out and charge any decedent's estate in its operation and effect. This is given by sections 138, 139, and 140 of the Civil Code, which are made applicable to the enforcement of section 196a, and, therefore, to the extent that they limit and circumscribe the power of the court, the power of the court coming under section 196a is likewise limited and circumscribed. These sections, as we have seen, and by the authorities which we have cited, make the rights dependent upon, and the enforcement of such rights dependent upon the entry of a decree of final divorce, and do not exist and cannot be enforced if, by the death of one of the parents, the divorce proceedings abate prior to the entry of judgment.

[8] With these considerations in view, we come next to section 1582 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to suits against executors and personal representatives. That section reads:

"Actions for the recovery of any property, real or personal, or for the possession thereof, or to quiet title thereto, or to determine any adverse claim thereon, and all actions founded upon contracts, may be maintained by and against executors and administrators in all cases in which the same might have been maintained by or against their respective testators or intestates."

Section 1584, Code of Civil Procedure, also permits any person or his personal representative to maintain an action against the executor or administrator of any one, who, in his lifetime, has wasted, destroyed, taken or carried away or converted to his own use the goods or chattels of any person, or committed any trespass on real estate of such person.

Section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure specifies that all claims arising upon contract, whether due or contingent, etc., must be presented for allowance. These sections of the Code of Civil Procedure are the only ones authorizing persons or their personal representatives to maintain actions against executors or administrators. If the action does not arise upon contract, and is not one for waste or trespass, then it must have for its basis the enforcement of some specific lien or charge against the property of the deceased which is not cut off or released by the death of the person whose estate it is sought to make liable for the satisfaction of such lien or charge. If such lien or charge does not exist, these sections of the Code do not provide for their creation and subsequent enforcement. Section 196a, Civ. Code, declares a duty and then provides for the enforcement of the obligation. Section 1428 of the Civil Code divides obligations into two classes: (1) One arising upon the contract of the parties; and (2) one arising by operation of law. Either of these obligations are enforceable by civil action. Section 26 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in relation to obligations, reads: "An obligation is a legal duty, by which one person is bound to do or not to do a certain thing, and arises from: 1 Contract; or, 2. Operation of law." In limiting the kind of actions on obligations which may be prosecuted against executors or administrators, the right to sue is awarded only upon actions founded upon contracts, and nothing is said in relation to allowing such actions which arise only by operation of law. The granting of a right to sue an administrator or executor is a privilege extended by the Legislature and we think that when the Legislature sets forth what actions may be prosecuted, it necessarily excludes all those not mentioned.

The fact that section 205 of the Civil Code and section 1582 of the Code of Civil Procedure became the law of this state at the time the Codes were adopted, and therefore are to be read together in ascertaining the intent of the Legislature and the powers granted, do not in any wise add to the provisions of section 196a of the Civil Code. That section gives a substantive right, and at the same time incorporates three sections of the same Code in providing remedies, or the manner of enforcing the granted rights. Thus, even though the correct construction of section 205, Civil Code, and section 1582, Code of Civil Procedure, gives to the counties acting through boards of supervisors the right to subject a parent's estate to the support and maintenance of a minor child when he is about to become a public charge, or has become a public charge, it does not permit the reading into section 196a, Civil Code, of a similar grant of authority, when the language of that section contains no provisions affecting the estate of a deceased person similar to those found in section 205, Civil Code. There are certain cases decided by the Supreme Court of Indiana which uphold the right of an illegitimate child to maintain an action similar to the instant case after the death of the putative father, but these decisions are all founded upon section 22 of the act of 1852 of that state (2 Rev. St. 1852, p. 490), which reads:

"In case of the death of the putative father of such child, either before or after the commencement of prosecution, * * * the right of action shall survive and may be prosecuted against the personal representative of the deceased with like effect as if such father were living."

Our attention has been called to the cases of Major v. Walker, 23 Cal. App. 465, 138 P. 360, and Lininger v. Bostford, 32 Cal. App. 386, 163 P. 63, where the actions were held maintainable against the stockholders in a corporation for and on account of liabilities incurred through torts committed by the corporation. These cases, however, hold that the liability is in the nature of a contract; that the Constitution of the state and the acts of the Legislature relating to the liability of stockholders constitute a part of the contract entered into by the stockholder whenever he purchases certificates of stock in a corporation, and, being in the nature of actions ex contractu do not abate and may be prosecuted under the express terms of section 1582, Code of Civil Procedure, and the estates of deceased stockholders held liable for their proportionate share of the liability of the corporation of which they were members, even though the liability arises out of the tort committed by the corporation. In Clark v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 527, 150 P. 357, L. R. A. 1915A, 1142, the court considered the question of whether an action could be maintained which sounded in tort after the death of the wrongdoer, the action being founded upon section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, and it was there held that upon the death of the wrongdoer the action abated, and also that section 385, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the survival of actions, did not change the common-law rule as to the survival of causes of action and that where the cause dies with the death of the wrongdoer, there is no survival, unless expressly so provided by statute.

[9] It has been strongly argued that the proceeding relating to illegitimate children and the requiring of support thereof by the putative father are equitable in character by reason of the powers which the court having to do with such cases may exercise. But the real gravamen of the charge is a pure legal question. The fact of parentage and then the obligation for the support of the child, after this fact is established, is also a pure legal provision of the Civil Code, as found in section 196a. It is true that, after all the legal facts have been established and found, the court, in the enforcement of the judgment reached, after the entry of such judgment, exercises certain equitable powers, does not, in our opinion, change the purely statutory character of the action and of the obligation imposed.

[10] The proceeding under our Civil Code is a modified form of the bastardy proceedings which were punitive in character and subsisted prior to the creation of the civil remedies which we have been here considering. Under the common law, all such proceedings abate upon the death of the putative father. Considering this subject, we find in 1 Ruling Case Law, p. 40, § 37, the rule of the common law set forth as follows:

"Such proceedings will not survive against the personal representatives of the alleged father who dies pending the proceeding, in the absence of a statute to the contrary. The proposition finds no favor at the common law, and there is no fitness in the proceeding which would adapt itself to the principle of survivorship, it being criminal in form and an extraordinary means to compel a father to assist in the support of his illegitimate child or suffer imprisonment as a penalty for his neglect to do so."

Other objections are set forth including the questionable policy of permitting a living woman to swear the paternity of her illegitimate offspring upon a person whose lips are closed in death.

An early case on this subject of abatement is that of McKenzie v. Lombard, 85 Me. 224, 27 A. 110. The Supreme Court of Maine there said:

"The question here is whether a bastardy proceeding survives against the personal representatives of a respondent who has died during the pendency of the proceeding in court before a trial has been had. We feel strongly assured that it cannot survive. The proposition finds no favor in the common law, and there is no statutory provision authorizing it. * * * The process, though held to be a civil proceeding, is criminal in form, and is an extraordinary means to compel a father to assist in the support of his illegitimate child, or suffer imprisonment as a penalty for his neglect to do so."

It is true the court also there said that no judgment was sought for or was obtainable against property, which is not the case under our Codes, but the nature of the action is the same, and differs only in the remedies provided. This case was followed by the Supreme Court of Michigan in People v. Kemppainen, 163 Mich. 186, 128 N. W. 183, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1166. In the notes appended to this case we find that the North Carolina Supreme Court, the only other state where the precise question seems to have been presented, follows the same rule. Where the rule of the common law in relation to the abatement of such proceedings is not followed so far as we have been able to ascertain, it is because the statutes of the states have provided for survival of such actions and the prosecution thereof against personal representatives for the purpose of subjecting the estate of the deceased to the support of the illegitimate child.

[11] We find nothing in the acts of the Legislature of this state which leads us to the conclusion that the common-law rule as to the abatement of such proceedings upon the death of the putative father has been changed. It is for the Legislature and not the court to modify the harshness of the common law in this particular. The judgment of the trial court is hereby affirmed.

WARD-LEWIS LUMBER CO. v. MAHONY.
(Civ. 4590.)

1. Carriers ⇐56—Mere indorsement of non-negotiable bill of lading does not give transferee additional right.

Mere indorsement of nonnegotiable bill of lading does not give transferee additional right, in view of Civ. Code, § 2129b, and sections 2127a, 2127b.

2. Sales ⇐161—Shipment under unindorsed nonnegotiable bill of lading, consigned to shipper, held not delivery to buyer.

In action for breach of contract to purchase lath ordered for March delivery and shipped during such month, under a straight, unindorsed, nonnegotiable bill of lading, consigned to shipper and reaching destination April 6, held that there was no delivery in March or at all, title not passing to the buyer under such bill of lading but remaining in the shipper, in view of Civ. Code, § 2129b.

3. Sales ⇐176(3)—Buyer's right to object to nontransference of bills of lading held not waived by refusal to accept goods on other grounds.

Where buyer of lath refused to accept them because not shipped in time, he did not thereby waive his right to object that the bills of lading had not been transferred so as to enable him to obtain possession of the goods, Civ. Code, § 1501, and Code Civ. Proc. § 2076, not applying, question not being one of mode of performance but of total failure to deliver.

4. Sales ⇐378—Defense of nondelivery held sufficiently pleaded.

In seller's action for breach of contract to purchase lath, answer held sufficiently to plead defense of nondelivery where it denied that plaintiff delivered any lath in the state of the seller's domicile or elsewhere during the month set for delivery, or at all.

5. Sales ⇐161—"Delivery" of consigned goods requires transfer of possession so as to entitle buyer to demand goods from carrier.

"Delivery" to buyer of consigned goods must be such a transfer of the possession as will remove the goods from the dominion of the seller and entitle the buyer to demand the same from the carrier.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the Ward-Lewis Lumber Company against Andrew F. Mahony, doing business as the Andrew F. Mahony Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel T. Bush, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thacher & Wright and Harrison A. Jones, all of San Francisco (Thomas A. Thacher, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract, wherein the defendant refused to accept and pay for two carloads of laths which, it is claimed, he agreed to purchase from plaintiff. The trial was had before the court sitting with a jury. At the conclusion of the evidence the jury, under the direction of the court, returned a verdict in favor of defendant, and judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiff has appealed.

The respondent seeks to sustain said verdict and judgment upon two principal grounds, namely, the alleged failure of appellant to prove a delivery of the laths within the period of time fixed by the agreement, or at all, and that no valid contract was established.

At the time this transaction took place the corporation appellant, Ward-Lewis Lumber Company, was engaged in the wholesale lumber business at Portland, Oregon. The respondent Andrew F. Mahony, was sole proprietor of the Andrew F. Mahony Lumber Company, and was doing business under that fictitious name. J. C. McCabe and F. J. Heaphey were originally made parties defendant herein upon the assumption that they also were members of the firm of Andrew F. Mahony Lumber Company, but as against them the action was subsequently dismissed. Gritzmacher and Johnson of San Francisco, were lumber jobbers, operating through a representative in Portland, Oregon, named F. W. McCoy. On February 1, 1920, McCoy delivered to appellant in Portland an order from Gritzmacher and Johnson for three carloads of laths, calling for "March delivery. * * * Price f. o. b. cars del'd. on 25c rate. * * * Price: $16.25 delivered by rail on 25c rate." The shipping directions were: "Ship to Andrew F. Mahony Lumber Co. Sacramento, Calif. Notify same Fife Bldg., San Francisco. Send invoice to Same. Address Fife Bldg., San Francisco, Calif. Make shipment March delivery." A carbon copy of said order was sent to respondent by Gritzmacher and Johnson. On February 3, 1920, appellant sent an acknowledgment of said order by mail to respondent as follows:

"Acknowledgment of Order.

"Ward-Lewis Lumber Co. Wholesale Lumber, Northwestern Bank Building, Portland, Oregon.

"February 3, 1920.

"Our order 269.

"Salesman G. & J., by F. W. McCoy.

"Invoice to Andrew F. Mahony Lumber Co., San Francisco, Calif.

"Freight rate, 25c.

"Consign to same, Sacramento, Calif.

"Terms regular.

"Route S. P. F. o. b. cars, 25c rate.

"We are entering your order as follows: Please check same carefully and if not correct notify us immediately.

"3 cars 1½" No. 1 fir lath.

"Price: $16.25.

"For March delivery."

Stamped: "It is expressly agreed that any advance in freight rates for government tax on freight to be paid by consignee. Ward-Lewis Lumber Co., by A. G. L."

On February 25th Gritzmacher and Johnson, with the consent of respondent, modified said order as to the shipment of one carload of said laths, their letter to appellant in this respect stating:

"Will you please ship first car on this order and as early as possible to the San Leandro Mill & Lumber Company, San Leandro, Cal., invoicing same to us instead of to Andrew F. Mahony Lumber Company, as we have arranged with them to handle the car."

They also urged appellant to advance the shipping date of all three cars if possible, saying:

"We would be very glad to get them off our hands while the market here is in good shape, as we are somewhat fearful of a drop."

On February 28th Gritzmacher and Johnson again wrote to appellant giving directions as to the shipment of the remaining two cars, as follows:

"Please ship the other two cars to J. P. Muller, Sacramento, California, for diversion, invoicing same to Andrew F. Mahony Lumber Company as originally instructed."

Appellant, in a letter dated March 3, acknowledged receipt of the two letters last mentioned, stating they would make the corrections in the order as requested. On March 11, respondent telegraphed appellant as follows:

"Our customer cancels lath order with us so do not ship more than sixty thousand pieces to each car."

To which appellant replied, by letter, dated March 12th, saying:

"Will endeavor to ship you as small cars as possible on each of the cars of lath, which we have going out to you some time this month."

On March 31st respondent telegraphed appellant as follows:

"Gritzmacher advises two cars lath shipped third car being shipped to-day our order accepted for March delivery not March shipment will not accept lath now."

Answering appellant sent respondent the following telegram:

"Replying your wire thirty first car C & E I shipped March twenty seventh Car C & S one three three two five shipped thirtieth both to apply or order two six nine Both shipments with bills of lading endorsed over to your customer which constitutes delivery. Will not accept cancellation."

On April 2, 1920, respondent received by mail the bills of lading for the two carloads of laths and immediately thereupon telegraphed appellant, saying:

"Replying your wire April first Refuse to accept lath shipped in car C & E I shipped March twenty seventh car C and S one three three two five shipped thirtieth ordered for March delivery and not March shipment. Returning bill lading to you by mail."

[1, 2] Appellant telegraphed in reply that it had referred the matter to Pacific Coast shippers' association and that if it, appellant, was within its rights it would expect respondent to take the laths; otherwise it would make other disposition of them. Both carloads of laths arrived in Sacramento on April 6, 1920, and were later disposed of to other parties under the direction of appellant for prices much lower than those fixed in the Mahony contract. The evidence further shows, however, that the laths were not shipped to respondent, nor to his order, but were consigned to appellant, Ward-Lewis Lumber Company, Sacramento, Cal., under straight nonnegotiable bills of lading, approved standard form of the interstate commerce commission, and there is no evidence whatever in the record to show that either bill of lading was ever transferred, or indorsed in any manner, by appellant to respondent. It would therefore appear that said laths were never released from appellant's possession or control; and therein we think, lies the fatal weakness of appellant's case.

Section 2127a of the Civil Code provides that a carrier is justified in delivering goods to one who is lawfully entitled to the possession of the same, or to the consignee named in a nonnegotiable bill for the goods, or to a person in possession of a negotiable bill, under the terms of which the goods are deliverable to his order, or which has been indorsed to him, or in blank by the consignee, etc. The section following, 2127b, fixes the liability of the carrier for a misdelivery. Section 2129b of the same code provides that a bill may be transferred by the holder by delivery, accompanied with an agreement, express or implied, to transfer the title to the bill, or to the goods represented thereby; but that a nonnegotiable bill cannot be negotiated, and the indorsement of such a bill gives the transferee no additional right. The only method, therefore, by which respondent might have obtained possession of the laths, was by proper transfer of the bills of lading by appellant, as required by said section 2129b of the Civil Code, and as already stated, no transfer or indorsement of any kind was ever made. It is true the telegram from appellant to respondent, dated April 1, 1920, stated, " * * * Both shipments with bills of lading indorsed over to your customer which constitutes delivery * * *;" but the statements contained in that telegram cannot be accepted as proof of the fact of indorsement and if they were, mere indorsement of a nonnegotiable bill of lading would be ineffectual, and would confer upon the transferee no additional right. Section 2129b, Civ. Code, supra.

It is also true that the record discloses that the original bills of lading could not be produced at the trial, because the same were surrendered to the railroad company by appellant at the time the laths were finally taken from the cars and sold to other parties, and that in order to prove the contents thereof appellant accepted copies made and produced by respondent. Nevertheless, those copies wholly failed to show a transfer or any indorsement, and proof aliunde was not offered upon the subject. Under those circumstances, respondent was not entitled to nor could he have obtained the possession of said laths from the railroad company upon the arrival of the cars in Sacramento on April 6, 1920. For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that appellant failed to establish a valid tender or delivery of said laths to respondent, either within the period of time fixed by the contract, or at all, and that the directed verdict and the judgment must be sustained upon that ground.

[3] Regarding this same point, further contention is made by appellant that respondent waived his right to object to the nontransfer of said bills of lading because his refusal to accept said laths was placed upon other grounds and that consequently appellant was given no opportunity to consummate the transfer (Civ. Code, § 1501; Code Civ. Proc., § 2076); also, that no such defense was pleaded. We believe the rule contended for by appellant is not applicable here for the reason that the question presented here is not one of the "mode of performance" of the contract, such as is mentioned in code sections cited, but one of a total failure to make delivery of goods sold; moreover, it would have been unavailing to appellant even if it had been granted further time to consummate the transfer of said bills, because when said bills were received by respondent, on April 2, 1920, the time fixed by the contract within which to make delivery had already expired.

[4] The defense of nondelivery was sufficiently pleaded, the answer, in this respect, having denied that appellant delivered two or any carloads of laths to defendant in Oregon, or elsewhere during March, 1920, or at all. The case of Briggs & Turivas v. Pacific Trading Co. (Cal. Sup.) 223 P. 949, cited by appellant, is clearly distinguishable from the one before us. There the vendor was holding the goods at the request of the vendee, subject to the receipt of further shipping instructions, which, the court held, excused delivery within the period of time fixed by the contract. In the case at bar, although respondent's telegram of March 11, 1920, stated that his customer had canceled his order, it did not indicate that appellant should await further shipping instructions, the only request therein made being that small carloads be shipped. Appellant doubtless so understood the telegram, because it immediately telegraphed in reply:

"Will endeavor to ship you as small cars as possible on each of the three cars of lath which we have going out to you some time this month."

The parties are also disagreed as to whether the contract called for March delivery in Portland, or March delivery in Sacramento. The determination of that question would seem to be immaterial, however, for the reason that under either construction a delivery is not shown. If March delivery in Portland was required by the contract, the laths at that point were in the exclusive possession and under the absolute control of appellant, the same having been deposited with the railroad company under nonnegotiable bills of lading consigned to appellant; and if March delivery in Sacramento was contemplated, the evidence shows that the laths arrived there on April 6, 1920, not only too late for March delivery, but at that point they were still in the possession and under the control of appellant under said nonnegotiable bills of lading.

[5] By virtue of section 2129e of said code (Civ. Code) the transferee of a nonnegotiable bill, after notice of transfer to the carrier, becomes the direct obligee of whatever obligations the carrier owed to the transferor immediately before such notification; but prior to the notification the title to the goods, and the right to acquire the obligation of the carrier, may be defeated by garnishment, attachment or execution upon the goods by a creditor of the transferor, or by notice of a subsequent sale. Applying the provisions of said code section to the circumstances under which the laths in question were consigned, and bearing in mind the principle of law that delivery to the buyer must be such a transfer of the possession as will remove the goods from the dominion of the seller and entitle the purchaser to demand the same from the carrier (35 Cyc. 195), it becomes manifest that at no time was there a valid tender or delivery of said laths.

Inasmuch as the verdict and the judgment must be sustained upon the ground of nondelivery, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question of the validity of the contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF SAN PEDRO et al.
v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA
IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY
et al. (Civ. 4772.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Jan. 30, 1925.)

1. Jury ⇨13(18) — Cross-complaint in law, setting up equitable matters of affirmative defense, changes action to suit in equity.

Where, in an action at law, equitable matters are alleged by defendant which are not merely defensive, but are matters of affirmative attack, controversy is thereby changed from an action at law to a suit in equity, and issue thereon is triable by court and not by jury.

2. Mandamus ⇨4(3)—Mandamus will not lie to compel trial court to limit retrial in conformity with remittitur of Supreme Court.

Assuming that action of lower court in permitting defendant, in action at law, to file amended pleadings setting up affirmative equitable defense, and determining issues as in an equitable action, would be in violation of terms of remittitur on prior appeal, they are but errors which the trial court could commit and under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, plaintiffs are not entitled to writ of mandamus, since there is an adequate remedy by appeal.

Application for writ of mandate by the First National Bank of San Pedro and another to be directed to the Superior Court of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and Walton J. Wood, a Judge thereof, to compel respondents to proceed with trial of a certain cause. Denied.

Richard C. Goodspeed and Goodspeed & Pendell, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Fredericks & Hanna and Kenton A. Miller, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. There is pending in respondent court, before respondent judge, a certain cause entitled First National Bank of San Pedro v. Stansbury. This case will in this opinion be referred to as the action and the plaintiff therein will be referred to as the bank. The trial of the action was commenced before a jury, the fees of the jury having been paid by the bank, when, upon motion of Stansbury, respondent judge discharged the jury and appointed a referee to ascertain certain facts involved in the action, and to make report thereof to the court. Thereupon the bank and one John Balch, whose interest in the action will later appear, presented to this court their petition for a writ of mandate in the present proceeding. The petition prays that respondents be commanded to proceed with the trial of the action before a jury and to vacate the order of reference. An alternative writ issued and we are now to determine whether a peremptory writ shall go forth. The only question presented is as to the sufficiency of the petition for the writ, as the only return made by respondents is by demurrer.

The complaint in the action, composed of two counts, seeks to recover upon that number of promissory notes, each dated December 16, 1916, a cause of action upon the respective notes being alleged in the respective counts. The pleading is in the ordinary form which is characteristic of complaints in such actions. It is alleged particularly, however, that Stansbury made and executed the notes to Balch and that the latter indorsed them to the bank. Stansbury, after disposition was made of his original responses to the complaint in the action, filed an amended answer thereto and an amended cross-complaint. We proceed to state some of the allegations of these pleadings, omitting from each certain portions thereof which were eliminated upon demurrer thereto presented to respondent court. The amended answer denies that the note set up in the first count of the complaint was by Balch indorsed to the bank. It is also denied that Stansbury owes the amount of the note or any part thereof, and denial is also made of the allegations of the complaint upon which the bank asks for judgment for attorneys' fees for being compelled to sue upon the note. Denials similar to all of these are interposed as to the allegations of the complaint concerning the second note sued on. The amended answer also contains extensive statements of affirmative defense to the allegations of both counts of the complaint. It is alleged that some time prior to 1911 Balch and one Radich were partners in the cement contracting business; that, being financially involved and desiring to secure financial assistance, they made an arrangement with Stansbury whereby he was admitted into the partnership upon terms which were advantageous to all, Stansbury being particularly charged with the duty of collecting certain amounts due from various persons to Balch and Radich under their earlier operations; that, also, the new partnership was to carry on a business under new contracts similar to that formerly conducted by the original partnership; that the new, or three-way, partnership did thereafter complete work under certain new contracts; that an adjustment and settlement was made between them with the result that it was determined that Stansbury was indebted to Balch in a certain sum; that during 1911, or a short time prior to "the closing up of the aforesaid partnerships," Balch solicited Stansbury to join him in a new partnership without Radich for the purpose of conducting a more extensive business than that conducted by the three-way partnership; that pursuant to that solicitation Stansbury advanced money with which to make a settlement with Radich and entered into a partnership with Balch alone; that this last-mentioned partnership completed many contracts aggregating in contract price about $200,000 or more; that Stansbury advanced various large sums of money with which to conduct the operations of the partnership existing between Balch and him; that Balch "kept the time book of labor and pay roll of the partnership and purchased much material and many of the accounts were handled by him alone"; that at no time during the existence of the partnership was any accounting taken nor was there any settlement of the partnership affairs between Balch and Stansbury; that at all times during the existence of the partnership there were outstanding large amounts of indebtedness owing by the partnership and large amounts were due and owing to the partnership; "that all accounts as to the cost of the various contracts were largely kept by the said Balch"; that contracting jobs would often overlap each other and it was therefore difficult from time to time to strike a balance between the partners, or to make an accurate audit of the accounts of the partnership; and that on or about August 28, 1915, and during extensive existing operations of the partnership, Stansbury having insufficient accounts of its operations, Balch applied to Stansbury "and requested that they make an estimate of the state of their affairs." Various allegations then appear which tend to show the inability of Stansbury, on account of the lack of data in his hands, to arrive at a correct estimate of the partnership affairs, and the inability of both Balch and Stansbury, without the aid of accountants, to come to an understanding of their financial relations and situation.

It is next alleged that "it was then agreed between said partners that any accounting then taken or statement made was to be regarded only as an estimate and tentative, and not to be considered in any manner as accurate or definite, but solely and only as a general estimate of the profits or losses and of how the affairs of said partnership were progressing" and "that thereafter an accurate accounting would be taken of all of their business affairs by a proper accountant"; that upon that understanding "the said partners made a general statement of their estimated profits, which said estimate statement on said date showed a sum of $21,724.44," and was given by Balch to Stansbury, but was based upon insufficient and erroneous data and was erroneously made, "was unreliable, freighted with gross errors, mistakes and miscalculations on each job, which tainted the entire account, all of which mistakes were mutual and were not known to the parties and not considered or taken into account in said statement"; that Balch thereafter fraudulently and in violation of the understanding between them sought to urge the statement thus made between them as final and conclusive, having secretly intended at the time of the making of the statement so to do. Specific facts are alleged which tend to exhibit the fraudulent intent of Balch in the respects just stated. It is then alleged that, pending an illness of Stansbury after the alleged "settlement," Balch represented to him that, in connection with certain uncompleted "jobs" under contracts held by the partnership, he (Balch) "could use said Stansbury's notes at" the bank, "and that if said Stansbury would execute and deliver to him four promissory notes covering the balance of said estimated profits of August 28, 1915, * * * said tentative balance would be regarded as no different than as theretofore, but that he, said Balch, could secure money from the said bank * * * and use the said notes so to be executed by said Stansbury as collateral security therefor * * *"; and "that pursuant to said request it was agreed between the partners to, and said Stansbury did, execute said notes herein sued on, with the understanding and agreement at said time that said notes should not be treated in any manner different from said estimated statement, or in any manner to be asserted by said Balch against said Stansbury. * * *"

Many and voluminous other allegations are contained in the amended answer, including an allegation that the notes sued on are held by the bank solely for the purpose of collection for the benefit of Balch, but it is unnecessary here to set them forth, as enough has been shown to exhibit the nature of the defense made by Stansbury to the complaint. The prayer of the amended answer is that the notes sued on be canceled; that an accounting be taken of the affairs of the partnership existing between Balch and Stansbury; that the partnership be terminated and settled and judgment be decreed for any indebtedness found due from one partner to the other; that Stansbury have his costs; and that he have any further relief to which he may be entitled. The matters alleged in the amended answer are in substance repeated in the cross-complaint and the prayer of the latter pleading is in substance the same as that of the other.

Upon the showing of the record, which is thus far disclosed, there appears to be no question that the bank was not entitled to a jury trial of the action. In its inception there is no doubt that the cause was a simple action at law upon promissory notes, the right to a jury trial if the controversy had maintained that form being equally undoubted. But observe the change in the situation which arose upon the filing of Stansbury's amended pleadings. The litigation was then transmuted into a suit in equity for a partnership accounting and for the termination of the partnership relation. From that moment the controversy over the notes, launched by the filing of the complaint, became a mere incident in the larger controversy brought forward by the amended pleadings of Stansbury. Of that larger controversy the question of the very integrity of the notes became a part. The question whether the bank, the mere agent of Balch in bringing the action, shall have judgment on the notes is swallowed by the broader question of accounting and partnership termination. The controversy as to the notes becomes but an item in the question of accounting. In thus stating the effect of the filing of Stansbury's amended pleadings we assume that it is proper practice for him to press the allegations presented in both the answer and the cross-complaint, for the petitioners make no point that it is not.

[1] The estimate which we have placed upon the situation created by the filing of Stansbury's pleadings is well justified by the authorities. It is possible that when, in an action at law, equitable matters are set up in an answer purely as a defense, that is, with no demand for affirmative relief, the controversy is not thereby changed from an action at law to a suit in equity. 35 C. J. 174. And as bearing somewhat upon the principle announced, see Lewis v. Tobias, 10 Cal. 574; Smith v. Sparrow, 13 Cal. 596; Shain v. Belvin, 79 Cal. 262, 21 P. 747. Where, however, the equitable matters alleged by the defendant are not merely defensive, but are matters of affirmative attack, the situation is quite different. It is said in a standard law publication that "if the answer contains not merely a technical defense but an independent equitable cause of action constituting a cross-demand in favor of defendant, the effect of which, if established, would extinguish plaintiff's cause of action, the issue taken thereon is triable by the court and not of right by a jury." 35 C. J. 175. This rule, apparently prevailing everywhere, has found adequate expression in the opinions of our own courts. It was said in a cause in which a cross-complaint praying equitable relief had been interposed in opposition to a complaint at law:

"Being an action cognizable in equity and distinct from the legal action, it was the duty of the court below to first determine the issues involved under the cross-complaint, for the reason that if the defendants succeeded on these issues it would defeat the right of plaintiffs to recover in their action at law, however perfect their legal right." Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 428, 12 P. 454.

And see, also, Swasey v. Adair, 88 Cal. 179, 25 P. 1119. We have no doubt that, under the conditions thus far considered, petitioners are not entitled to a jury trial of the action, except, perhaps, under the case last cited, in the event that the equitable relief prayed by Stansbury should be denied, the right to a jury trial thereafter may exist upon the few issues arising from the meager denials in the amended answer of allegations of the complaint. There is nothing in Kearney v. Bell, 160 Cal. 661, 117 P. 925, or in other cases relied upon by petitioners, which disturb our view upon the question.

[2] Are there other circumstances of the case which nullify the views above expressed? The action has been once tried and from the judgment entered pursuant to the trial an appeal was taken. The opinion rendered upon the appeal is to be found in the reported case, First National Bank v. Stansbury, 62 Cal. App. 336, 217 P. 91. Pursuant to this opinion a remittitur was sent down which reads, in part:

"That a new trial be had of the issues presented with relation to credits claimed by respondent [Stansbury] by reason of errors or omissions in the settlement of the said partnership affairs [between Balch and Stansbury] whereby respondent claims the amount of said notes should be reduced."

The amended pleadings filed by Stansbury, and which have been the subject of comment above, were filed, by leave of respondent court, after the remittitur went down, and the trial which was lately in progress before a jury and which it is the object of this proceeding to cause to be completed was the new trial mentioned in the remittitur. It is the contention of petitioners that we may in the present proceeding limit the new trial to the scope contemplated by the remittitur, granting for the moment that the issues framed by Stansbury's amended pleadings are beyond the lines thus set. It is said that if the new trial were to proceed within the lines laid by the remittitur Stansbury could present no more than matter defensive to the complaint, that such matter could not change the aspect of the action as one at law, and that therefore the bank is entitled to a jury trial. We cannot accede to these various views. The writ of mandate will issue only to compel "the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. The law does not, within the contemplation of this provision, specially enjoin respondents to proceed with the trial of the action in conformity with the directions of the remittitur, granting again that its terms were violated by the permission given to Stansbury to file his amended pleadings and that a further violation is threatened by an attempt to try the issues raised by them. Upon these assumptions the steps already taken, or which are threatened to be taken by respondents, are but errors which respondents have jurisdiction to commit and which cannot be corrected by the writ of mandate. In an action in which a trial court had denied a motion to enter a judgment of dismissal and in which it was sought to compel the court by the writ of mandate to enter such a judgment, it was said:

The alternative writ of mandate is vacated, and a peremptory writ is denied.

STOOPS v. PISTACHIO et al. (Civ. 4977.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 29, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1925.)

1. Pleading $\hookrightarrow$ 258(3)—Permitting amendment during trial setting up limitations held within court's discretion and not erroneous.

In suit to enjoin operation of irrigation ditch across plaintiff's land, where answer contained special denial and cross-complaint alleging adverse user for over five years, and praying that defendants' rights be quieted, held not erroneous to permit amendment during trial setting up statute of limitations; matter being within court's sound discretion, and evident purpose of amendment being to more effectively plead defenses already relied on and to conform to evidence.

2. Waters and water courses $\hookrightarrow$ 263—Evidence held not to sustain finding damage from ditch had not increased during five-year period.

In suit to enjoin operation of irrigation ditch across plaintiff's land, evidence held not to sustain finding that damage suffered had not increased during past five years, nor further finding that defendants had thereby gained prescriptive right to maintain ditch in present condition.

3. Action $\hookrightarrow$ 53(2)—Successive causes of action arise from continuing or recurring injury.

Where continuing or recurring injury results from wrongful act or from condition wrongfully created and maintained, separate and successive causes of actions arise when wrong is committed and when such damages are from time to time sustained.

4. Waters and water courses $\hookrightarrow$ 263—Injunction lies to prevent injury by water escaping from irrigation ditch.

Where property owner brings water upon his lands for purposes of irrigation and allows portion to escape so as to injure land of adjoining owner, he is not only liable in damages, but injunction will lie to prevent continuation of such injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Suit by Emma Stoops against T. Pistachio and others to enjoin maintenance and operation of ditch and for damages. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Geo. G. Graham, of Fresno, for appellant. Stanley Moffatt, of Fresno, for respondents.

"We do not think a mandamus will lie in this case. The real and substantial question presented for the decision of the court by the motion to dismiss was whether the defendant had set up a counterclaim against the plaintiffs upon which he was seeking affirmative relief. If he had not, the plaintiffs were undoubtedly entitled to the judgment which they asked, otherwise not. The solution of that question depended upon the judicial reading and construction of the defendant's answer and the stipulation between the parties, and the effect of the latter upon the former. It was claimed on the part of the plaintiffs, first, that the counterclaim made in the answer could not be legally made in the action; and, second, that the counterclaim had been withdrawn by the force and effect of the stipulation. Both of these propositions were denied by the defendant, and in deciding them the judge acted judicially, not ministerially; and, having decided them according to the best of his ability, a mandamus does not lie to compel him to reverse his decision and render a different one. (Chase v. Blackstone Canal Company, 10 Pick. 244; The People ex rel. Doughty v. Judges of Dutchess County, 20 Wend. 658.) This writ lies to compel a subordinate judicial tribunal to proceed and exercise its functions when it has neglected or refused to do so; but when the act to be done is judicial or discretionary the writ cannot direct what decision or judgment shall be rendered, nor can it be granted, after the inferior tribunal has acted, for the purpose of reviewing its decision. The People v. Sexton, 24 Cal. 79. If the court has committed an error in denying the plaintiffs' motion the same can be reviewed on appeal, which is a speedy and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law within the meaning of the four hundred and sixty-eighth section of the Practice Act. To review errors is not the office of the writ of mandamus." People v. Pratt, 28 Cal. 166, 87 Am. Dec. 110.

In view of the portion of this language relating to the adequacy of the remedy by appeal, it may be remarked that it is possible that in the strict sense the remedy of petitioners here by appeal is inadequate. It is, however, adequate in the sense that it is the only remedy allowable, and it is plain that it was in that sense that the language concerning the right of appeal in the cited opinion was used. Surely, the court there says that in such a case as the one with which it dealt there is no remedy by mandate, and the case exactly fits the present proceeding. The rule of People v. Pratt, supra, has been carried into other cases, the latest of which, apparently, is Ewell v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 232 P. 153.

TYLER, P. J. Action to enjoin the maintenance and operation of a certain ditch across the land of plaintiff in such a manner as to cause injury thereto. Damages were also claimed in the sum of $500.

Plaintiff is the owner of a 20-acre vineyard, being part of a certain colony tract situated in Fresno county. Defendants are the owners of other parcels in the same colony which are situated to the south of and contiguous to plaintiff's holding. Defendants' lands are irrigated by means of an open ditch of the usual construction, some 12 feet in width, which carries the water from a main irrigation canal about a mile north of plaintiff's land and discharges it on the lands of defendants. In order to accomplish this it is necessary to carry the water across the westerly side of plaintiff's land. Some 16 years prior to the commencement of this action, this distributing ditch was constructed, and since its establishment it has been maintained by the defendants along and across the west end of plaintiff's property. The complaint charges that defendants have so negligently operated the ditch as to cause it to overflow, and also that they have maintained the water therein at such a depth for continuous periods that it caused a seepage through and under plaintiff's land to a great distance. This overflow and seepage brings down tules and certain other grasses and noxious weeds and discharges them on the lands of plaintiff, and the water also causes minerals, such as alkali, to rise to or near the surface of the ground, from the effects of which the vines and trees on plaintiff's land have died, and the land has become useless. It is further alleged that this condition is partially due to the porous character of the soil of which the ditch is constructed, and the neglect of defendants to remove rubbish and growing grasses from the ditch. In their answer the defendants admit that they have maintained the ditch for a period of 16 years across the westerly side of plaintiff's land, but deny the damage, and claim a prescriptive right to flow water through the ditch for irrigation purposes. They also deny that they have negligently and carelessly permitted water to escape by percolation or seepage or overflow onto plaintiff's land, with the consequent deposit thereon of seeds and noxious weeds.

By way of cross-complaint they allege that defendants are joint owners of said irrigation ditch, which is the only means by which they can secure water for their respective parcels of land, and that it is absolutely necessary to the existence of plant life thereon; that if said flow of water be interrupted as prayed for by plaintiff, their vineyards and orchards will be utterly ruined and destroyed and great and irreparable injury done to defendants. They further allege that each year they have cleaned and repaired the ditch in the proportion required of them by agreement among all the parties using said ditch, and in accordance with the regulations of the irrigation district, and that they have at all times during the irrigating season been kept in a fit and proper condition for the flow of water, and that if any damage has been done to plaintiff's land by percolation or otherwise, such damage has not been caused by negligence on the part of any of said defendants, but is attributable to plaintiff's negligence in not properly filling in her land along the line of the ditch. They pray that plaintiff take nothing by her complaint, and that the court enter its decree to the effect that said defendants own an easement and a right of way for an irrigating ditch and for the flowing of water through the same across and upon the westerly side of plaintiff's land, and that their title to said right of way be quieted and confirmed against plaintiff; that a permanent injunction be entered preventing plaintiff and others from interfering in any manner with the rights or user by said defendants, and for general relief.

To this cross-complaint plaintiff filed an answer alleging that it failed to state a cause of action. She also denied that the cross-complainants have properly repaired and maintained said irrigation ditch in accordance with the irrigation district regulations, or that the ditch is in a fit and proper condition for the flowing of water, and alleged that the damage complained of is due to the failure of defendants to properly cement said ditch and stop the overflow and percolation and seepage of the water. She further alleges her willingness to pay her proportion of the cost of installing a cement pipe to prevent further damage. At the trial the respondents were permitted to amend their answer so as to plead the statute of limitations. After the trial they filed another amendment pleading a prescriptive right to seepage and percolation.

The trial court found that the ditch did seep and percolate and caused one-half an acre of appellant's land to become damp and soggy and unfit for the growing of trees and vines thereon; that for approximately 8 years prior to the filing of this suit the respondents adversely, peaceably, continuously, uninterruptedly, openly, and notoriously, and under a claim of right caused water to flow through said ditch and percolate and seep through the walls and sides thereof and on and into the appellant's land, but also found that this percolation and seepage had not materially increased from the time the water was first caused to flow through the ditch, and that in the last 5 years prior to the filing of this action the percolation and seepage had been and remained approximately the same. Further findings are to the effect that the injury or damage caused to said strip of appellant's land and the vines and trees growing thereon by the respondents' flowing water through said ditch and the percolation and seepage therefrom was first brought to the attention of the appellant more than 5 years prior to the filing of the complaint in this action, and that she, during such period, had actual knowledge of the seeping and percolating qualities of the ditch, and the damp and soggy condition of said strip of land adjacent thereto, and of the resulting damage to the land and the vines and trees growing thereon from such percolation and seepage.

The court thereupon found as a conclusion of law (1) that the appellant's cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations; and (2) that the respondents have acquired a prescriptive right of way over and across the westerly side of appellant's land for said irrigation ditch and a prescriptive right to maintain the same. No finding was made upon the question of the alleged damage due to overflow.

The appeal is by the plaintiff, and she first claims as ground for reversal that the court erred in permitting the pleas of prescriptive right and the statute of limitations to be filed during and after the trial.

[1, 2] We see no merit in this contention. The original answer contained a special denial and also a cross-complaint alleging adverse user of the irrigation ditch for more than 5 years prior to the filing of plaintiff's complaint, and praying that defendants' rights thereunder be quieted. The answer thereto of appellant did not deny such adverse user, but, on the contrary, she admitted defendants' right to the flow. The amendment setting up the plea of the statute of limitations as against her right of action for damages caused by percolation and seepage was offered during the trial. The whole theory of the defense was the bar of the statute of limitations and defendants' prescriptive right. The amendment was for the evident purpose of more effectively pleading these defenses, and to conform to the evidence adduced. The granting or refusal of leave to amend an answer by pleading the statute is committed to the sound discretion of the trial court. Trower v. City and County of San Francisco, 157 Cal. 762, 109 P. 617. The trial court has the same discretion in such matters as it has to allow the pleading of any other meritorious defense. St. Paul Title & Trust Co. v. Stensgaard, 162 Cal. 178, 121 P. 731, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741. The fact that the amendments were allowed after the close of the case can avail appellant nothing. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Jones, 89 Cal. 507, 26 P. 1089. The power given to the court to allow amendments in the interest of justice is in its sound discretion, and the appellate court will not disturb the action of the trial court thereon, even after the submission of the cause, when no abuse of discretion appears. Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 364, 51 P. 549, 955. Aside from this, the appellant made no attempt to set aside the submission of the cause in order to offer further pleading or proof. Under such circumstances she is in no position to complain. Gartlan v. Hooper Co., 177 Cal. 422, 170 P. 1115; Wardrobe v. Miller, 53 Cal. App. 370, 200 P. 77.

It is also contended that the evidence does not support the finding that the damage was relatively the same during the last five years and that it had not increased during said period, nor does it support the further finding that respondents have acquired a prescriptive right to maintain the ditch in its present condition and to damage appellant's land by the seepage. Error is also claimed by reason of the failure to make any finding on the negligence of respondents in overflowing the banks of the ditch whereby they damaged and flooded plaintiff's land.

[3, 4] As appellant contends, there is no evidence in the record to sustain the finding that the damage suffered by plaintiff was relatively the same during the past five years and had not increased during said period. On the contrary, the only evidence upon the subject shows affirmatively that the damage had increased by reason of the constant overflow during irrigation seasons, and that its continuance will cause other vines now growing upon appellant's land to be destroyed. The main purpose of plaintiff's suit was to abate the continuance of this injury. Where continuing or recurring injury results from a wrongful act, or from a condition wrongfully created and maintained, separate and successive causes of action arise when the wrong is committed and when such damages are from time to time sustained. Kafka v. Bozio, 191 Cal. 746, 218 P. 753, 29 A. L. R. 833. It is admitted by defendants that an overflow does occur during the irrigation periods. Where a property owner by artificial means brings water upon his lands for purposes of irrigation, and allows a portion of such water to escape so as to injure the land of the adjoining owner, he is not only liable in damages for the injury caused, but an injunction will lie to prevent the continuation of such injury. Bacon v. Kerney Vineyard Co., 1 Cal. App. 276, 82 P. 84; Kall v. Carruthers, 59 Cal. App. 555, 211 P. 43. As said in the case last cited, to permit defendants to make their land profitable though it result in the utter destruction of the usefulness of plaintiff's land, would violate every principle of natural right and justice, and cannot be supported by judicial authority. If the injury here complained of be, as plaintiff contends, a continuous one, she is entitled to the relief here sought.

The judgment is reversed.

COEN v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.
(Civ. 4621.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 28, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 26, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨1021, 1022—Presentation of demand prerequisite to suit.

Presentation of demand in manner required by Los Angeles City Charter, § 222g, is necessary prerequisite to maintenance of suit against city for recovery of money or damages.

2. Evidence ⇨31—Contents of city charter of Los Angeles require no proof.

Contents of city charter, like that of city of Los Angeles, require no proof; they are subject of judicial cognizance.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨1021, 1022—Document presenting claim by sublessee of tidelands held not to present claim based on eviction.

Document presented by sublessee of tidelands prior to commencement of action against city, held not to be for claim based on his eviction from the lands; it disclosing that sublessee was tenant in possession, and that claim was not only for damages because of acts of the city, but for what he understood city might do when its officers should determine what they were going to do.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨171(3)—Surrender of premises is necessary element of constructive eviction.

There can be no constructive eviction if tenant continues in possession of premises however much he may be disturbed in beneficial enjoyment.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨1021, 1022—Sublessee of tidelands not entitled to maintain action on money claim not contained in demand.

In view of Los Angeles City Charter, § 222g, sublessee of tidelands was not entitled to maintain action for money claim or demand against city not contained in statement of his claim made to city.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨1021, 1022—Not every variation in amount of demand and complaint, will deprive plaintiff of right to maintain action.

It is not every variation, from strict identity in amount of demand as shown in statement of claim against city as compared with subsequent complaint, that will deprive plaintiff of right to maintain action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Garnet W. Coen, also known as G. W. Coen, against the City of Los Angeles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., Clyde M. Leach, Asst. City Atty., and Kenneth A.

Carey, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. H. Nelson and J. M. Chatterson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action brought against the city of Los Angeles by a sublessee of certain tidelands owned by the city at Los Angeles harbor. In the case of People v. Banning Co., 166 Cal. 635, 138 P. 101, involving these same and other tidelands, it was determined that the title was vested in the Banning Company, subject to the right of the public to use the land for purposes in aid of or in connection with navigation or fishery when at any time they might be so required. On the 24th day of July, 1917, the city of Los Angeles and the Banning Company and Hancock Banning entered into an agreement, which provided for the conveyance in fee by the Banning Company to the city of all its title to the lands in question. These tide and submerged lands are known as Mormon Island, and are a portion of tideland location 152. In return therefor the city gave to the company a 30-year lease to all of the land lying behind a line 204 feet shoreward from and parallel to the pierhead line. The leased land was called parcel No. 1. The 204-foot strip along the water front was divided into several parcels, but the only portion of it involved in this action is parcel No. 5. The 1917 agreement shows that the purpose and effect of the agreement and conveyance was that, until the 204-foot strip should be required by the city for public water front improvements, the Banning Company and Hancock Banning were given permits to use the same under the restrictions and limitations contained in the agreement. Subsequently these lands were subdivided into lots and roadways by the Banning Company and Hancock Banning, and said lots and roadways were transferred to the various successors in interest of the Banning Company and Hancock Banning. Thereafter, J. B. Banning, one of the successors in interest of the Banning Company and Hancock Banning in and to lot 8 of the above-mentioned subdivision, leased a portion of said lot 8 to respondent's assignors. Respondent's lease by its terms was expressly made subject to all conditions and restrictions of the 1917 agreement. One of these restrictions and conditions provided that the use of all or any part of the lands lying within a line parallel to and distant 204 feet from the U. S. pierhead line was subject to revocation and cancellation by the city of Los Angeles at any time upon certain terms as to notice and compensation which are hereinafter stated.

Early in 1922 the board of harbor commissioners of the city determined to improve a considerable portion of the frontage on Mormon Island peninsula with public wharves, but it was found that more land would be required than the 204-foot strip which it had a right to take under the 1917 agreement. Accordingly, negotiations with the Banning interests resulted in a release to the city of a considerably greater area than the 204-foot strip, and as a result an agreement known as the Katherine S. Banning agreement, dated September 29, 1922, released to the city, in addition to other lands, all of the lands included in respondent's lease; subject, of course, to whatever rights the sublessee had therein.

On or about July 27, 1922, prior to the construction of the wharves, transit sheds and rail facilities agreed upon, and in the vicinity of respondent's leasehold, and upon certain other lands released by and in pursuance of an agreement of June 30, 1922, between the city and Hancock Banning, the city commenced the work of improvement by raising the grade of these lands to the necessary level by pumping upon them the soil dredged from adjacent harbor channels. In order to prevent the dredgings from flowing upon and doing any damage to the improvements (an electric smelter) upon respondent's leasehold, the city built a dirt embankment immediately outside of and around respondent's leasehold, the effect of which was to prevent vehicular access by land to the leasehold until the fill had sufficiently dried out—a matter of several months. Since March, 1921, and up to the commencement of and during the dredging and filling, respondent's smelting plant had not been in operation and had been completely closed down.

Respondent commenced this action on the 20th day of November, 1922. Thereafter, on the 23d day of November, 1922, appellant caused to be served upon respondent a six months' notice of cancellation and revocation of that portion of respondent's leasehold lying within the 204-foot strip; said six months' notice to expire June 1, 1923. During January, 1923, in pursuance of the provisions of the 1917 agreement and the said agreements of June 30 and September 29, 1922, and of the general uses for which the city held title to the lands in question, the work of development and water front improvement was further prosecuted. In connection therewith a railroad was built by the city along the area laid out as a way or street within the above-mentioned subdivision, which street passed by the westerly end of respondent's leasehold.

Respondent's complaint alleged an entry by appellant and the ejectment of respondent, and an unlawful withholding of possession, and during such withholding the commission of waste upon the premises by causing certain dredgings to be thrown around and upon said property, and by the building of an embankment around respondent's leasehold, and by dredging and filling the surrounding lands, and that thereby respondent suffered total loss of the improvements upon the premises. By his complaint respondent prayed for possession and damages and for general relief. By supplemental complaint filed on the 3d day of March, 1923, the respondent alleged further trespass and eviction of respondent, and further breach of "the covenant of quiet enjoyment of the lease to plaintiff," by the building of a railroad on adjacent land, and prayed for an injunction against the further building of the railroad, and mandatory relief for its removal and the restitution of the premises to the same status existing at the time of the filing of the complaint. In the proceedings had upon the application for injunction, the relief prayed for by respondent was denied, but appellant was ordered to construct a roadway across the railroad and other lands to enable respondent to go to and from his leasehold.

Appellant's amended answer to the complaint and supplemental complaint contains matter of denial, and further sets forth the acts done by and rights claimed by appellant in the improvement of lands adjacent to and surrounding respondent's leasehold.

At the trial it was stipulated that the plaintiff at the time of the institution of this action was entitled to the peaceable possession of the lands and premises described in the complaint, as assignee of a lawfully executed lease granted by J. B. Banning (one of the successors in interest of the Banning Company and Hancock Banning), to E. Riveroll, on September 1, 1919, for a period of five years, in accordance with the authority contained in and subject to the conditions of the said agreement of July 24, 1917, and that, subject to said conditions, said lease to Riveroll was renewable at the option of the lessee for a further period to expire July 23, 1947. It was further stipulated that the leasehold described in the complaint was improved by plaintiff and his immediate assignor and associates for a steel plant, being occupied by buildings and furnaces, which are on the leasehold but which have not been operated since about the month of March, 1921; that the only permit or authority of record obtained from the board of harbor commissioners of the city for the construction of said buildings, furnaces and other structures and improvements placed upon said leasehold is the approval by said board on August 27, 1919, of an application submitted by A. E. Davidson for a permit to construct a foundry building on Mormon Island peninsula, the building permit describing a structure approximately 42x84 feet, at an estimated cost of $5,000. It was further stipulated that in the latter part of the month of July, 1922, or thereabouts, the city began filling in the land surrounding plaintiff's leasehold with material dredged adjacent to and abutting the harbor of the plaintiff, and caused an embankment to be thrown up outside of and near the fence surrounding the said improvements upon plaintiff's leasehold, which embankment was for the purpose of preventing the dredgings from running over and upon the leasehold; and continued so dredging and filling until the adjacent land had been raised (the height of the embankment being by the stipulation left for determination by the evidence); that plaintiff's leasehold prior to the throwing up of said embankment and said filling was practically on the level of the surface of all of the surrounding adjacent lands.

The 1917 agreement, to the conditions of which respondent's lease is by its terms made subject, identified the lands covered thereby as lands shown upon an attached map numbered 4392, which lands were declared to be a portion of tideland location 152, all situate in the county of Los Angeles. The 1917 agreement referred particularly to parcel No. 5, as designated on said map 4392, and provided that certain described frontage to a depth of 204 feet from the United States pierhead line around said parcel No. 5, "shall be and is hereby reserved to the city to be improved with public wharves, transit sheds, roadways, railroads and other public improvements in aid of commerce, navigation, and fisheries, as necessity may require, for the accommodation of the public, including the Banning Company and its sublessees and licensees." The parcel No. 5 is the same land mentioned in said lease as the 204-foot strip, and approximately one-half of respondent's leasehold lies within said parcel No. 5.

The 1917 agreement further provided "that until all or any portion of said parcel No. 5 is required or improved by the city for public purposes, during the continuation of the lease herein, the said Hancock Banning is hereby granted by the city a prior and preferential permit to use said parcel No. 5 for any and all lawful private purposes, under the same terms and conditions above set out with reference to parcels Nos. 3 and 4."

The said terms and conditions relative to parcels Nos. 3 and 4 included the following:

"Provided, however, that the city may at any time revoke said permits, or either thereof, as to any and all of said space covered by parcels Nos. 3 and 4 upon which public wharves, warehouses, streets, approaches, railways, or other public uses for navigation, commerce, and fishery, as hereinafter defined in paragraph 8 of this agreement, may be required by the city; but prior to the termination of such permits upon any portion of said space, six months' notice must be given by said board of harbor commissioners to the Banning Company, describing the space so required for such uses, and upon the expiration of said notice, possession of the premises described in the notice shall at once be delivered by the Banning Company, or its successors, to the city.

"That upon any such termination the city shall, within 60 days after the determination of such value, pay to the Banning Company the reasonable value of any and all wharves or other structures or improvements left upon the premises affected by such revocation, which have been constructed in accordance with the requirements of, and with the approval of the board of harbor commissioners. * * *

"That upon such termination of said permit, as herein provided, the Banning Company shall not be entitled to any payment, nor shall an allowance be made for the value of said permit or for the unexpired term thereof, nor for any value derived from the permit, nor on account of good will, going concern, earning power, increased cost of reproduction, or increased value of any property owned or operated by the Banning Company under said permit, or in connection therewith. * * *

"That the right of the city, upon any such revocation, to immediate possession and use of any of the said space so canceled shall not be postponed because for any reason said arbitrators have not made their award, or payment has not been made within the prescribed time for any such improvements so left upon any space so canceled. * * *

Appellant contends that the acts done by it did not amount to an eviction; also that the amount of damages awarded is not justified by the evidence, either as the result of an eviction or other dispossession, or for loss sustained by respondent by reason of any interference with his leasehold in the nature of a trespass thereon. Appellant further contends that respondent is without right to maintain this action, because respondent failed to present to appellant or its board of harbor commissioners a claim and demand for money or damages, which presentation, according to the provisions of the charter of the city of Los Angeles, is a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action for the recovery of such money or damages.

The first cause of action (stated in the first count of the complaint) was "discontinued," on motion of the plaintiff. The judgment rests upon the second cause of action as stated in the plaintiff's complaint and amendments thereto and his supplemental complaint and amendments thereto. The court found that all of the allegations contained therein are true, "except as to the amount of damages, which is true in part." In the second count of the complaint it is alleged that on or about September 8, 1922, the defendant entered upon and ousted and ejected the plaintiff from the described property and thereafter continued to withhold possession thereof from the plaintiff; that during the time of said unlawful withholding of said property, the defendants committed waste thereon by means of the acts described in the complaint as hereinbefore stated; that by reason of said acts, sundry described improvements of the plaintiff which had cost him more than $37,000 were a total loss to the plaintiff; that plaintiff's right to possession of said premises "and approaches" was at the time of defendant's entry of the value of $100,000, all of which was rendered valueless by the said acts of the defendants; "that the plaintiff has heretofore submitted his claim of damage herein alleged in writing to the defendants for acceptance or rejection, and the same has been by it and them rejected." Plaintiff prayed judgment (besides the demand based upon the first count of the complaint) for possession of the described premises; for damages in the sum of $137,000 for waste committed and loss sustained by loss of plaintiff's property and possessory rights; for costs, etc. The defendant, among other issues raised by the answer, denied that the plaintiff at any time had submitted his claim of damage or any claim of damage to the defendants for acceptance or rejection or at all. Plaintiff's first and only reference (in his pleadings) to his lease is in the supplemental complaint. The facts concerning plaintiff's leasehold were brought into the record by the defendant's amended answer to complaint and supplemental complaint.

In addition to the general finding above mentioned the court found that on September 29, 1922, the lease in which the Bannings were lessors was transferred to the city and that thereafter the plaintiff paid the rentals named in said lease, to wit, $100 per month, to the city of Los Angeles to and including May, 1923; that after July 24, 1922, the defendant city under its contract of that date with the Bannings proceeded to fill in the lands surrounding the plaintiff's leasehold and continued in that work until January, 1923, at which date the city began to build a steam railroad over a certain right of way adjoining plaintiff's leasehold and thereby obstruct plaintiff's ingress to and egress from the leased premises; that the plaintiff had placed on said premises sundry improvements, the values of which are stated in the findings; "that the defendant continued in the occupation of, and the said improvement of, the surrounding lands and the right of way along plaintiff's said leasehold without regard for the rights of the plaintiff, and continued to disturb the peaceable possession of the plaintiff, and to obstruct his ingress and egress to said property from the said 29th day of September, 1922, continuously down to the time of trial"; that prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiff had presented his verified petition, claim, and demand for damages to the defendant, which claim and demand was by the defendant rejected. The court further found:

"That the plaintiff's lease was executed on the 1st day of September, 1919, for a period of five (5) years, with an extension clause for a further term to July 23, 1947, and the court finds that the value of said lease was at the time of the acts complained of, and ever since has been and now is, the sum of sixty thousand ($60,000.00) dollars, this after deducting the rentals and charges reserved therein."

Plaintiff's theory of his action, as stated by his counsel at the beginning of the trial, was as follows:

"We will contend in this action there has been an eviction of the tenant, and that the property, so far as it was leased to the lessee, he has been evicted from it, and that the damages are the entire value of the leasehold and the expenses that he has been put to in preparing that land for the special occupation that it was leased for, and these will be the issues that the evidence will be directed to."

The court in its decision followed this theory, and determined that the acts complained of and found to have been done were unlawfully and oppressively done by the defendant without regard for the legal rights of the plaintiff, "and constituted a disturbance of the quiet enjoyment and possession of said leasehold and amounted to an eviction of the plaintiff from the whole thereof." The court further determined that the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled "is the value of said leasehold as found, to wit, the sum of $60,000"; and that the plaintiff should be awarded the further sum of $1,000 as a recovery of rents paid by him after such eviction; and that the claim of the plaintiff for improvements and preparing the premises of the leasehold for the manufacture of steel, for which the same was leased, cannot be allowed. Judgment accordingly was entered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $61,000 and costs. No other relief was granted by the judgment.

The defendant appeals from the judgment. The plaintiff also appealed "from that part, only, of said judgment which does not award to the said plaintiff as a part of his damages" the value of his improvements, and the amount of a reasonable attorney fee to the plaintiff, and exemplary damages, to which plaintiff claims that he is entitled under the findings of the court.

[1] The charter of the city of Los Angeles requires that claims and demands against the city (with exceptions not important here) shall be paid only on demands presented to the appropriate officers of the city and that (section 222g) "no suit shall be brought on any claim for money or damages against the city of Los Angeles * * * or any officer or board or commission of the city until a demand for the same has been presented as herein provided, and rejected in whole or in part. * * *". The presentation of a demand in the manner required by the charter is a necessary prerequisite to the maintenance of a suit against the city for the recovery of "money or damages." Farmers', etc., Bank v. City of Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 655, 91 P. 795; Spencer v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 103, 119, 179 P. 163. The cause of action, according to these decisions, does not accrue until such presentation takes place.

[2] The only attempt by the plaintiff to prove compliance with these requirements of the charter was made by offering in evidence a document filed by plaintiff with the board of harbor commissioners on or about the 17th day of September, 1922. Counsel for defendant, being called upon to stipulate the facts concerning this claim, admitted that the document offered was a carbon copy of the claim filed by plaintiff with said defendant, and that the claim that was filed was rejected, "but whether that claim is a part of the facts for a foundation for this action, we will not stipulate." This then occurred between the court and counsel:

"The Court: You make the formal objection?"

"Mr. Carey: Yes.

"The Court: Well, I will overrule it, without knowing whether I am doing so advisedly. You understand I want all of these documents in, so at this time, purely in a formal way, I will overrule the objection."

We quote this part of the record in reply to the contention of counsel for respondent that appellant did not make this defense while the case was on trial in the court below, and did not support such defense "by the provisions of its city charter and other necessary evidence which appellant has always had available." The contents of a city charter like that of the city of Los Angeles require no proof. They are the subject of judicial cognizance. Spaulding v. Desmond, 188 Cal. 783, 789, 207 P. 896.

[3] It is therefore necessary to examine the document which was received in evidence in the manner above stated, and consider whether or not it constituted a claim presented in manner and form sufficient to comply with said requirements of the city charter. The document in question was addressed to the city and the appropriate officers thereof and was entitled "Petition and Claim for Damages for Confiscation of Property at Harbor." It then refers to the several agreements, conveyances and leases leading to and including the Riveroll lease which had become the property of the claimant Coen. It then sets out the expenditure by the claimant Coen of the sum of $100,000 for the purpose of preparing iron ore for the market, which iron ore the claimant had expected and intended to bring from certain mining properties in Mexico, for crushing and smelting on said leased premises, and states that a part of said expenditure was made for the purpose of building concrete furnaces and other improvements on said leased premises, and that for said improvements the claimant expended in actual money the sum of $35,714.61; and that said improvements would be a total loss in the event that they should be torn down and dismantled.

The claimant then stated on his information and belief that the city intended to take for its own use certain lands, including said land leased to the claimant:

"That for such purpose the said city of Los Angeles has already thrown a 5-foot embankment entirely surrounding the property leased by your petitioner and claimant thereby barring egress and ingress to your petitioner; that your petitioner sold the ore now on the said premises but when his buyer called with trucks to take the same away he found it impossible to enter the said premises by reason of said embankment and your petitioner has lost the said sale; that your petitioner and claimant is informed and believes and therefore alleges, that the city of Los Angeles can only take for its own use approximately two hundred and four (204) feet from the water front on said property but that the city is undecided whether it will take all of the property or only sixty (60) feet in addition to the said two hundred and four feet; that as to the said two hundred and four (204) feet, approximately, the city may take for its own use, it must, before so taking it, give the tenants thereon six months' notice thereof and in addition thereto pay to the tenants the amount of the cost of their improvements."

Said statement of claim purports to contain four claims. In the first claim, after making the statements to which we have referred, the claimant made certain further statements with regard to his activities in relation to his lease and the business which he was endeavoring to establish thereon, and then made his demand conditionally as follows:

"That if the plan of the city of Los Angeles is to take all of the said property of your petitioner and claimant and desires to give to your petitioner and claimant another piece of water front property with a lease for thirty (30) years, that in that event your petitioner and claimant will be damaged to the extent of an actual expenditure of $35,714.61."

The "second claim," after adopting the statement of facts contained in the first claim, makes its alternative statement as follows:

"That if the plan of the city of Los Angeles is to take for its use only sixty (60) feet beyond the said two hundred and four (204) feet from the water front, and allows your petitioner and claimant to keep the balance of said property under the said lease for the balance of said term of thirty (30) years, and which your petitioner is willing to accept, that then and in that event your petitioner is damaged to the extent of $35,714.61 and in addition thereto the sum of ten thousand ($10,000.00) for the loss of said sixty (60) foot strip, making a total of $45,714.61 therefor."

The "third claim," after adopting the statement of facts contained in the first claim, makes its demand as follows:

"That if the plan of the city of Los Angeles is to take for its use all of the said property and not permit your petitioner and claimant to have another piece of water front property nor any portion of said property without cost at all, then and in that event your petitioner and claimant claims damages to the extent of $35,714.61 for money actually spent in buildings, furnaces, and improvements as aforesaid and $62,285.91 for the confiscation of the balance of the property, which the city of Los Angeles is not permitted to take beyond said approximately two hundred and four feet from the water front, said sum of $100,000 being the actual cost to your petitioner and claimant."

The "fourth claim" adopts the statement of facts contained in the first division; states that the claimant is further damaged to the extent of 10 per cent. of the amount of damages allowed him by the city for his attorney fees incurred by bringing this petition and claim in addition to the actual damages which the city will allow him.

Based upon the foregoing four statements of claim, the document in question closed with an alternative demand of payment as follows:

"(1) For the leasing for the balance of a thirty (30) year period under the present lease, without cost or expense, of a suitable parcel of water front property, and the payment to petitioner and claimant of the sum of $35,714.61 under the first claim herein; or (2) for the leasing for the balance of a thirty (30) year period under the present lease, without cost or expense, of that portion of the present property beyond 264 feet from the water front which the city of Los Angeles will not take for its use, and the payment to petitioner and claimant of the sum of $45,714.61 under the second claim herein; or (3) for the sum of $100,000.00 under the third claim herein; and (4) for 10 per cent. of the amount of damages awarded him by the city of Los Angeles in addition to said damages, to compensate him for attorneys' fees incurred by this petition; and (5) for such other and further cost, expense, disbursement and damage herein incurred by him."

[4] It at once becomes clear that the claim presented by respondent prior to the commencement of the action was not based upon an eviction. It shows throughout that it was being presented by a tenant in possession. It contains the direct statement by the claimant that the lease had been assigned to him and that "he is now and ever since said assignment * * * has been the sole owner and holder of said lease." The entire theory of his claim was that he was then in possession as tenant, and that he desired a settlement of his claim in view not only of the damages which had been suffered by him by reason of what the city had done, but also on account of what he understood that the city might do when its officers should make up their minds and determine what they were going to do. In view of the fact that the only theory of eviction relied upon by respondent is that of constructive eviction, the law governing the rights of a tenant after such eviction becomes applicable.

"The general rule, however, relating to a constructive eviction is that any disturbance of the tenant's possession by the landlord whereby the premises are rendered unfit or unsuitable for occupancy in whole or in substantial part for the purposes for which they were leased amounts to a constructive eviction, if the tenant so elects and surrenders his possession (16 R. C. L., p. 686). There can be no constructive eviction if the tenant continues in the possession of the whole, however much he may be disturbed in the beneficial enjoyment." Veysey v. Moriyama, 184 Cal. 802, 805, 195 P. 662, 663 (20 A. L. R. 1363).

[5, 6] And further, in view of the provisions of the city charter to which we have referred, we are of the opinion that respondent is not entitled to maintain this action for any money claim or demand not contained in the statement of his claim which he made to the city. We concede that it is not every variation from strict identity in the amount of the demand, as shown in the statement of claim as compared with the subsequent complaint, that will deprive a plaintiff of the right to maintain his action. In so far as a claim sued upon is substantially the claim first presented to the city, the charter requirement should be deemed to have been met by the plaintiff. Construed under this rule, it may be that the claim, thus presented, established a sufficient foundation on which damages might have been recovered as for a trespass on the leasehold property; but the amount of the judgment which could be awarded in such action would necessarily be limited to the acts which had been done by the city at the time when the claim was presented, and the damages resulting therefrom, or arising out of the continued operation thereof.

The fact that the plaintiff had not been ousted from the leased premises, and did not claim an eviction even during the pendency of this action, until the time of the trial, is further shown by his supplemental complaint, under which he sought an injunction to compel the removal of alleged obstructions "around plaintiff's property," which interfered with his facilities for ingress into said property and egress therefrom. And as we have seen, the court actually ordered the construction by defendant of a roadway to enable the plaintiff to go to and from those premises.

As the judgment did not award possession to the plaintiff, it is clear that the plaintiff was not awarded any relief on the theory of an action in ejectment. The judgment was planted squarely upon the proposition that the plaintiff had been evicted by his landlord, the defendant, and that therefore he was entitled to recover the value of the leasehold as damages for such eviction. We have stated the sufficient reasons which effectually show that a cause of action for such damages cannot be maintained herein.

Finally, if it were contended that the findings establish facts constituting trespass, and state the amount of damages incurred thereby, the answer must be that the court below plainly did not intend to segregate and assess damages as for a trespass. The fact found, that "the value of the improvements left on the property leased at the time of the commission of the acts complained of, is found to be the sum of $25,000, after deducting the depreciation shown by the evidence," does not establish the amount of damage to those improvements caused by those acts.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment is reversed.

We concur: HOUSER, J.; CURTIS, J.

FINKLE et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 4911.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 31, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1925.)

1. New trial §113—Order granting new trial is judicial act and cannot be made by judge out of court.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 166, 660, determination of motion for new trial is judicial act, which must be performed by court and cannot be made by judge in chambers, and an order signed by judge while in another county and mailed to county clerk was invalid and invalidity could not be waived; section 1004 not being applicable.

2. Courts §1—"Court" defined.

A court is a tribunal presided over by one or more judges for the exercise of such judicial power as has been conferred on it by law; it is a place where justice is judicially administered.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Court (of Justice).]

3. Appeal and error §110—Order purporting to grant new trial in equitable action not appealable.

Trial by jury not being matter of right in equitable action, order purporting to grant new trial therein is not appealable, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

4. Prohibition §1—Writ issues only to restrain future act, and not to undo act already performed.

Writ of prohibition issues only to restrain future act, and not to undo act already performed.

5. Prohibition §3(3)—Granted to prevent new trial under void order.

Where order granting new trial was void, and court was about to go forward with new trial, there was no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, and relief would be granted by writ of prohibition, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1089-1091, 1105.

Application for writ of prohibition by Roy B. Finkle and another, executors of the last will and testament of Sophia A. Finkle, deceased, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Bernardino, and Jesse Olney and another, judges of said court. Peremptory writ granted.

John L. Campbell and Charles L. Allison, both of San Bernardino, for petitioners.

Walter E. Byrne, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a proceeding in prohibition to prevent the superior court for San Bernardino county from proceeding with the retrial of an action after an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial.

The action in which the new trial was granted is one in equity brought in the superior court for San Bernardino county by Sophia A. Finkle against F. C. Finkle to cancel an agreement for the conveyance of real property. It was tried in that court before a jury on October 16, 1923, the honorable J. A. Smith, judge of the superior court for Calaveras county, presiding. A verdict for the plaintiff was returned by the jury. The verdict, though advisory only—the case being of equitable cognizance—was evidently adopted by the court, for it is shown by the petition that on February 29, 1924, a judgment in accordance with the verdict was entered in favor of the plaintiff in the action. On March 5, 1924, notice of the entry of the judgment was served upon the defendant, who, within due time and on notice given by him as required by law, moved the court, Judge Smith presiding, to grant a new trial of the cause. The motion was taken under submission, and on May 5, 1924, the last day allowed by the statute for acting upon the motion, Judge Smith, at Calaveras county, signed a written order in the case, which, after reciting the submission of the motion, reads as follows: "It is ordered that the motion for a new trial be and the same is hereby granted." This order was mailed by Judge Smith to the county clerk of San Bernardino county, by whom it was received and filed at San Bernardino on May 7, 1924. Thereafter the petitioners here, as executors of the last will and testament of Sophia A. Finkle (they having been substituted as parties plaintiff for their testatrix, who had died in the meantime), moved these respondents to vacate the order granting the new trial. The motion was denied, and respondents are about to go forward with the retrial of the case. It is to prevent such retrial that this proceeding was brought.

Petitioners contend that the order of Judge Smith granting the motion for a new trial is a nullity, for the reason that it was not made by the court within two months after notice of the entry of the judgment, and that under section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure such failure on the part of the court to act within the statutory period is tantamount to a denial of the motion.

[1, 2] An order passing upon a motion for new trial is not one which a judge of the superior court has the right to make at chambers. The powers of a judge at chambers are enumerated in section 166 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the authority to pass upon a motion for new trial is not one of them. The determination of such a motion is a judicial act which, to be legal, must be performed by the court, and not by a judge outside of the court. Code Civ. Proc. § 660; Shepherd v. Superior Court, 54 Cal. App. 673, 202 P. 466. See, also, Campbell v. Genshlea, 180 Cal. 217, 180 P. 336.

A court, as defined in Von Schmidt v. Widber, 99 Cal. 512, 34 P. 110, is "a tribunal presided over by one or more judges, for the exercise of such judicial power as has been conferred upon it by law." Blackstone defines it as "a place where justice is judicially administered"; and in Von Schmidt v. Widber, supra, it is said that it is essential "that the person or persons authorized to administer justice be at that place for the purpose of administering justice." The order signed by Judge Smith at Calaveras county on May 5, 1924, was not an order made by the superior court for San Bernardino county. It was not a judicial act at the place designated by law as that where justice is required to be judicially administered by the court.

The cases cited by respondents to the effect that a written order signed by the judge is valid when signed are not in point, for here the order was not one which the judge could make out of court. Section 1004 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that "orders made out of court may be made by the judge of the court in any part of the state." Obviously, this provision is applicable only to such orders as a judge may make at chambers, or elsewhere out of court. It can have no application to an order which only the court can make, such, for example, as an order passing upon a motion for a new trial. If the power to pass upon the motion for new trial were one which could have been exercised by Judge Smith at chambers, it doubtless would have been operative when signed, and its filing in the clerk's office within the prescribed time would not have been essential to its validity. Swift v. Canovan, 47 Cal. 86. Or, if the order had been rendered by Judge Smith in open court, a failure of the clerk to enter it in his minutes before the expiration of May 5th would not have defeated its operation as a court order, since the validity of an order made by the court does not depend upon the date of its entry. Von Schmidt v. Widber, supra. But that is not this case.

Respondents cite us to Comstock, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 57 Cal. 625; Walter v. Merced Academy Ass'n, 126 Cal. 582, 59 P. 136; and Estudillo v. Security, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 66, 109 P. 884—cases which hold that if the judge who presided at the trial of a case in the superior court for a certain county subsequently goes into another county, where he prepares and signs his findings of fact and an order directing the entry of judgment, and sends such findings and order to the clerk of the county where the case was tried, and the clerk files them, the proceedings are not void for want of jurisdiction. We fail to see how the doctrine of these cases can possibly aid respondents. It is, of course, axiomatic that a case which has been tried and submitted for decision can be determined only by the court and not by the judge apart from the tribunal in which he presided during the trial. It is probably the theory of the decisions to which we have just adverted that, when the findings of fact are filed and the clerk is ordered to enter a particular judgment thereon, the court, as a court, has acted. In Comstock, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, supra, it is said that:

"The cause was not determined until the findings and order for judgment were filed with the clerk of the superior court."

In Walter v. Merced Academy Ass'n, supra, the court says that:

"Until the decision and decree were filed by the clerk in Merced county [the county where the case was tried], they were not in force."

According to the doctrine of these cases the order signed by Judge Smith could have no force or effect as a court order until it was received and filed by the clerk at San Bernardino. But that filing, which occurred on May 7, 1924, or two days after the expiration of the period during which the court possessed the power to grant a new trial, came too late to be effective as an order of the court. It is clear, therefore, that the motion for a new trial was denied by operation of law, and that the superior court is without jurisdiction to retry the case.

There is no merit in the claim that the order was but a mere irregularity which was waived by petitioner's failure to call it to the attention of the defendant in the action until after the time within which he might appeal from the judgment. The order was an absolute nullity, and ineffective for any purpose. Shepherd v. Superior Court, supra.

[3-5] Petitioners have no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. The case of Finkle v. Finkle was an equitable action. A trial by jury was therefore not a matter of right, and hence no appeal lies from the order purporting to grant a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

The case is one which calls for the issuance of the writ of prohibition. It is true, as respondents very properly say, that the remedy afforded by prohibition is prohibitive rather than corrective, and the writ will only issue to restrain the commission of a future act, and not simply to undo an act already performed. But here respondents, by persisting in their determination to go on with the retrial of the case of Finkle v. Finkle, are about to take proceedings in the action which are in excess of their jurisdiction. Petitioners therefore are entitled to a writ of prohibition restraining respondents from proceeding with the trial. See Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 P. 8, and Shepherd v. Superior Court, supra.

Likening the order for a new trial to a final judgment respondents earnestly insist that the writ of prohibition will not lie, because it does not appear upon the face of the order that it was made out of court. In support of this contention we are referred to Clendaniel v. Conrad, 3 Boyce (Del.) 549, 83 A. 1036, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 968, and Ex parte Cooper, 143 U. S. 472, 12 S. Ct. 453, 36 L. Ed. 232. It is true that in the last-mentioned case the United States Supreme Court does say that prohibition will not lie after judgment or sentence, unless the want of jurisdiction which furnishes the basis for the writ be apparent upon the face of the proceeding sought to be prohibited. But an analysis of that decision discloses that the doctrine upon which it rests is none other than the generally recognized one that, if the existence or nonexistence of jurisdiction depends upon controverted facts which the lower court is competent to inquire into, prohibition will not lie if that court shall have determined the fact in favor of its jurisdiction. "When an inferior court has power to determine a jurisdictional fact, its determination cannot be collaterally attacked upon an application for a writ of prohibition." Murphy v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 592, 24 P. 310. (We quote from the syllabus.) That this is the doctrine which governed the decision of the federal Supreme Court in Ex parte Cooper is made manifest by the following: There the court was asked to pass upon the jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the District of Alaska, sitting in admiralty. The Alaska court's jurisdiction depended upon whether the seizure of a libeled vessel and the offense committed by its crew—taking fur seals in violation of the federal statute—occurred in waters within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. In the course of its opinion the United States Supreme Court said:

"Upon the face of the libel and findings, if the jurisdiction did not extend beyond three miles from the shore, the legal inference is that the offense and seizure were within that limit [citing authorities]. The court had power to inquire into the fact upon which jurisdiction depended and its maintenance of jurisdiction involved the conclusion necessary to sustain it." (Italics ours.)

In the instant case the jurisdiction of the superior court to act upon the motion for a new trial did not depend upon any controverted fact which that court was called upon to decide before it could pass upon the question whether a new trial should or should not be granted. The superior court had lost whatever jurisdiction it possessed when it failed to act within the time provided by the statute. In the other case cited by respondents (Clendaniel v. Conrad, supra) the Delaware Supreme Court held that on a petition for prohibition it could not consider issues of fact dehors the record, for the reason that it has no machinery for the determination of such issues. The ground for its decision on this branch of the case is stated by the court substantially as follows: The writ of prohibition is a common-law writ. The common-law procedure includes a method, and also the means, of determining issues of fact dehors the record in prohibition cases. But the court of last resort in England did not have original jurisdiction to issue writ of prohibition, and as a consequence that court had no common-law practice or procedure for determining issues of fact dehors the record in such proceedings. Therefore the Delaware Supreme Court, corresponding to the court of last resort in England, has no common-law rule of practice or procedure to govern it in the exercise of its jurisdiction to issue writs of prohibition, and, in the absence of a procedure established by statute, it has no means of determining issues of fact dehors the record. In the course of its opinion the Delaware court used this language:

"While this court is given by the Constitution the right to make all orders, rules, and processes proper to give effect to its writs of prohibition, it is not thereby given the power or means of trying issues of fact dehors the record. It can have no jury, neither has it the authority to appoint commissioners, masters, or other officers or agents to take testimony, examine questions of fact and report their findings to the court. In other words, this court has no machinery for the determination of issues of fact outside the record."

This reasoning is wholly inapplicable to the statutory system of procedure which obtains in this state. Our statute makes specific provision for the determination of issues of fact in all prohibition proceedings, irrespective of whether the facts put in issue arise dehors the record in the lower tribunal or appear upon the face of its proceedings. It is expressly provided by our Code that the respondent in a prohibition proceeding may file an answer to the petition; that the issues of fact raised thereby may be tried before a jury; and that the petitioner may countervail the answer by proof either in direct denial or by way of avoidance. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1105, 1089-1091. The mode of procedure thus sanctioned by our statute is entirely incompatible with the notion that this court has no machinery for the determination of issues of fact dehors the record of the tribunal whose jurisdiction is in question.

Let a peremptory writ of prohibition issue in accordance with the views herein expressed.

POWERS v. BARTON et al. (Civ. 5032.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 29, 1925. Rehearing Denied Feb. 26, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1925.)

1. Sales ⚡447—Finding of warranty, which was not pleaded, cannot support claim of breach of warranty.

Where in action for price of rooted grapevines, buyers counterclaimed for breach of warranty, finding of court that contract called for vines of "No. 1 quality" is nugatory, where no such warranty was pleaded.

2. Sales ⚡447—Warranty of grapevines held not breached in view of finding.

Seller's warranty that rooted grapevines were alive and in good condition and fit for planting, and when properly planted would grow, held not breached in view of finding that seller shipped live grapevines fit to be planted and which would grow.

3. Sales ⚡447 — Finding held to show no breach of warranty implied because of inaccessibility of goods for examination.

Where buyers contended that seller agreed to sell merchandise inaccessible for examination at time of sale and thereby warranted merchandise as sound and merchantable, finding that seller shipped live grapevines fit to be planted, and which would grow, held to recite full compliance with alleged warranty.

4. Appeal and error ⚡179(1)—Issue of improper packing of goods by seller held not raised.

Contention of buyers on appeal from judgment for seller for purchase price of grapevines, that latter undertook to pack vines and improperly packed them, cannot be considered, where pleadings do not raise issue, and where findings as to how vines were packed do not advise court as to whether method of packing adopted was reasonably proper under circumstances.

5. Sales ⚡441(3)—Evidence held to support judgment for seller, where record fails to disclose cause of unfit condition of goods.

In action by seller for price of grapevines, wherein buyers counterclaimed for breach of warranty, evidence that vines when shipped were alive and in good condition, but that on arriving all but 10 per cent. were unfit to plant, held to support judgment for seller, where record does not disclose whether change was due to improper packing, delay in transportation, outside cause, or natural result of keeping plants out of ground too long.

6. Trial ⚡396(1)—Findings held nugatory where issues not made by pleadings.

Findings made on issue not made by pleadings held nugatory.

On Petition for Rehearing.

7. Sales ⚡447—Unpleaded warranties provable because of seller's common count are affirmed or negated by finding on count.

Though express and implied warranties may be proved by buyer, where seller in action for price pleaded common count, trial court must make findings on issues made by pleadings, and its finding affirming or negating common count affirms or negatives all issues of fact coming within purview thereof.

8. Sales ⚡447—Finding held complete on issue whether seller complied with warranty.

Finding that seller shipped live grapevines which were fit to be planted and which would grow held complete without finding that vines when delivered were in good condition.

9. Trial ⚡397(3)—Court need not find on issue not made by pleadings.

Refusal to make a finding concerning effect of telephone conversation between parties to action held not improper, where it was not an issue made by pleadings, but was merely evidence offered at trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by E. Powers against C. M. Barton and another, partners doing business under the name of Barton & Colomb, for the purchase price of goods sold and delivered, wherein defendants counterclaimed for breach of warranty. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied; RICHARDS, J., dissenting.

W. H. Spaulding, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, and C. J. Goodell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered for the purchase price of rooted grapevines sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants.

In the trial court an issue was made to the effect that the plaintiff had violated the state regulations enacted to prevent the spread of the disease known as phylloxera. That issue soon fell out of the case. A purported delivery was made in violation of the statute. The goods were intercepted, returned to the shipper, and thereafter a second delivery was made which wholly conformed to the statute. That subject-matter became immaterial, except in so far as the period of time is material which lapsed between the date that the plaintiff dug the grapevines, and the date on which the defendants attempted to reset the grapevines. There is still present in the case a dispute as to whether the plaintiff sold his vines under an express or implied warranty, and whether he complied therewith and was entitled to judgment.

[1] The appellants claim that certain warranties were breached. We shall take up each of those claims separately. Commencing in the middle of finding No. 2, the appellants quote: "In this connection the court finds that in the month of December, 1922, at Manteca, Cal., the defendants made and entered into a contract with the plaintiff wherein and whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell to said defendants and they agreed to buy from him 18,000 Alicante rooted grapevines of No. 1 quality at the price of $35 per thousand, free on board cars Manteca, Cal., and wherein and whereby they agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $1 per thousand additional for the work and labor of packing of the vines; that subsequent thereto and in the month of January, 1923, said defendants made a further and separate contract with plaintiff wherein and whereby said plaintiff agreed to sell to defendants and they agreed to buy from him 1900 Zinfandel rooted grapevines of No. 1 quality at the price of $35 per thousand, free on board cars Manteca, Cal., and wherein and whereby said defendants further agreed to pay plaintiff an additional sum of $1 per thousand for the work and labor of packing said Zinfandel vines." Thereupon they base the statement that the vines were warranted No. 1 quality. An examination of the pleadings discloses that no such warranty was pleaded, and that the finding which we have quoted is without the issues made by the pleadings. Such a finding cannot, therefore, support the claim of the appellants.

[2] Again the appellants contended that the vines were warranted as "rooted grapevines that were alive and in good condition and fit for planting and which, when properly planted, would grow." This warranty was alleged by the defendants, it was admitted by the plaintiff, and the court found, "that plaintiff shipped live grapevines which were fit to be planted and which would grow." It is therefore apparent that the warranty contended for was not breached.

[3] The appellants also contended that the seller agreed to sell merchandise which was inaccessible for examination by the buyer at the time of the sale, and that the seller thereby warranted that the merchandise was sound and merchantable. The pleadings alleged, the evidence proved, and the court found that the vines were to be delivered f. o. b. cars Manteca, Cal. As contended by the appellants, the findings also recited that the vines were inaccessible to them and each of them and were never seen by them or either of them until the arrival of the vines at Hollister on the 8th day of February, 1923, but it also appears in the findings, "that the plaintiff shipped live grapevines which were fit to be planted and which would grow." It appears to us that the finding last quoted recites a full compliance with the alleged warranty. The appellants have not attempted to show wherein the language of the finding of performance varies in substance from the warranty as claimed.

[4] In this court the appellants call attention to the fact that the seller undertook to pack the merchandise, and thereupon they assert that the goods were improperly packed. As to whether the merchandise was in fact properly or improperly packed no issue was made by the pleadings. True it is that some evidence was introduced in the trial court as to whether the merchandise was properly or improperly packed. The trial court made no finding on the subject except as follows: "That said vines when so shipped by plaintiff at Manteca on January 31, 1923, were packed solely in burlap and without straw or other packing for shipment to defendants at said Hollister. * * *" Whether the method of packing so delineated is a proper or improper method, we are not advised. Neither are we advised by either the pleadings or the findings as to whether the method of packing adopted by the respondent was reasonably proper for this particular shipment.

[5] There is evidence in the record that the vines were a fine lot and in good condition when they first arrived at Hollister. The respondent was the only witness who testified as to the condition of the vines when they were shipped from Manteca on January 31, 1923. He testified that the vines were at that time alive and in good condition. On the other hand, the evidence introduced by the appellants sustained the finding of the trial court that when the vines arrived at Hollister on February 8, 1923, all of said vines except about 10 per cent. thereof were in bad condition and not fit to plant. However, the record is silent as to whether the change in the condition of the vines between the time they left Manteca and arrived at Hollister was caused by improper packing, delay in transportation, some outside cause, or the natural result of keeping the plants out of the ground too long.

[6] The trial court made some findings which we have numbered (a), (b), (c), and (d).

(a) "The court further finds that when said vines were so planted the defendants well knew the condition of said vines, as hereinabove described."

(b) "The court further finds that after receiving, unloading, examining, and inspecting said vines, defendants took no steps to reject any of them, or notify plaintiff of their condition until most of said 14,700 vines had been planted, but proceeded as aforesaid, to plant said 14,700 vines and permitted the remainder thereof to remain on their land."

(c) "That before said planting was entirely finished defendants did complain to said plaintiff about the said unsuitable and unfit condition of said vines."

(d) "The court finds that the acts and conduct of defendants constituted and was an acceptance of said vines, and all thereof."

The appellants claim that each of those findings was immaterial and that neither one nor all would support a judgment for the respondent. Be that as it may, it is patent that each of said findings was without any issue made by the pleadings and that each is nugatory; but the other findings fully supported the judgment for the respondent.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The defendants and appellants have petitioned for a rehearing. They complain that in the opinion heretofore filed this court has committed certain errors. In that behalf they point to the passage in which we stated that the finding "No. 1 quality" was not within the issues. Thereupon they assert that it was one of the terms of the contract and therefore was material. However, it was not one of the alleged terms of the contract, and was not one of the allegations contained in the pleadings of the plaintiff or the pleadings of the defendants.

[7] As the plaintiff pleaded a common count, the appellants claim that the express warranties and implied warranties could be proved. We have never held to the contrary. But when it came to preparing findings the trial court was entitled to and required to make its findings on the issues made by the pleadings. When, after the trial, it made a finding which affirmed or negated the common count, that finding affirmed or negated such issues of fact as came within the purview of that common count.

Appellants argue that the pleadings were treated at the time as being sufficient, and that on appeal the parties may not take a different position, nor should this court. Nothing contained in the former opinion of this court, nor in this opinion, is at variance with that rule in any respect whatsoever. The appellants also complain of our statement that the issue to the effect that on January 17, 1923, the plaintiff had not complied with the state regulations and qualified as a vendor of trees and vines, "soon fell out of the case," and thereupon they proceed to argue that the evidence of and concerning that issue brought out the facts that the vines were taken out of the ground and kept out from January 17 until February 8, and that such evidence strongly argued that the vines were therefore in bad condition when they arrived at Hollister on February 8. As all of evidence was introduced without any limitation thereon and was not stricken out, it is patent that the evidence could have been, and doubtlessly was, used by the trial court for the purpose as stated by the appellants. In our former opinion we said nothing to the contrary and do not now.

The appellants quote our language in which we stated that this court was not advised "either by the pleadings or the findings as to whether the method of packing * * * was reasonably proper." We repeat it. There was evidence introduced as to what is, and what is not, proper packing, but there was neither allegation nor finding on the subject. As there was no allegation on the subject, no finding was necessary. However, when the court did make a finding, "they were packed solely in burlap and without straw or other packing," such finding was immaterial and moreover, as stated in our former opinion, we have nothing to compare it with so that we can draw a conclusion whether the method of packing was proper or improper.

On the trial of the case, the respondent introduced evidence to the effect that he dug, dipped, packed, and shipped at Manteca to the appellants the vines which he had agreed to sell, and that the vines were at that time in good condition. The respondent at the trial took the position that thereupon he had made all of the proof that he was called upon to make. In this court he took the same position. Of course the appellants took the contrary position. However, they introduced no evidence to the effect that the vines were not in good condition when they left Manteca on January 31, or did they introduce any evidence as to what caused the change in the condition of the vines, and why the vines did not grow. On this application they seem to contend that the burden of making that proof rested on the respondent, and they cite and rely on Barrios v. Pacific States Trading Co., 41 Cal. App. 637, 183 P. 236. A most cursory reading of that opinion shows a very different condition of the evidence.

In our former opinion, we stated that "the appellants have not attempted to show wherein the language of the finding of performance varies in substance from the warranty as claimed." The appellants assert that the warranty alleged by the plaintiff in one of his pleadings was "when properly planted would grow and plaintiff alleges in this connection that the rooted grapevines so shipped to defendants * * * if properly cared for by defendants and properly planted in suitable soil in proper condition, that said grapevines would in fact have grown." Then appellants assert that the trial court should have found that the vines "would grow not only when shipped at Manteca, but also when planted by defendants at Hollister, if properly cared for by defendants and properly planted in suitable soil in proper condition." To this contention there are two answers. One answer is that under the appellants' contention the trial court would have gone beyond the language used in the pleadings. The second answer is that the trial court did find that the "plaintiff knew at all times that such delivery to said defendants was for planting * * * in San Benito county," and "that it is not true that there was any failure of the plaintiff to ship or deliver to defendants live grapevines fit to be planted and which would grow, but on the contrary, it is true that plaintiff shipped live grapevines which were fit to be planted and which would grow." These findings substantially comply with the language of the warranty.

[8] Again the appellants contend that the trial court did not find that the vines delivered were or were not "in good condition." The first reply is that the point is new, and this is the first time that the point has been made on this appeal. The next reply is that the appellants stated in their pleading called a counterclaim "that said plaintiff agreed with said defendants to sell and to ship to said defendants rooted grapevines that were alive and in good condition and fit for planting, and which when properly planted would grow. * * *" Answering that allegation, the respondent alleged that "he agreed with defendants to sell f. o. b. Manteca, San Joaquin county, Cal., and to ship to defendants rooted grapevines that were alive and in good condition, and fit for planting, and which, when properly planted, would grow, and plaintiff alleges in this connection that the rooted grapevines so shipped to defendants were in fact alive and in good condition, and were fit for planting, and if properly cared for by defendants and properly planted in suitable soil in proper condition that said grapevines would in fact have grown." Replying to the issue so made by the pleadings, the trial court made the last finding contained in its decision. While that paragraph does not use the exact words used in the pleadings, we think it is a finding that is full, fair, and complete on this issue.

Again the appellants assert that the trial court did not find that the vines shipped were in "No. 1 quality." What we have said above as to "No. 1 quality" applies here.

[9] In this same connection, the appellants make another point for the first time. They call attention to a telephone conversation which was held between the plaintiff and the defendants at the time the vines were rejected by the horticultural commissioner at Hollister. Thereupon the appellants complain, because the trial court made no finding in response to the language used by the appellants in holding that telephone conversation. Of course, the answer is that we are talking about findings and not about a bill of exceptions. The language used in the telephone conversation was not an issue made by the pleadings. It was merely evidence offered at the trial.

The petition is denied.

PEOPLE v. NORCROSS et al. SAME v. NORCROSS. SAME v. CLARK.
(Cr. 1096-1098.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 970(5) — Complaints of form of information made on motion in arrest are too late.

Complaint that information charging violations of Wright Act does not substantially comply with Pen. Code, §§ 950-952, being aimed at formal defects in information, comes too late when first made on motion in arrest of judgment.

2. Intoxicating liquors $\S$ 202—Information, charging liquor law violation, need not allege liquor was for beverage purposes.

In view of provisions of Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.), penal provisions of which Wright Act expressly adopts, pursuant to Const. U. S. Amend. 18, that phrase "intoxicating liquor" shall include alcohol, etc., "fit for * * * beverage purposes," and that possession is prima facie evidence of unlawful purpose, information under latter act need not allege that liquor was for beverage purposes.

3. Statutes $\S$ 226—Interpretation by courts of state, from which statute adopted, will be followed.

In construing statute adopted from another state, decisions of courts of such other state are entitled to great consideration, and their interpretation of statute will be followed, and same rule applies to federal statute on which action is based.

4. Intoxicating liquors $\S$ 219 — Information, charging sale, need not name purchasers.

Information, charging sale of intoxicating liquor in violation of Wright Act, need not name alleged purchasers.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 37—Purchase of liquor with money furnished by district attorney held not entrapment.

That persons who purchased liquor from defendants were operatives in employ of district attorney who furnished money for that purpose does not constitute entrapment, where evidence does not show importunity or deceit, or that defendants did not hold themselves out as ready and able to sell, and defense was denial only.

6. Criminal law §772(6)—Instructions as to entrapment held sufficient.

Where state admittedly employed and furnished money to operatives to buy liquor, refusal to instruct further as to entrapment, after instructing that jury should acquit unless defendants were ready, able, and willing to sell and intended to violate law, and were not induced solely by operatives, held proper.

7. Indictment and information §110(31)—Allegations of alcoholic content and fitness as beverage held unnecessary, where information follows statute.

Where offenses are charged substantially in language of penal provisions of Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½ et seq.), allegations as to alcoholic content of liquor and its fitness as beverage held unnecessary, in view of declaration of section 3 of title 2 (section 10138½aa) that "no person shall * * * manufacture, sell," etc., "intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act."

8. Intoxicating liquors §222 — Information need not negative exceptions named in act.

In view of declaration of Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 3 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½aa), that "no person shall * * * manufacture," etc., "any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act," it is not necessary in charging offense under act to negative any of exceptions, since language defining offenses is separable from exceptions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Louise Norcross and William S. Clark were convicted of conspiracy to sell and deliver intoxicating liquor, and each of them was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor and maintaining a nuisance, and they appeal. Affirmed.

James P. Hogan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellants were charged by information with having conspired, combined, and confederated and agreed together to sell, transport, furnish, and deliver, and to have and possess intoxicating liquor, with intent so to do, in violation of the state statute known as the Wright Act; and as overt acts in furtherance of such conspiracy it was alleged that they did on or about the 3d day of December, 1923, in the county of Los Angeles, sell, furnish, deliver, have, and possess intoxicating liquor, and that the same was willful, felonious, and unlawful. Each of said defendants was also separately charged by another information with having willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously sold intoxicating liquor, contrary to the provisions of said act, and with having maintained a nuisance by keeping a place where such traffic was conducted by them. The three cases were tried together, and the jury found the defendants guilty upon each of said charges.

It is contended that the informations do not contain sufficient facts to constitute offenses, in that it is not alleged that the intoxicating liquor charged to have been sold was for beverage purposes; also that the informations do not substantially conform to sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, and especially that they are not direct and certain in stating facts and circumstances necessary to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended to be charged. Appellants also assert that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and that the trial court committed errors in giving certain instructions to the jury, and in refusing to give others which were requested.

[1] Complaint concerning defects in the form of the information upon the grounds urged comes too late, since it was first made upon a motion in arrest of judgment. People v. Feilen, 58 Cal. 218, 41 Am. Rep. 258.

The evidence disclosed that appellant Norcross leased and maintained the Antler Hotel, at Venice, in Los Angeles county, and that Clark was in her employ and residing at the same place; that complaint had been made to the lessor of people drinking in the hotel and being intoxicated about the premises; that he had also seen drunken men leaving the place on many occasions. The lessor notified the district attorney, who placed one Irving and his wife in the house to watch for any possible violations of the law, and paid them for their services and furnished them with money to purchase liquor if they should find that it was obtainable from persons in charge of or living at the Antler Hotel. Irving and his wife both smelled liquor about the room occupied by Clark, and saw people entering his room and drinking from glasses. Irving asked Clark for a bottle of "medicine," and a bottle of whisky was brought to Irving's room, for which he paid Clark three dollars, and he subsequently and on various dates purchased other bottles of whisky from Clark, and on one occasion the latter filled an empty bottle, which Irving furnished, with the same substance. Mrs. Irving also bought whisky from the defendants when they were together, for which she paid Mrs. Norcross, who sent Clark into a room for it, and he delivered the liquor to Mrs. Irving. It was testified that each of the appellants cautioned these witnesses to hide the bottles and let no one see them; that "whisky" was not mentioned, but that "medicine," and "a bottle," were requested; and that whisky was promptly furnished and paid for. A search by officers resulted in the discovery and confiscation of a pint bottle and a gallon jug, each partly full, and a gallon jug full, of whisky in the room designated by the witnesses. Clark did not testify, but Mrs. Norcross denied that she or Clark had sold any liquor, and stated that on one occasion Mrs. Irving was ill, and that she demanded some whisky. This the latter positively denied.

[2] Appellants first assert that, although the information alleged the liquor as being intoxicating, it contained no allegation that it was for beverage purposes; that the only object of the Wright Act was to prohibit traffic in such liquors for beverage purposes; and that the people therefore failed to allege or establish the commission of any offense.

It was alleged that appellants conspired to, and did, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, sell, furnish, deliver, have, and possess intoxicating liquor, and the evidence tended to show that they sold, delivered, furnished, had, and possessed whisky which was intoxicating. Chapter 80 of the Laws of 1921 (page 79), known as the Wright Act, expressly adopts the penal provisions of the Volstead or National Prohibition Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138 $\frac{1}{4}$ et seq.) and recognizes the requirements of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for concurrent enforcement of prohibition by the individual states. Section 2 of the same chapter declares that—

"All acts or omissions prohibited or declared unlawful by the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States or by the Volstead Act are hereby prohibited and declared unlawful; and violations thereof are subject to the penalties provided in the Volstead Act."

The latter act provides that the "phrase 'intoxicating liquor' shall be construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky * * * fit for * * * beverage purposes." (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138 $\frac{1}{2}$), and that—

"No person shall * * * manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish, or possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act, and all the provisions of this act shall be liberally construed to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented." U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138 $\frac{1}{2}$ aa.

It is further provided that—

"The possession of liquors by any person not legally permitted under this title to possess liquor shall be prima facie evidence that such liquor is kept for the purpose of being sold, bartered, exchanged, given away, furnished, or otherwise disposed of in violation of the provisions of this title." U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138 $\frac{1}{2}$ t.

It has been held in Minnesota that, where a statute so defines intoxicating liquor, an indictment need not contain a more definite specification than that before us, in that it is not necessary to charge that such liquor, is potable as a beverage. State v. Brown, 151 Minn. 340, 186 N. W. 946; State v. Hosmer, 144 Minn. 342, 175 N. W. 683.

[3] It has been a uniform rule of long standing in California that, in construing a statute adopted from another state, the decisions of the courts of such other state are entitled to great consideration, and their interpretation of the statute will be followed. Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 324, 24 P. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Osborne v. Home Life Ins. Co., 123 Cal. 610, 56 P. 616; In re Seaman's Estate, 146 Cal. 455, 80 P. 700, 106 Am. St. Rep. 53, 2 Ann. Cas. 726. And the same rule applies in construing a federal statute upon which an action is based and is being tried in the courts of this state. Werner v. Southern Pacific Co., 44 Cal. App. 76, 185 P. 1016; Southern Pacific Co. v. Superior Court, 27 Cal. App. 240, 150 P. 397, 404.

In Herine v. United States, 276 F. 806, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in passing upon an appeal from a conviction in California under the National Prohibition Act, said:

"The allegation that defendant willfully and unlawfully and knowingly did keep on the premises certain described intoxicating liquor, as alleged, was sufficient to comply with the statute. Section 21, tit. 2, National Prohibition Act. Under the provisions of section 32 of title 2 of the act, it was unnecessary in the indictment to include more."

In Cabiale et al. v. United States, 276 F. 769, the same court held that an allegation of the sale of intoxicating liquor which was then and there prohibited and unlawful and in violation of section 3 of the act was sufficient, and that it necessarily excluded the idea that the liquor was sold for a legitimate purpose. It was further held in United States v. Everson (D. C.) 280 F. 126, that an information charging an "unlawful" possession was sufficient to place upon the defendant the onus of proving that it was lawful, and in Massey v. United States, 281 F. 293, 296, it was said by the Circuit Court of Appeals that a description as intoxicating liquor was sufficient, and that it is not necessary to include any defensive averments. The rule has been stated and followed in other cases. Dillon v. United States (C. C. A.) 279 F. 639; Booth v. United States, 197 F. 283, 286, 116 C. C. A. 645.

[4] Another point is attempted to be made of the failure of the information to state the names of the alleged purchasers, but this also has been held to be unnecessary. Massey v. United States, supra.

[5, 6] The requested instruction, the refusal of which is assigned as error, was based upon Woo Wai v. United States, 223

F. 412, 137 C. C. A. 604, wherein it was said that, where an officer of the law induced a defendant to commit a criminal act not contemplated by him, a conviction would be contrary to public policy. That such is the law has been held by our state and federal courts on numerous occasions, but the evidence in the case at bar does not tend to show that appellants were importuned or persuaded to violate any law, or that they did not hold themselves out as ready, able, and willing to possess, sell, and deliver intoxicating liquor whenever the opportunity was presented. The only evidence from which entrapment could possibly be inferred was the fact, frankly admitted by the Irvings, that they were in the employ of the district attorney's office, and that they paid appellants for whisky with money furnished by the district attorney for that purpose. This did not constitute entrapment, nor was it a defense, and there is no showing that appellants were in any manner misled or deceived by the operatives. It was so held in People v. Barkdoll, 36 Cal. App. 25, 171 P. 440, and the instructions given both at the requests of the respective parties, and of the court's own motion, fully advised the jury as to the law, and directed that, if they should not find beyond a reasonable doubt that appellants were ready, able, and willing to sell intoxicating liquor, and that they intended to violate the law, and were not induced to do so solely by persons so employed, they should acquit them. The significant fact is that throughout the record no evidence appears to have been offered tending to show that either defendant was entrapped or induced to commit a crime, and that the defense consisted of a complete denial of any possession, delivery or sale of intoxicating liquor. We think the instructions given were sufficient, and that the action of the trial court in refusing to give others as requested was proper.

No error appearing, the judgments and orders denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [7, 8] I concur. The specific grounds of objection which appellants make to the informations are: (1) It is not alleged who the person was to whom the liquor was sold; (2) it is not alleged that the liquor contained more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume; and (3) it is not alleged that the liquor was fit for use for beverage purposes. The standards by which the informations are to be tested are furnished by those rules of pleading in criminal actions which are recognized by our state practice as the established rules of this jurisdiction. The Wright Act has adopted the "penal provisions" of the National Prohibition Act, but none of its procedural provisions. When the informations are tested by the rules of pleading established in this jurisdiction, there can be no question as to their sufficiency. The name of the person to whom the liquor was sold is neither descriptive of, nor of the essence of, the offense charged, and therefore its allegation is not essential. State v. Freulli, 98 N. J. Law, 395, 119 A. 787; People v. Malone (Cal. App.) 229 P. 1000. As to the objection that there is no allegation that the liquor contained more than one-half of one per centum of alcohol, or that it was fit for use as a beverage, it is sufficient to say that the offenses are charged substantially in the language of the penal provisions of the Volstead Act. Section 3 of title 2 of that act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½ aa) declares that—

"No person shall * * * manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish or possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act."

It is not necessary to negative any of the exceptions, for the language defining the offenses is so separable from the exceptions named in the statute that the ingredients constituting each offense may be accurately and clearly defined and described without reference to the exceptions. See State v. Snyder (N. M.) 227 P. 613. The offenses denounced by the statute are the unlawful manufacture, sale, etc., of "intoxicating liquor." Whether the liquor unlawfully manufactured, sold, or possessed, etc., be of such generally recognized intoxicating liquors as brandy, whisky, wine, or beer, or whether it be some other kind of intoxicating liquor which is fit for use as a beverage, the description of it as "intoxicating liquor" comes within the general designation contained in the statute; and under the rule established by the decisions in this state that is all that is necessary. People v. Johnson, 63 Cal. App. 178, 218 P. 449; People v. Cencevich, 64 Cal. App. 39, 220 P. 448; People v. Silva (Cal. App.) 227 P. 976.

et al. (Civ. 4859.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California, Jan. 31, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1925.)

Landlord and tenant — 184(2)—Deposit made on execution of lease held not recoverable by assignee of lessee.

Assignee of lessee held not entitled to recover deposit made on execution of lease by itself as sublessee and assignee, where prior to assignment assignor had been divested of all rights under lease and deposit was severally or in entirety specified by lease to lessee to be paid for its execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by George Anderson and Robert A. Smith, as individuals and copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Anderson-Smith Motor Company against the Julius Levin Company and another. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ST. SURE, J. Appeal from judgment of nonsuit. The complaint stated a cause for money had and received in three counts, the first count for $5,000, from W. S. Wright, the second for $2,000, from W. S. Wright, and the third for money had and received from plaintiffs in the sum of $3,000. Under the first count an assignment to plaintiffs of Wright's claim is set out. Prayer is for $5,000, with interest from November 7, 1919. Defendant, Wilton Securities Company, sued as Julius Levin Company, answered denying all the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that none of the counts stated a cause of action against defendant.

The facts, briefly stated, show that on November 3, 1919, W. S. Wright, plaintiffs' assignor here, entered into an agreement of lease with Julius Levin Company for certain premises on Van Ness avenue, San Francisco, at a stipulated rental. The lease, as consideration for its execution, contained a provision for the payment, simultaneously with execution of the lease, of the sum of $5,000. It was later provided that, if the provisions of the lease were fully performed, the sum so paid might be applied in specified amounts on the last 23 months of the 5-year term. There was no provision in the lease against subletting, and a few days thereafter Wright entered into an agreement of sublease of part of the same premises with the plaintiffs here. A provision for the payment of $3,000 for the execution of the sublease was contained therein, and as matter of fact the money so paid was paid directly to the Julius Levin Company by check of the plaintiffs, who paid such sum at defendant's office in company with Wright. The Levin Company had already received $2,500 from Wright, and the $3,000 thus paid by plaintiffs was received by them on the Wright account, on which, being overpaid by reason of the $3,000 payment, they returned $500 to Wright. Shortly after the leases above mentioned were entered into, a corporation was formed by name of Wright Motor Company, to which Wright made assignment of the lease and all rights thereunder. Business grew steadily worse, and the company later made an assignment for the benefit of creditors, in which Wright, then owner of all the motor company's stock, joined and assented to. The company later was adjudged bankrupt. During the period after the assignment to creditors and preceding bankruptcy, while the assignee for creditors was in charge, and also during part of the period of bankruptcy proceedings, attempts were being made by the assignee and by Wright to rent the premises, for the rent of which he was in default. The matter of taking over the operation of the lease was taken up by the trustee in bankruptcy, and the matter of a claim by Wright in connection with the lease considered by Wright and his then attorney. So far as the record shows, no claim was asserted by Wright, and he acquiesced in the efforts of his lessor to rent the premises and minimize his loss. During part of the time after Wright's default and abandonment, the plaintiffs remained in possession and paid rent to the assignee for creditors. They later discontinued paying rent and removed from the premises, some three months after the adjudication in bankruptcy, delivered the key to a real estate man acting for the Levin Company, and until this suit was brought appeared to have made no claim of any kind in the premises. The entire premises were then leased at a loss by the Levin Company to another motor company. The assignment on which this suit is based was made following all of the above transactions.

After a most liberal allowance of testimony in the trial court, on the expressed intent of the court to do justice to all, a motion for nonsuit was granted, on the grounds that the plaintiffs' assignor was not entitled to sue, having parted with the lease under assignment to creditors; that, if title to the lease had not gone to the assignee for creditors, it vested in the trustee in bankruptcy; that both assignor and assignee defaulted in their contract of lease and are attempting to secure performance of a contract under which they are in default; that the money paid was for execution of the contract and as such is not repayable; the premises were sublet to the benefit of the subtenant at a loss by the terms of the contract; and, finally, that no contractual relations exist between the Levin Company and plaintiffs—that is, no privileged contract.

A reading of the entire transcript is sufficient to show that respondent's motion for nonsuit was properly granted and the judgment thereon must stand. The assignment to the Wright Company by Wright divested him of all rights under the lease, which a later assignment to plaintiffs could not revive. The Wright Company, by assignment for the benefit of creditors and by virtue of the proceedings in bankruptcy, was divested of all title to the lease. Further, the entire amount here sought to be recovered by different counts is, severally or in entirety, part or all of the amount specified by lease to Wright to be paid for its execution, and not recoverable by him under the decisions. Ramish v. Workman, 33 Cal. App. 19, 164 P. 26; Curtis v. Arnold, 43 Cal. App. 103, 184 P. 510. On the showing of this ground alone the nonsuit was proper as to the counts for $5,000 and $2,000. The documentary evidence also shows that the $3,000 was paid as part of the $5,000, and the attempt to vary the effect of the terms of the lease by parol testimony, that its payment was for the benefit of plaintiffs, was of no avail. There were no contractual relations between defendant and plaintiff. The assignment to plaintiff, on which the suit here was brought, carried nothing because its subject-matter of right, granting any existed, had been theretofore effectually conveyed out of plaintiffs' as signor.

The judgment is affirmed.

MACOWSKY v. IRVINE et al. (Civ. 4578.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 31, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ☞544(2)—Scope of review on appeal on judgment roll alone, stated.

Where appeal is on judgment roll alone, review is limited to determination of whether complaint states cause of action, whether findings are within issues, whether findings support judgment, and whether reversible error appears on face of record concerning matter of law.

2. Sales ☞391(5)—Buyer may sue on common count to recover payment after rescission.

Buyer after rescinding contract of purchase, under which he has paid money or delivered property, may sue on common count to recover it.

3. Action ☞48(3)—Counts for money had and received and for rescission held not improperly joined.

Where buyer paid purchase price of piano in cash, jewelry, and used piano, and rescinded and offered to return piano and demanded return of money and property for sellers' fraud in delivering old instrument, common count for purchase price as for money had and received and count for rescission praying money judgment in sum of purchase price held consistent and not improperly joined under Code Civ. Proc. § 427.

4. Appeal and error ☞931(1)—Presumption attaching to regularity of proceedings and to support judgment held to sustain finding.

Where buyer rescinded contract of purchase for fraud in "dressing up" and delivering old piano and sued in two counts for value parted with in money, jewelry, and used piano as for money had and received, and for rescission praying money judgment, presumptions attaching to regularity of proceedings and to support judgment held to sustain finding of indebtedness by seller as made in exercise of court's equitable powers and to do justice even if legal count were defectively stated.

5. Trial ☞397(3)—Findings as to facts admitted by pleadings held unnecessary.

In suit by buyer after rescission on ground of fraud for contract price of piano which he had paid for in money, jewelry, and used piano, findings as to contract price and amounts allowed for goods exchanged held unnecessary, where sellers' pleadings raised no issue as to amounts alleged by buyer, thereby admitting them as true valuations.

6. Trial ☞397(2)—Express finding unnecessary in view of construction of findings favorably to judgment where possible.

Where money judgment was given buyer of piano in suit for rescission for fraud, though he had paid contract price in money and goods, in view of construction of findings on appeal to support judgment where possible, especially where fraud appears and appeal is on judgment
